

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

LITTELL'S

LIVING AGE.

CONDUCTED BY E. LITTELL.

E PLURIBUS UNUM.

"These publications of the day should from time to time be winnowed, the wheat carefully preserved and the chaff thrown away."

"Made up of every creature's best."

"Various, that the mind
Of desultory man, studious of change,
And pleased with novelty, may be indulged."

УРАССУ, ОНОМЪАТЪ

DEAR READER!

Herewith we present to you the first volume of the New Series. If you will examine the Table of Contents, which is prefixed to the Index, we hope you will think it superior to any other quarterly in the world. Each volume is our quarterly number.

The Eight Hundred and Twenty-four pages which are before you contain as much matter as sixteen hundred and fifty pages of the Edinburgh or Quarterly Reviews. Each of our pages contains as much as two pages of the other works.

There is no question of the abundant quantity of reading contained in "The Living Age," and as to its quality, it is "made up of every creature's best."

The General Index to the First Series is considerably advanced, but we cannot yet promise when it shall be completed. The gentleman engaged in the matter finds it an ever-growing labor; for as he goes on he is continually obliged to enlarge his plan. We think that all who have a complete set bound, will testify to the continued and growing interest of the back volumes.

From the great field which is before us we shall continue to present to you, once a week, an abundant supply of matter, — matter for memory and thought, — refreshed and quickened by as much spirit and life as we can gather.

Excuse us if we copy here ("business is business") a notice of the Second Series, from the New York Times, written by the editor, Mr. Raymond, who is now in Europe, making extensive arrangements for the greater perfection of that full and vigorous paper, which we have from the beginning taken great delight in.

"The veteran LITTELL!

'Age cannot wither, nor custom stale
His infinite variety.'

After founding and editing any number of periodicals, all of which have enjoyed their heyday of fame and success, we have him once more remodeling and renewing the Living Age for a fresh campaign, and still higher claims upon popular favor. The size, for one thing, has been changed from a large to a medium octavo; a decided amendment. The number of pages has been increased to sixty-four; which, it is needless to say, will always be filled with the choicest selections, so long as Mr. LITTELL prepares copy. Prose and verse; fact and fiction; opinion and speculation; the best things in all those periodicals whose portraits decorate the cover; the noteworthy leaders of the foreign and domestic news press; and, indeed, a fair résumé of the literature and creed of the time, will crowd each weekly number. With a programme so extended, and the undoubted good faith wherewith all its engagements are made, there can be no question about the value and popularity of the magazine. It cannot have more of the latter commodity than it merits."

We copy the above just as it appeared, — although there are some phrases which speak of us as rather elderly, — trusting that none of our regular readers will suspect us of growing "too old and wise." It is cheering to find that our labors receive the commendation of good judges.

POETRY : The Sleep, 30 ; Cling to thy Mother, 38.

SHORT ARTICLES : Discovery of a Buried City ; The Miseries of Human Life, 64.

NEW BOOKS : 2, 64.

TO THE READER.

IN beginning a Second Series, it is proper for us to thank the numerous readers of the First—many of whom have kept company with us from the beginning. Thirty-six volumes make a long row on your shelves ; but there are very few pages in the whole which may not be read now with nearly as much interest as at first, and some with more, being of the nature of fulfilled prophecy.

Our circulation is now greatly increased, and we have endeavored to make some improvement in the form of the work, and have added to the quantity of matter.

This number begins with an article on Lord John Russell's memoirs of Moore, which we have copied from four different numbers of The Times. It created considerable sensation in England, and was thought to have induced his lordship to delay the third volume. It is edifying to see the lofty condescension of The Times in regard to noble authors and lecturers.

As a specimen number of the Second Series, we regret that a considerable variety of poetry and short notices has been crowded out. It is not so good as the average in this respect.

We have left ourselves room for much more than we have to say ; but intend in this part of the work to make a note occasionally for your perusal.

If the cover should be printed as well as we hope, it will do credit to Mr. Billings, of this city, who designed it, and to the Engravers, Messrs. Baker, Smith & Andrew.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

THE following passage from Rev. A. L. Stone's sermon, upon the death-bed scene of the great statesman, will give an idea of the whole :—

Let us gather now closer within that central scene, around which all these reflections group and cluster. The chimes of midnight have died away on the ear, and the young morning of the Sabbath is ushered in—though the night still holds its reign. It is the chamber of death. There, on that couch of death, lies that form whose port and presence became so well the mighty crown of greatness it upheld. The marble of death is settling on that broad, capacious brow, beneath which wrought and triumphed the grandest intellect of our country's history. The life-hues are fading out from those lips which have dropped upon us, through the times of a generation, such great, earnest, massive truths. The voice seems altogether hushed, whose grand and majestic oratory was but the fitting garniture of the regal thoughts that marched forth in their own kingliness and sceptred power. A dimness creeping up from the shades of the valley veils that deep-set, fullorbed, glorious eye, that flashed its splendors upon senates, and mighty crowds led captive at its will. Powerless lies the hand whose lifted tokens shielded the sailor on the sea—the humblest son of the soil wherever he wandered. The idol of so many souls—the victor in so many triumphs in that wonderful and unparalleled combination of the statesman, the lawyer, the orator, the first man among men—is on the threshold of the uplifted portals of eternity.

We have followed the flight of that soaring mind in the marches of many an argument, whose stepping stones were set as the continents, in many a burst of eloquence, that swept every spirit with its resistless mastery; but who can follow it now, as the ranges of the infinite open around it, and the unseen becomes visible? Its own proper wings, no longer clogged by clay, the shadowing wings of a great spirit departing are unfolding—the earth-chords are well-nigh sundered; but the lips move yet once more—the failing heart rallies once again—and the legacy of last words is bequeathed to the watchers;—words that may well be called prophetic of an enduring place in the affections of his countrymen—prophetic of an undying memory in the histories of earth—prophetic, let us hope, of a fadeless immortality.

Putnam's Monthly Magazine, No. 2. This Magazine, which seems to aim at uniting an American and an English literary interest, has only reached its second number. It is called a "Magazine of American Literature," but an edition of it appears over here. We can speak in favorable terms of its excellent promise. "Our Best Society" is an admirable paper, and the paper on Melville very interesting. But the most remarkable contribution is an essay which we have read with much curiosity, called "Have we a Bourbon among us?" This essay professes to establish the existence, in the person of the Rev. Eleazer Williams, an American missionary, of no less a potentate than Louis XVII., heir of the throne of France—in other words, the young dauphin whom Simon, the gaoler, treated with such brutality, and whom historians relate to have died in his childhood. We are aware that the success of certain fantastic literary impostures by the gifted Edgar Poe may have tempted other writers to try their hands at hoaxing the public, and that this article may be a specimen of vraisemblable inventions. But at any rate, this would leave it the merit of much ingenuity and readableness, while it would be open to condemnation for the impertinent use of the names of living persons, amongst others of the Prince de Joinville. —Morn. Chron.

The Restoration of Belief. Philadelphia: Herman Hooker.

This is a new argument in behalf of the Christian religion, which has created much sensation in England by the force of its views and the earnest style of the learned anonymous author. It is impossible to read it without benefit, and it will prove a most powerful antagonist of infidelity. The work is as yet incomplete. This volume contains the only two parts yet published.

The first is entitled "Christianity in relation to its ancient and modern antagonists." The second is "on the Supernatural Element in the Epistles, and its bearing on the argument." — Bulletin.

Reprint of the Original Letters from Washington to Joseph Reed, during the American Revolution, referred to in the pamphlets of Lord Mahon and Mr. Sparks. By William B. Reed. Philadelphia: A. Hart.

In consequence of a controversy about the text of these letters, Mr. Reed has issued this very handsome edition. For this he deserves the thanks of all historical students. The work is printed in the nicest and neatest way, and reminds us more of those cleverly-printed pamphlets that are issued for the sake of the public nowhere else but in London. It is a fortunate thing that Mr. Reed has been willing to incur the hazard of the cost and outlay of such a work; for, had he not done so, there would always have been an unadjusted question as to the fidelity with which these letters have been hitherto published, and their authority would have been blemished and hurt, not only as to the truth and fairness of their text, but they would have been open to the surmise that some improper liberties had been taken with them, and important parts of them unwarrantably suppressed. Now we have them all—not only the original, but also side by side with them the additions, corrections, and alterations, as they were before this was published. This is as it should be, and will close the door on all future cavil and dispute.

By themselves the letters would be of little value, but taken in connection with some historical controversies that have been heretofore agitated with harshness and bitterness of manner and feeling, they possess great interest and go far to clear away the doubts that have rested upon these questions. — Bulletin.

The Friends of Christ in the New Testament. Thirteen discourses; by Nehemiah Adams, D. D. Second Edition: S. K. Whipple & Co. Boston, 1858.

We have been reading with unaffected delight the volume of thirteen discourses, recently published by Rev. Dr. Adams of the Essex street church in this city, with the above title.

Those who neglect to place this volume upon one of the selectest shelves of their library, will miss doing justice to the most original, most affluent, and most useful volume of sermons which the American press has—at least, for a long time—given to the world. — Congregationalist.

LETTERS from M. Victor Langlois—travelling in Lower Armenia, on a scientific mission from the French government—have been received in Paris, announcing valuable results from his research. He has, he says, transcribed a great number of inscriptions found in the Christian Churches converted into mosques since the Mussulman Conquest, and collected in the Armenian convents many important manuscripts and hitherto unpublished medals.

MEMOIRS OF THOMAS MOORE.*

It goes against the grain to find fault with Lord John. It is most ungracious to rebuke the admirable spirit with which men of his order have set to work of late, identifying themselves with the literary taste of the age, descending from their social eminence in order to win still higher honor from intellectual labor, and borrowing lustre from pursuits that add to the dignity of the noblest, as they give refinement and grace to the meanest, of men. The homage paid by the rulers of our country within the last few years to the literary profession is among the most remarkable features of our remarkable time. An aristocratic chieftain sitting at the same council-table with a tribune of the people is surely a less marvellous sight than a prime minister discoursing before the busy operatives of a manufacturing city upon the universality of Shakespeare and the tutored elegance of Pope. Hitherto it has been a grievance, no less than a reproach, to the literary man, that for him no niche had been assigned in the social fabric. Assuredly it will be his own fault now if he does not discover his rightful place, and take rank with his fellows.

We declare that no praise can exaggerate the merits of the dukes, earls, and barons who have fairly confessed to assembled multitudes that civilized man has something yet nobler to boast of than magnificent descent, and who by their acts have vindicated a glory surpassing that achieved on the battle-field by fire and sword. But, let us be permitted to say, something more is required than the bare recognition of the dignity of a profession from him who undertakes to follow it for his own credit and the public advantage. If literature reveals occasionally the preternatural signs of inspired genius, it also includes the more numerous productions of instructed and painstaking art. There is no royal road to science, and certainly no ducal avenue to philosophy or verse. Welcome, noble lords, to the workshop, but do not scorn the tools! Labor with us if you will—take your fair portion of the wages earned, but grudge not the sweat that sweetens toil and makes it fructify. Wear the laurel in your coronet, but show your title to the leaf!

* Memoirs, Journal, and Correspondence of Thomas Moore. Edited by the Right Hon. Lord John Russell, M. P. Vols. 1 and 2. London: Longmans, 1852.

Lord John Russell has not edited the memoirs of Thomas Moore. He has not even done the next best thing. He is a minister of state, and knows the worth of those unseen hands which undergo official drudgery for the service of their betters. He has not availed himself of the knowledge and experience of a man of letters, whose advice might have been usefully taken in the back-room, while his lordship was acquiring all possible respect for his undertaking in the front. It is only too evident that his lordship has suffered his materials to pass through his hands to the press unexamined and unsifted. The two volumes issued comprise the fragment of an autobiography, which, unfortunately, comes suddenly to a close before the writer has reached his twentieth year; four hundred letters, dating from 1793 to 1818, and the beginning of a diary, the first entry of which is made on the 18th of August, 1818, and the last on the 30th of August of the year following. We have no hesitation in stating, that of the four hundred letters at least three hundred might have been dispensed with, and that of the diary a considerable portion might have been omitted without disappointment to the reader or disadvantage to the fame of Thomas Moore. It is very clear that if Lord John intends to proceed with his subsequent volumes on the plan he has adopted with the first two, no ordinary bookshelf will suffice for his contribution; and it is equally certain that, after all, we shall be as ill off for a true life of the poet as we were before his lordship undertook to edit his memoirs.

If it be not too late, we would respectfully volunteer to Lord John Russell a very simple suggestion. The stuff which yet remains in his hands must be abundant, and no doubt contains the elements of a good biographical work. The public are not solicitous for all the letters of a deceased poet, unless such letters have intrinsic value as records of noteworthy facts, or are remarkable and instructive specimens of prose composition. When Southey published the life of Cowper, and made the letters of that poet the most prominent feature of his work, he had justification for his act, for more charming epistles had never appeared in ancient or modern times, and Englishmen could not peruse them without lasting edification and delight. Southey's own letters, subsequently communicated to the world by the Laureate's son, came to us in profusion; but they also found an apology in the exquisite playfulness of their style, in the learning which they occasionally revealed, and in the fine English with which they were invariably clothed. Now, let us admire the poetry of Tom Moore as we may, it is impossible to assert that his letters—judging from the specimens already given—add anything to his fame, or very much to the information which Englishmen are anxious to obtain concerning the public life or private doings of the author of Lalla Rookh. Out of the four hundred published letters, there are positively not a dozen that communicate anything worth recording of his inner or outer self, that have reference to the current public events of his time, that teach us anything of the poet's struggles, aspirations, difficulties, and triumphs. All of them, no doubt, are full of warmth, feeling, goodness; but of such qualities all men know Moore to have been possessed, and hundreds of assurances were not required to reach our conviction on the point, especially if the unnecessary evidence could not be accompanied with some morsels of substantial knowledge and historical illustration. Simple, pleasant utterances of a man's gay spirit have no permanent interest, and weary by their frequency and repetition, even though they proceed from the bosom of a minstrel. Light, moreover, as Moore's correspondence is, we are compelled to say that it loses even what little weight legitimately belongs to it from a carelessness that is really without excuse. Three letters following upon each other's heels, but all addressed to different individuals, contain a pretty fancy about "snow, pioneers, and shovels." It was lawful enough for Moore to excite a smile by one and the same joke on the countenances of three distinct correspondents; but it is most unwise in Lord John to awaken a feeling of impatience by the reiteration of light wit upon the ears of one and the same reader. Again. If letters have no sensible substance in themselves, in the hands of a skilful editor importance may be lent to them by a line or two of connection and explanation. Not one solitary link is supplied by Lord John Russell; so that if interest is here and there by accident awakened, it expires almost as soon as born for the want of a sentence to denote the character, position, and relationship of the correspondent—the exciting cause of the writer's transient inspiration. Letter after letter is addressed to individuals of whom no mention is made throughout the volumes, except at the heads of the letters themselves.

Our suggestion is, that Lord John Russell, either with his own hand, or, if that be now too gravely employed on business of state, with the aid of a competent assistant, shall deal with the remaining letters of the poet as so much raw material for biography rather than as biography itself. Heaps of bricks are not a house; and no architect contemplates unhewn stone and rough timber with superstitious and unmeaning affection. If it be really of vital consequence to print all that a poet has prosaically written, good or bad, to the purpose or away from it, we cannot see why biographers should not go a little further, and publish a particular account of all the colds and influenzas his hero has suffered, illustrated by the prescriptions made up in order to remove them. Letters, diaries, memoranda, or whatever else the illustrious leave behind them, are sacred relics, of which the surviving trustees are bound to make the best use in the interests of society as well as of the departed. Those interests are wholly neglected when the documents are delivered over without examination, and irrespectively of the public need. What is the duty of a biographer, if it be not to discover, not only from the diaries, letters, and acknowledged writings of an author, but from every other attainable source, the true character of his subject, in order that he may present to the world, out of his own mind, a complete, truthful, and harmonious picture—a living lesson snatched from the grave, for the service of humanity to the latest time?

Space is not thrown away, and time is not lost, by emphatically calling attention to these points. On the contrary, we gladly seize the present opportunity to impress once more upon our writers the necessity of dealing with biography as with any other branch of literature and art, and of bringing to bear upon this most important department of writing the same conscientiousness and skill as are deemed indispensable in other kinds of composition. It is certainly due to Lord John Russell to state, that if he has not surpassed in efficiency the majority of our recent biographers, he has also not fallen much below them. He has stumbled, it is true, upon the same path as his predecessors, but with a better excuse, it may be, than they can show for going lazily into the old track. We are aware that Thomas Moore consigned all his papers to Lord John Russell for the benefit of his widow, and we can well understand that Lord John might consider his stewardship most satisfactorily performed when he had secured the largest possible price for his wares. Poor Tom Moore was scarcely in his grave before it was announced that the princely house of Longman had handed over to Lord John Russell 3,000*l.* for the precious papers; and we rejoiced at the increasing value of literary labor. But we can rejoice no longer if we are to be told that Messrs. Longman are "to bring themselves home" by the publication of some dozen volumes, which, interesting, in many respects, as they must be, are not called for by the public, and from which readers will not derive the information they are promised, and for which they are anxious. It will be a reflection upon editor and publisher if, after all the volumes have appeared, it shall be found—as we fear must be the case—that the poet's life actually remains to be written; and we cannot but think that even the pecuniary interests of Messrs. Longman would, so far from suffering, have been advanced, had these gentlemen taken courage to deal with the posthumous papers of Moore as the genuine and valuable ingredients of a moderately sized and perfect history, rather than as a complete and all-sufficient work in itself.

In the preface to the two volumes before us Lord J. Russell states that two embarrassments chiefly weighed upon him while preparing these papers for the press. In the first place, he was embarrassed by the fear of overloading his work with letters and anecdotes not worth preserving; and, secondly, deeming that the poet had left much to his biographer's discretion, he was visited by an anxiety "to preserve the interest of letters and of a diary written with great freedom and familiarity, at as little cost as possible to those private and hallowed feelings which ought always to be respected." Truth compels us to remark, that the amount of "embarrassment," whatever it might be, was manifestly insufficient to save his lordship from the commission of the very errors which he tried to avoid; for, not only are the two volumes, as already intimated, fearfully overladen with letters that are altogether valueless; but "private and hallowed feelings" are by no means respected to the extent that sincere piety would suggest. Had Lord John been visited with profitable compunctions, he would unquestionably have omitted from the diary much that had reference to the life of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Had he perused his documents with ordinary care he would have expunged much that bears upon the history of Thomas Moore himself. That the editor has not taken extraordinary trouble with his interesting occupation is made singularly evident by one instance of carelessness, which we strongly recommend to the notice of Messrs. Longman whenever they publish a second edition. In the second page of his autobiography written in his early manhood, Thomas Moore deliberately states that "on the 28th of May, 1779, I was born." In vol. 2, page 253, Lord John Russell writes in a note—there are not half a dozen notes in the two volumes—that "it must be recollected that Mr. Moore always supposed he was born in the year 1780."

It must be borne in mind, that although the Life of Sheridan was not published by Moore until 1825, yet, as he states in the preface to that work, the first four chapters of the life were written as far back as 1818; and it is now clear from the diary that the years 1818 and 1819 were to some extent occupied in the collection of facts and anecdotes relating to this biographical undertaking. In truth, the diary, as far as it reaches, is, for the most part, a commonplace book for the reception of Sheridaniana. Moore pays visits, makes calls, dines out mainly to collect gossip for his future publication; and the reader will not be astonished to learn that a plentiful harvest of scandal was gathered and duly garnered up in the notebook in question. We are forced to inquire whether it did not once occur to Lord John Russell that justice to the living as well as to the dead might demand the erasure of passages never, we are convinced, written down for permanent record, and only admitted at the time into the poet's diary as recollections of gossip idly dropped, though industriously picked up, at the dinner-table! Poor Sherry! Has the grave covered over, these forty years, the faults and foibles of your melancholy life, only that they may be now dragged to light again with a more offensive odor by your self-styled friends! Are there no hearts still throbbing to whom the memory of Sheridan may be dear and precious, who have "private and hallowed feelings" worthy of respect, and who may not be disposed to prove, as easily they might, the inconsistency of the idle tale writ down in the diary, with the solemn judgment pronounced by Moore himself in the published life of Richard Brinsley! The impression of Sheridan derived by the reader of Moore's diary, as Lord John Russell has suffered it to go forth to the world, unstripped of any of its light and idle gossip, is that the author of the School for Scandal was a swindler and a scoundrel. But that such was Moore's opinion of his eloquent countryman we have the best reason in the world for disbelieving — to wit, the evidence submitted by Moore himself in his life of the orator and dramatist. Those memoirs, albeit written at the time rather with the view of meeting the prepossessions of his Whig patrons than of apologizing for the frailties of the dead and defenceless man of genius, contain deliberate and frank admissions wholly incompatible with the feeling inspired by the stories that are left to blast Sheridan's memory in the diary — admissions which, if they prove anything at all, show, beyond a doubt, that although in his search for materials Moore did not hesitate to note down for remembrance every anecdote and piece of information, indifferent or good, that came in his way, yet eventually, after seven years' investigation of the whole case, he felt bound to dismiss from his mind all the calumnies that envy and hatred had engendered, and all the scandal which, unfortunately, a too lax career had provoked. Was it, we ask, for Lord John to expose in such a case as this what Moore himself had suppressed? We find it stated in the diary that "the conduct of Sheridan was of the meanest and most swindling kind," and that "his actions were one series of debauchery and libertinism." Hard measure this for poor Sheridan! Did not the memoirs, seven years subsequently, give the lie broadly to the whole assertion? Those memoirs distinctly state — we entreat Lord J. Russell at his leisure to refer to them — that, although it was only during the last few years of his life that Sheridan behaved recklessly, yet, even "amid all the distresses of these latter years, he appears but rarely to have had recourse to pecuniary assistance from friends;" they aver that, whatever may have been the faults of the man, the tremendous sufferings of his last days were more than a sufficient expiation for his sins; that his sense of what was right survived his ability to practise it; that he "always meant fairly and honorably, and that to the inevita- ble pressure of circumstances alone any failure that occurred in his engagements was to be imputed;" that, "so far from never paying his debts, as is often asserted of him, he was, in fact, always paying;" that, "his debts were by no means so considerable as has been supposed;" that he often paid a debt twice over rather than run the risk of not paying it at all; that, "if his pecuniary irregularities are to be considered in reference to the injury they inflicted upon others, the quantum of evil for which he is responsible becomes, after all, not so great;" that "one actually wonders at the unlucky management which contrived to found so extensive a reputation for bad pay upon so small an amount of debt;" that "there are few to whose kind and affectionate conduct, in some of the most interesting relations of domestic life, so many strong and honorable testimonies remain;" that, "it is impossible to regard his career otherwise than with the most charitable allowances;" and that, finally, "had he been less consistent and disinterested in his public conduct, he might have commanded the means of being independent and respectable in private — he might have died a rich apostate, instead of closing a life of patriotism in beggary — he might have hid his head in a coronet, instead of earning for it but the barren wreath of public gratitude."

We do not murmur because "noble associates," who never moved a finger to help the living, took delight in blackening the good name of the dead; but we do complain that Lord John Russell, when he met with the slanders heaped upon the head of a man who, though from the ranks, still, like himself, loved literature with the same ardor that he cherished popular rights, did not hesitate to inflict upon his memory bitter wounds. Oh, how much easier to open than to heal! One hour spent in the study of the Life of Sheridan, by Thomas Moore, would have sufficed to prove to Lord John Russell the propriety and absolute necessity of drawing his pen across the unauthenticated passages in the diary, which are fatal to the reader's good opinion of Sheridan. That hour was too much, and the present generation are, accordingly, left by his lordship, without one syllable of counsel or of warning, to believe that Richard Brinsley Sheridan was a swindler, a debauchee, and a libertine, with not one solitary redeeming virtue to raise him from the dust in which he lies.

But Moore, himself, suffers almost as much as Sheridan, from his editor's want of thought and care. The mother of the poet had a laudable ambition. She was the wife of a man who kept a small wine-store in Dublin; but she was also the mother of a lad, who, from his childhood, had exhibited remarkable ability, and her strongest passion was to raise the youth as high as she could in the social scale. Tom was placed as early as possible in the way of great people, and, we must add, the youth took to his company as cordially and easily as it took to him. It is no wonder that the larger portion of Moore's letters should be addressed to a fond mother; and it is not a matter of surprise that the greater number of these letters should be filled with childish expressions of delight and vanity at the condescension of the fine society to which the poet — because he could sing and otherwise amuse it — had found instant admittance. But it certainly is astonishing that such epistles, which could have been intended only for the mother's heart, should be now offensively thrust before the stranger's eye, which cannot choose but turn involuntarily from communications with which it has no concern, and which it can never properly appreciate. Had Lord John Russell desired to create a feeling of disgust in the minds of his readers, he could not have set about the task in a more business-like manner than by the publication of such letters as the following. We will give a brief specimen, at length; there are unfortunately dozens to match:—

Chatsworth, Jan. 25, 1815.

MY DEAREST MOTHER:—I snatch a moment from the whirl of lords and ladies I am in here, to write a scrambling line or two to you; they are all chattering at this moment about me — dukes, countesses, &c., &c. It is, to be sure, a most princely establishment, and the following are the company that sat down the first day I came:—Lord and Lady Harrowby and their daughter (he is a minister, you know), Lord and Lady Jersey, Lord and Lady Boringdon, Lord and Lady Leveson Gower, Lord and Lady Morpeth, Lord and Lady Cowper, Lord Kinriard, the Duke himself, and the poet myself, with one or two more inferior personages. I could have wished Bessy were here, but that I know she would not have been comfortable in it. She does not like any strangers, and least of all would she like such grand and mighty strangers as are assembled here.

I hope, my own dear mother, I shall find a letter at home from you, with better accounts than my father gave us in his last.

Ever your own,

TOM.

We can see the flush of maternal pride that suffuses the old lady's cheek as she reads this valuable communication for the twentieth time. We can also understand the unsatisfactory feeling with which the indulgent reader peruses it for the first. Why is it necessary to perpetuate such documents? What do they show us of the poet's life which we care to look at? What characteristic do they illustrate which we are solicitous to admire? Why should we, page after page, be annoyed when no annoyance was intended?—and why are the sacred communications of mother and child to be thrown indiscriminately before a world that makes no allowances for the extravagances of affection when it is severely appealed to as a critic and a judge?

Let no man henceforth leave his papers to the discretion of an editor, until he has prudently reduced to ashes whatever documents a decent regard to his character for consistency renders it necessary to destroy. Tom Moore is not generally a moralist, whether in his diary or in his letters; but one entry in the former is too remarkable for the distinct enunciation of a fine moral sentiment to be overlooked. The question is concerning the paternity of Scott's novels. "Another argument," writes Moore, "between us (Rogers and myself), was on the justifiableness of a man asserting solemnly that a book was not his, when it really was. I maintained that no man had a right to put himself into a situation which required lies to support him in it. Rogers quoted Paley about the expediency of occasionally lying, and mentioned extreme cases of murder, &c., which had nothing whatever to do with the point in question, and which certainly did not convince me that Scott could be at all justified in such a solemn falsehood. At last Rogers acknowledged that saying 'on his honor' was going too far; AS IF THE SIMPLE, SOLEMN ASSERTION WAS NOT EQUALLY SACRED!" We recommend Lord John to compare this stern entry in the diary with the following looser passage, from letter 218, vol. 2, p. 331. It is addressed to Mr. Power, the publisher of Moore's music:—"I have collected all the little squibs in the political way which I have written for two or three years past, and am adding a few new ones to them for publication. . . . I shall, of course, deny the trifles I am now doing; yet, if they are liked, I shall be sure to get the credit of them."

What imaginable need was there to retain either of these observations, and what, at all events, but downright madness or premeditated malice could have suggested the printing of both?

But Lord John is not content with exhibiting this single evidence of self-contradiction! He keeps back nothing likely to damage his hero. What editor but his lordship would have thought it necessary to transmit to posterity the following letter, addressed by Moore to his mother?—

There is so much call for the opera that I have made a present of it to little Power, to publish; that is, nominally, I have made a present of it, but I am to have the greater part of the profits, notwithstanding. I do it in this way, however, for two reasons,—one, that it looks more dignified, and, the second, that I do not mean to give anything more to Carpenter; yet, do not think it worth breaking with him till I have something of consequence to give Longman.

Or the following to Mr. Power!—

I told you a little fib about the Examiner, and the reason was, I had no idea it would have taken notice of what I thought a very foolish thing, and was ashamed to acknowledge even to you. That is, however, the only squib I have sent Perry since I left town.

Or the following to Mr. Longman, which puts forth an announcement quite as dishonorable—if dishonor there be at all—as Sir Walter's half-serious denial of authorship! Moore is speaking of Lalla Rookh, which is not yet completed,—

I mean, with your permission, to say in town that the work is finished; and merely withheld from publication on account of the lateness of the season. This I do in order to get rid of all the teasing wonderment of the literary quidnucs at my being so long about it, &c.

It would be easy to repeat these instances ad nauseam. But we forbear. None but the most indifferent hand would have permitted them to remain, without one syllable of comment or explanation, in the teeth of such paragraphs as those we have quoted from the diary; for, standing in their nakedness, they indicate a prevailing state of mind which we are convinced did not belong to Thomas Moore, and convey a seriousness which the writer never intended to attach to the syllables. Thomas Moore was not an habitual liar, yet we must conclude from the above gravely recorded passages that he was a hypocrite and liar both. We repeat, a very little trouble and time only were necessary to qualify the force of expressions uttered in lightness of heart, and with no disposition to deceive. But the trouble and time are not vouchsafed. Tom Moore left part of an autobiography behind him; he left piles of letters behind him; he left a huge diary behind him; and here the whole cartload is cast in a confused and undistinguished heap before us, in order that we may ourselves extract, as best we may, the jewel that lies imbedded there.

We shall humbly endeavor to perform this office. An interesting life is that of Thomas Moore, and not without its uses. It shall be our part to trace its course, for the advantage of the reader, from its origin until the period at which the present volumes leave it. Grateful as we are for the spirit in which Lord John Russell has undertaken his service of love, and eager as we are to welcome the spirit of literary brotherhood that has exhibited itself in high places, we can only lament that these volumes are less satisfactory than we know it to be in the power of Lord John Russell to have rendered them.

When Izaak Walton apologized to the reader for his life of Donne, he sought to disarm criticism by frankly avowing that, having once commenced to take notes for his undertaking, he “became like those men that enter easily into a lawsuit or a quarrel, and, having begun, cannot make a fair retreat and be quiet when they desire it.” Our more recent autobiographers have unfortunately felt no such necessity to persevere to the end of their labors. They have timidly retired from the suit before it was well commenced, and have shown no heart for the public verdict. Sir Walter Scott, born in 1771, left behind him, in an old cabinet at Abbotsford, an autobiographical sketch, which tells pleasantly enough of the writer's doings from infancy down to the year 1792, and then suddenly breaks off. Southey, the most industrious and indefatigable of scribes, whose histories are voluminous, and whose poems are endless, bravely determined, in his forty-sixth year, to write the history of his life, and went to work with a vigor and success that left nothing to be desired. Vain effort! The exquisite fragment deposits the writer at the age of fifteen in Westminster School, and there leaves him. With his own hand the door of that school is never again opened. Tom Moore, whose lively pen could not possibly have been better engaged than in the narration of his own vivacious story, seizes his quill in the prime of life, resolved to do for himself and the public what nobody can do half so well for either; and charmingly details the course of his history, from its dawn in 1779 until its noon in the year of grace 1799, cruelly leaving the afternoon, the twilight, and the black night, to be described by other and less capable hands. He, like the rest, withdraws from his great enterprise before it is fairly begun, content to add another to the many monuments of the world as expressive of the human weakness of the builders as of their ingenuity and skill.

Why is it that the hearts of these writers, which beat so stoutly at the beginning of the journey, suddenly flag even before the heat of the day has come on? Can it be simply that sunlight rests upon the distant scenes of boyhood; that memory has hoarded up the recollection of the unclouded time, and revels in it; that the spirit becomes depressed as the golden region is gradually quitted, and utterly beaten in presence of the storms which first give note of vicissitude, and indicate the struggles, the battles, and the sufferings of life? Or is it that youth, which is the season of the imagination, may lawfully be painted in the colors of fancy, while manhood must content itself with the soberer hues of reason and judgment? Or is it, after all, that when a distinguished poet or novelist describes his own childhood, he disports in a field exclusively his own, and that when he ventures upon times familiar to his contemporaries he is subdued by the knowledge that his once all-credulous listeners have suddenly become his well-informed and exacting critics? Be the explanation what it may, the fact is here. Our chief modern writers generously promise us an account of their lives, and they put us off with a meagre chapter. The rule is invariable, and admits of no exception. As certainly as they begin, so surely they stumble on the threshold. Thomas Moore tells us that he was born in Dublin on the twenty-eighth of May, 1779. He was of the humblest origin. His grandfather on his mother's side, who lived in Wexford, was engaged in the provision trade, and had something to do with weaving; but of his paternal grandfather he knew literally nothing, never having heard his name mentioned. His own father kept a small wine-store in Dublin; so that the poet is indebted to no one but himself for the celebrity he won, and for the social rank which he was not slow to attain. Humble, however, as the parents of Moore might be, his mother, at least, seems to have been possessed of talents highly serviceable to her son. In many respects she was a remarkable woman. At a very early age the child exhibited undoubted genius, and she took extraordinary pains to cultivate the gift. She sent him early to school, and at home encouraged his talents by every available means as they developed themselves. Two mistakes, in her very pardonable and amiable anxiety to advance the interests of her child, Mrs. Moore committed. She was, perhaps, too eager to force him into the society of the great, and somewhat too desirous to see him ministering to the amusement of his betters. The effect of such maternal teaching Moore, with all his admirable qualities, never thoroughly outgrew. It is manifest in his diary, and overflows in his correspondence. At every period, as we shall see, he was much too solicitous for a seat at the high tables, and for the privilege of winning approval from exclusive lips by means of his accomplishments. Before he rhymed Tom was an actor; as a mere child, he informs us, he was singled out by the master of the Dublin grammar school on days of public examination as one of the most popular and successful exhibitors in the academy. As a child, also, he put forth his first pretensions to poetry, since in the year 1789 he remembered to have written his earliest verses. No wonder that the vintner's wife felt proud of her son; more marvellous that, with all her love and pride, she did not utterly spoil the susceptible and ardent mind that submitted to her training. Indulgence, though excessive, happily stopped short of neglect of duty, or rather comprehended the performance of the very first of duties. Mrs. Moore, quick to discern that, without solid acquirements, her boy could never retain the popularity won by his histrionic and other feats, evinced the greatest solicitude to promote his school studies. She herself examined him daily in his lessons, and was vigilant to note his progress. Some curious instances of her affectionate zeal Moore records. On more than one occasion, when the lad had gone to bed, the mother being away from home, the latter would take care to visit the bedside on her return, and, waking up the sleeper, induce him to repeat the lessons he had prepared for the following day. Moore, who, to his last hour, loved his mother with a fine and manly affection, vividly remembered in his age how cheerfully and happily he had obeyed in his childhood the mother's nocturnal summons, and how peacefully he slept after pleasing her with the performance of his task.

A third faculty made itself evident. While still a child Moore discovered a taste for music, as well as for recitation and poetic composition. The mother, quick to make the most of the talent, possessed herself of an old harpsichord, employed a youth, who was in the service of a tuner in the neighborhood, to give her son instruction, and encouraged the child — as was her wont — to exhibit his musical powers to all her visitors — his taste for singing corresponding with his passion for music. In due time, by dint of great economy, the good lady contrived to save money enough to exchange the old harpsichord for a new pianoforte; pleasant gatherings then took place in the private apartments of the wine-store, at which, after supper, the song went round, and little Tom would give, with general applause, the best of Dibdin's songs, while his mother delighted all listeners with such approved ditties as "How sweet in the woodlands!"

But, as before stated, the main object of a useful life was still paramount in the sensible mother's mind. In 1793, when Tom was fourteen years old, an act of enfranchisement was passed which enabled Roman Catholics thenceforward to enter the University and to go to the bar, and Mrs. Moore resolved at once that her boy should receive such an education as would enable him to distinguish himself in the profession of the law. In the Dublin school there was a Latin usher. Mrs. Moore, in pursuance of her system, loaded this teacher with civilities, invited him to her house, and induced him, by other acts of kindness, to regard his pupil with somewhat of the affection she felt for her son. The consequence of this excusable diplomacy was the rapid advance of Tom not only in the learned languages, but in all the other studies of the school. He was well prepared when he entered Trinity College, in 1794, a year after his first printed poem had been published in the Anthologia Hibernica, in the form of "Verses to Zelia, on her charging the author with writing too much on love."

At the University Tom followed the bent of his genius; he worked steadily, acquiring knowledge, and occasionally wrote poetry for the gratification of his mother and the wonder of her acquaintance. His college companions were the ardent spirits of the time, and his best beloved friends those who were most deeply implicated in revolutionary designs. It is well for Moore that he contrived to escape the subsequent fate of his less fortunate companions; there can be little doubt that but for the strong maternal injunctions, and his own good sense, his excitable soul must have been drawn into the troubles that proved so fatal to his fellows. Once only he identified himself with the Irish conspirators by contributing a letter to the columns of their organ; but the horror of his mother at the discovery of his rashness was sufficient to arrest the pen forever afterwards. Better employment was that found by Moore in Marsh's library, to which, through his acquaintance with the son of the librarian, our student obtained admittance during the months it was closed to the public, and where, by hunting through the old bookshelves, he tells us he acquired "much of the odd, out-of-the-way sort of reading, that may be found scattered through some of his earlier works." It was here that he accumulated notes for the work upon which, at a very early period of his academical career, he had set his heart — namely, the translation of the whole of the odes attributed to Anacreon.

While Moore was thus occupied in the legitimate studies of the University his sensible mother continued her exertions on his behalf out of doors. It was necessary that he should read French, and the indefatigable lady accordingly procured the services of a French refugee, who, like, all the teachers of the youthful poet, was forthwith made a friend of the house, and a partaker of the family cheer. In the course of five months Tom made rapid progress under the hands of the kindly treated and grateful M. La Fosse.

Moore was nineteen years old when he took his degree. At this period he had made considerable advance in his Anacreon, and he ventured to hope that he might obtain for it a classical premium from the University. The Provost, however, shook his head solemnly at the amatory and convivial production, and Moore was fain to reserve his translation for a more extended audience. He looked towards London. The scholastic apprenticeship over, it was time to begin the battle. The lad was to be entered at the Temple, and then to help himself on as best he might. Slender was the purse which the adventurer carried with him to the great city. The family resources were scanty at the best, and the boy's inevitable expenses proved a serious drain. But every penny was joyfully scraped together, and the loving and dutiful son went forth. Part of the small sum which he carried with him was in guineas, and these the solicitous mother carefully sewed up in the waistband of his pantaloons. Sewed up in another part of his clothes was a soapula, or small bit of cloth—an unfailing remedy against all harm—duly blessed by the priest. Fortified by this, by his devoted mother's prayers, and by his own consciousness of power, he first trod the streets of London.

London was a dangerous scene for so warm a nature as that of the young candidate for its applause. From his very childhood Moore had lived in gay society, had been flattered for his acting, for his singing, and for his own original songs. His mother had made him what is called “a show child,” and perfect success had attended all his exhibitions. Still, Moore was protected from the most baneful kind of dissipation by two fortunate circumstances. From the commencement of his musical displays he had accompanied himself on the pianoforte, so that he had become absolutely dependent upon his instrument, even in his convivial songs. This fact, and his natural disposition, which induced him always to prefer the society of women to that of men, constituted his best defence against the coarser seductions of the metropolis, and no doubt preserved the refinement of his mind. Arrived in London, introductions to the best people were easy. In Ireland the lad had mixed, much to his mother's satisfaction, familiarly in society from which she and her husband were, of course, rigidly excluded. From his Irish friends and patrons letters were taken, and, although young Moore had no better lodgings than “a front room up two-pair of stairs at No. 44, George-street, Portman-square, for which he paid six shillings a week,” and although he lived with all the economy his affection for the dear ones at home induced him to exercise, he stepped at once into high regions, secured his footing, and remained there welcome to the last.

The first visit to the metropolis must have been a brief one, for, after going through the forms of initiation at the Temple, and arranging with Stockdale, of Piccadilly, for the publication of Anacreon, Moore made the best of his way back to his “dear Dublin home.” Not, however, to remain.

It was (Moore writes himself) on my next visit to England, that having, through the medium of another of my earliest and kindest friends, Joe Atkinson, been introduced to Lord Moira, I was invited to pay a visit to Donington-park, on my way to London. This was, of course, at that time, a great event in my life, and among the most vivid of my early English recollections is that of my first night at Donington, when Lord Moira, with that high courtesy for which he was remarkable, lighted me himself to my bedroom; and there was this stately personage, stalking on before me through the long lighted gallery, bearing in his hand my bed candle, which he delivered to me at the door of my apartment.

With this fine historical picture of the great Lord Moira lighting the little poet to his magnificent bed at Donington, we grieve to say the brief autobiography closes. No doubt the imaginative youth had dreams that night as rich and Oriental as his own perfumed Eastern tale. What wonder that, falling gratefully and sweetly to sleep upon his silken pillow, oblivious of wine-stores and London booksellers and coming struggles, the blissful poet should be loath to rouse himself again! We are remorseless, and must wake him.

Brilliant, indeed, were the prospects of Tom Moore when he quitted Donington for London, and said “Good by” to Lord Moira, only to say “How do you do?” to the Prince of Wales. Anacreon was to be published by subscription: numberless were the fine people who subscribed for the work, and, to crown all, George, Prince of Wales, consented, in person, to receive the dedication. The affability of the said George towards the young songster was overwhelming, and one only marvels that Tom could have found the heart at any time to satirize his once gracious patron. “I was yesterday,” writes the lad of twenty-one,

Introduced to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. He is, beyond doubt, a man of very fascinating manners. When I was presented to him, he said he was very happy to know a man of my abilities; and when I thanked him for the honor he did me in permitting the dedication of Anacreon, he stopped me, and said the honor was entirely his, in being allowed to put his name to a work of such merit. He then said that he hoped, when he returned to town in the winter, we should have many opportunities of enjoying each other's society; that he was passionately fond of music, and had long heard of my talents in that way. Is not all this very fine?"

Fine! It is superb. But familiarity increases. A few months afterwards prince and poet meet at a ball. The salutation was, "How do you do, Moore? I am glad to see you;" just as Tom's father would have said to the vintner over the way. And the thing goes on! Tom on one occasion has only time to write a few lines to his mother. But what lines they are—every one a volume in itself!—

The prince was extremely kind to me last night at a small supper party at which I met him; every one noticed the cordiality with which he spoke to me. His words were these:—"I am very glad to see you here again, Moore. From the reports I have heard I was afraid we had lost you. I assure you"—laying his hand on my shoulder at the same time—"it was a subject of general concern." Could anything be more flattering? I must say I felt rather happy at that moment.

If Moore did not feel not only happy, but supremely blest, during the whole of his early London career, he was not the lad we think him. Never was aspirant for public favor so fêted and caressed. Never had the deliberate plans of a fond mother been crowned so speedily with the most triumphant success! We literally envy the feelings with which the absorbed lady must have contemplated letter after letter, all bearing witness to the value of her early arrangements and to the marvellous wisdom of her educational system. Tom has hardly a shirt to his back, yet the great world lies at his feet. We call the reader's attention to the following proofs, gathered at random from the letters:—January 27, 1801.—"What do you think? Lord Moira, who came to town but yesterday, called on me in person to-day, and left his card: is not this excellent?" March 1st.—"Last night I had six invitations. Everything goes on swimmingly with me. I dined with the Bishop of Meath on Friday last, and went to a party at Mrs. Crewe's in the evening." By the 6th of March, things have got to such a height that there is not a single night for which the young Irishman has not three invitations, but he "takes Hammersley's advice, and sends showers of apologies." On the 4th of March Lady Harrington had sent her servant after the lad to two or three places, with a ticket for the "Ancient Music," which is the King's concert, and which is so select that those "who go to it ought to have been at court before." Lady Harrington had got the ticket from one of the princesses, and her ladyship's servant never rested until he had discovered the general favorite and deposited the precious talisman in his hands. "You may be assured I hurried home and dressed for the 'Ancient Music' immediately." March 24th.—"What do you think? Young Lord Forbes and another young nobleman dine with me to-morrow. This was a thing put on me, and I shall do it with a good grace." June 16th.—"Lord Moira goes a great round out of his way to set the lad down "at Sir Watkin's, from Mrs. Duff's, where we met a large rout." The new year begins quite as splendidly as the old year goes out. January 30, 1802.—"I go this evening to a Blue Stocking supper, at Lady Mount-Edgcombe's: it is the first this season, and I shall be initiated. I met all my old fashionable friends at a rout last night, the opening of the season; three hundred people." A year's experience, and Tom gives himself airs. March 4, 1802, just one twelvemonth after Lady Harrington's servant had rushed through the town after Moore with the "Ancient Music" ticket in his hand, our young gentleman assumes the style and language of his set. "The people!" the young coxcomb writes to the vintner's lady, whose head must really have become bewildered by this time, "the people will not let me stay at home as much as I wish, and I sometimes wish all the duchesses and marchionesses chez le diable!" Have we no painter who will draw, for the next exhibition, good Mrs. Moore spelling this epistle to her friends in the small drawing-room of Aungier-street, No. 12, at the corner of Little Longford-street, Dublin?

We can afford space for only two more extracts; but these will speak for all the rest. On the 2d of June, 1802, Moore writes to his mother an account of one day's occupations:—"I breakfasted with the Lord Mayor, dined with Lord Moira, and went in the evening to Mrs. Butler's, the Duchess of Athol's, Lady Mount-Edgcombe's and Lady Call's, which was a ball, where I danced till five o'clock in the morning." On the 17th of April following he gives her to understand that "there are no less than three families about this country who are teasing me to spend the spring at their houses." The lucky litterateur monopolizes the favor of country as of town!

of the present time! We admit that duchesses and marchionesses do not plague you with invitations until you are forced to wish the inviters chez le diable. We grant that no countess' lacqueys are seeking you in all the haunts of fashion in order to conduct you to places still more select. We will take your word for it that great lords do not earn honor by lighting you to your couch, and that royal princes do not lean on your shoulder while they assure you that your temporary absence from the metropolis has been "a subject of general concern;" but we entreat you never to forget that the great among us are traffickers of their favors, as the small are dealers in the commodities by which they live. One acknowledgment creeps out again and again in the dazzling epistles of Thomas Moore. If honor is conferred upon him, he communicates still more delight to the givers. With the same breath that he announces having dined with the Bishop of Meath he states that "his songs have taken such a rage; even surpassing what they did in Dublin." While he makes a vaunt of shaking hands with the prince at Lady Harrington's supper, he also boasts that at that supper prince and lady, hostess and guests, are charmed beyond expression with his displays. "Monk Lewis," he writes, "was 'in the greatest agonies' the other night at Lady Donegall's, at having come in after my songs. 'Pon his honor, he had come for the express purpose of hearing me.'" As time wore on, Moore himself became gradually aware of the tacit understanding that existed between him and his magnificent entertainers. Whatever may have been his first impressions, he was obliged to learn at last that the favors dispensed to him were matters of sale and bargain, just as if he had received them like so much gold over the counter. Although Moore sang exquisitely, and with a pathos and expression that cannot be understood by those who were not privileged to hear him, yet, being a scholar and a gentleman, it was impossible to hire him like an opera singer. Aristocratic countenance was more precious to the poet in his youth than any other coin, and for such countenance he sold to earthly buyers his heavenly gifts. How, as he grew older, he grew also weary of the hollow and barren remuneration, we gather from more than one significant passage in his letters. "It is strange," he once pathetically writes to his mother, "that people who value the silk so much should not feed the poor worm who wastes himself in spinning it out to them." Five years after penning these syllables he writes to the same correspondent: "I have often said I was careless about the attractions of gay society, but I think, for the first time, I begin to feel really so. I pass through the rows of fine carriages in Bond-street without the slightest impatience to renew my acquaintance with those inside of them." The feeling of equanimity was, however, less fixed in the bosom of the ardent poet than it appears to have been in the breasts of his patrons. He continued to minister to the enjoyments of the great until it pleased God to darken his fine intellect, and to render him unconscious equally of the good and the evil of this world. The great forgot him utterly before he died; for at his grave there stood of them all not one solitary representative, even to mourn the loss of the music that had once lent such enchantment to their halls.

In his youth Moore justly looked for advancement from his princely entertainers. The majority of them were men of mark, of influence, and of power. He was poor; and, beyond the necessity he felt for providing as securely as possible for his own maintenance, he had always a commendable anxiety to administer to the wants and comforts of those at home, who had sacrificed already so largely for him. He was well-informed — a scholar — a poet. If patronage should fall to his aristocratic friends he was willing to receive his fair share of the goods of fortune. One piece of patronage came in his way in 1803, at which, for a moment, he was ready to clutch, although a minute afterwards he as eagerly rejected it. We learn dimly from a letter, dated May 20, 1803 — which, as usual, is left to tell its own tale darkly without one line of comment from the editor — that the poet laureateship was at this time offered to Moore in a manner that "would disgust any man with the least spirit of independence about him" — that poor Tom, thinking his parents were in immediate want of money, instantly accepted it nevertheless, and then, hearing that his father had no instant necessity for assistance, threw the situation up after enclosing an "Ode for the Birthday," written in desolation of heart, we presume, by command of the authorities.

Three months afterwards a more inviting prospect opened. On the 7th of August, Moore, being on a visit to Lord Moira at Donington, is informed by that important personage that Tierney had offered him the gift of a place which government had left at his (Tierney's) disposal, and now Lord Moira offered it to Moore. Tom, knowing whose heart the intelligence will chiefly delight, writes off to his mother at once:—"It must be something far from contemptible, as Lord M. told me in confidence Tierney was under obligations to him, and that this was the first opportunity he had of in any manner repaying them." Moore is only twenty-four, and his fortune is made outright. There is only one drawback to his otherwise unqualified satisfaction. The gold-mine is far off,—neither in England nor in Ireland, but across the seas. Well, what matter? An appointment which the government gives to Tierney, and which Tierney gives to Lord Moira to wipe off obligations, and which Lord Moira gives to Moore as a high mark of favor, must surely be considerable enough to enable the whole Moore family to emigrate together. So Tom thinks, and so he writes to his mother. Mr. Moore, senior, is full of becoming gratitude and approval. "For his particular part, he thinks, with his son, that there is a singular chance, as well as a special interference of Providence in getting so honorable a situation at this very critical time." Tom goes to town from Donington with a letter from Lord Moira to Mr. Tierney, and is informed that the valuable office is as distant as Bermuda, and that the duties of the poet will be those of a registrar—to examine all the skippers, mates and seamen, who are produced as witnesses in the causes of captured vessels. Still Moore consoles himself. He "finds Bermuda is a place where physicians order their patients when no other air will keep them alive;"—how tempting a spot for a lively young gentleman, carolling from morning till night in the silken lap of London fashion! Well! within a month of his appointment Moore sails. He reaches America on his way. The business-like character of the whole proceeding peeps out in a letter addressed by Moore to his mother from Norfolk, Virginia, Dec. 2, 1803:—"It is extraordinary," he writes, "that I cannot, even here, acquire any accurate information with respect to the profits of my registrarship." The ladies cry when Tom leaves America, and say "they never parted with any one so reluctantly;" but depart he must, if only to ascertain the value of the appointment given by Mr. Tierney to wipe out "obligations." The registrar reaches Bermuda, and on the 19th of January, 1804, just four months after Moore sailed from Portsmouth, he writes home thus:—"Dear mother, I shall tell you at once that it is not worth my while to remain here. I shall just stop to finish my work for Carpenter (the London publisher), which will occupy me till the spring months come in, when the passages home are always delightfully pleasant, and then I shall get upon the wing to see my dear friends once more." Before the year is out Tom, thoroughly disgusted with his occupation, is again on British shores. But, like a prudent young gentleman, he takes steps, both in Bermuda and at home, for securing his future welfare. "I have no doubt," he writes to his mother after his return, "that my situation at Bermuda will turn out something for me; the men I have appointed are of the most respectable in the island." And as to his own employments, Lord Moira, of course, will take care of them. "He assured me in the kindest manner that he had not for an instant lost sight of me. He could now give me a situation immediately, but it would require residence abroad, and he added, 'We must not banish you to a foreign garrison.' I answered, 'that as to occupations, I was ready to undertake any kind of business whatever.' 'Yes,' says he, 'but we must find that business at home for you.'"

Two words of comment upon the above interesting paragraph before we stop. The "respectable" deputy whom Moore left to do his work in Bermuda turned out a scoundrel, and all but ruined his principal; and Lord Moira, oppressed with dignities himself, never once raised a finger to help the sanguine client who had unwisely built upon his lordly promises.

Tom Moore was always a Liberal. He began life, as we have seen, the sympathizing companion of the ill-fated conspirators of Trinity College, Dublin, and he continued to the last an adherent of the school of which his present noble biographer must now be accounted the head. The poet was, however, too much petted by the great families to keep his liberality as fresh and wholesome as it might have been. Tom was a Liberal and something less. He had popular views with a decidedly aristocratic bias. He was a man of the people, initiated into the rites by a sprinkling of rose-water. No man living could be more offended at Tory jobbery than Tom Moore; yet he, alas! on the very first opportunity, took, as we have read, a situation from the government, performed its duties for a month or two, and then quitted his post forever, leaving behind him a deputy, about whom he made no further inquiries until the victims of the said deputy's misconduct thought proper to make the most urgent inquiries respecting him, Thomas Moore, the principal. The immediate fruit of the Bermuda trip was the publication in the early spring of 1806 of Epistle, Odes, and other Poems, dedicated to "Francis, Earl of Moira, General in His Majesty's forces, Master-General of the Ordnance, Constable of the Tower, &c.," and it is amusing enough to compare the sublime inscription with the preface that immediately follows it, and with the accents of disgust at Lord Moira's subsequent neglect, which reveal themselves in the correspondence, and to which we shall hereafter have occasion more particularly to refer. It was impossible to panegyrize Lord Moira, wrote Tom in the dedication, because, as an honest Spartan once said of Hercules, no one had ever thought of blaming him. It was very much easier to abuse the Americans in the preface, because, we presume, no classic authority had in their case ever furnished a precedent for withholding censure. It is not to be wondered that Moore, passing from the dazzling scenes of London fashion, in which he had reason to believe himself idolized, should have been struck and amazed by the fierce and resolute aspect of masculine life that suddenly encountered him in the United States; but we must express some concern when we find the friend of Emmet, the admirer of Fitzgerald, and the sympathizer with struggling freedom in every land, affecting to be shocked with "the rude familiarity of the lower orders in America," with "the unpolished state of society in general," and to believe that because the hardy Republicans were in 1806—not quite thirty years after independence had been won—"still remote from the elegant characteristics of freedom, every sanguine hope of the future energy and greatness of America" must immediately be repressed. Had Moore acquired his liberal creed in the depths, and not in the heights, of London society, he would not so readily have despaired of a country too intent at the time upon the daily business of life to bestow even a passing thought upon its silken frivolities.

The impression which the mind of Moore "received from the character and manner of these Republicans" suggested the chief epistles found in the volumes of which we speak. But the publication contained, also, poems of a very different order. If we do not mistake, Moore, in the last edition of his collected works, separated the transatlantic sketches from the other verses, and gave to the "Epistles and Odes" the new title of Poems relating to America. But in the original edition the labors of Juvenal were frequently relieved by the strains of Catullus, and it is by no means certain that the ingenuous youth of 1806 did not take quite as much harm from the poet's amorous suggestions as they derived profit from his more sonorous anti-Republican couplets. To the abuse which Moore received on account of the lighter compositions we are happily indebted for the most interesting chapter in the poet's posthumous publication—an inimitable chapter, for the sake of which we willingly pardon the shortcomings of all the rest. Many solemn and instructive discourses have been written against the bloody practice of duelling; but we question whether any treatise ever published is so calculated to convince mankind of the utter absurdity of the unholy custom as Moore's simple narrative of his warlike meeting with Jeffrey, who had openly declared in the Edinburgh Review, that "Thomas Moore, in his Epistles and Odes, had made a deliberate attempt to corrupt the minds of his readers."

Moore was twenty-seven years old at the time—an Irishman and a very fine gentleman, as we must all admit. The month was July, and he had just "come up to London from a visit to Donington Park, having promised my dear and most kind friend, the late Dowager Lady Donegal, to join her and her sister at Worthing." To Worthing he went, and put up at the inn; and there, in bed, the book with the blue and yellow cover reached him, containing the attack. The first impulse of the offended poet was to hasten to Edinburgh, and to demand satisfaction on the very spot where the insult had been offered. One contemptible but also very serious obstacle prevented this design from being carried out. The knight had not money enough to pay the journey. In fact, the emptiness of Moore's pockets, and his magnificent mode of life in spite of it, give to his portrait a fine Rembrandt effect on all occasions. We remember that when he was first introduced to the Prince of Wales we were very nearly losing the important ceremony altogether, simply because Tom's coat had "grown confoundedly shabby;" and he had not money enough to buy another. What would have happened if a speculative tailor had not consented to make a new coat for two guineas and an old one, we fear to think. In the midst of his fashionable whirl we find him praying that his poems may sell fast enough to enable him to buy a few necessary shirts and cravats; and he makes protracted visits to great houses, where he stays "much longer than he wished or intended, simply from not having a shilling in his pockets to give the servants on going away," being forced at last to beg the necessary gratuity as a temporary loan from his publisher in town. But to the duel. Not being able to travel to Edinburgh, the angry poet goes moodily to London, and there, as the fates contrive, Jeffrey arrives at the very same time. Moore writes to a friend to join him in town as soon as possible, and tells the reason why. The friend is a sensible man, and will not stir. Tom has then recourse to another, who, not being sensible, undertakes his delicate mission. Tom provided him with his credentials. The "friend" was to be the bearer of a letter to Mr. Jeffrey containing the reviewer's imputations, and the following unmistakable reply to them by Moore himself:—

You are a liar; yes, sir, a liar; and I choose to adopt this harsh and vulgar mode of defiance in order to prevent at once all equivocation between us, and to compel you to adopt, for your own satisfaction, that alternative which you might otherwise have hesitated in affording to mine.

The satisfaction required by the fiery little man was, the reader will allow, that of a "gentleman;" but the language in which it was demanded is decidedly that of a vintner. Poor Mr. Jeffrey, fifty years ago, had but one course to take. He referred Moore's friend to his own friend (Mr. Horner); arrangements for mortal combat were instantly made, and the meeting was fixed for the following morning at Chalk Farm. Moore dined alone on the preceding evening, and after his meal went forth and purchased, at a shop in Bond street, powder and bullets enough for a score of duels. This business done, and the pistols secured, he proceeded to a friend's house, and there, in order to avoid suspicion, passed the night.

Tom slept pretty well, and the morning dawned. His friend, Mr. Hume (not Joseph), had taken care to provide a surgeon, and in good time both were on the ground. Jeffrey and his party were, however, before them. The Edinburgh reviewer was not only accompanied by his second, but by a group of anxious friends, who hovered uneasily about the spot, miserable on his account. Moore and Jeffrey met face to face. They had never seen each other before, and they might never see each other again. Dreadful moment! Jeffrey "was standing with the bag which contained the pistols in his hand, while Horner was looking anxiously around."

A few minutes more and the preliminaries were arranged. Horner thought he detected some suspicious-looking fellows lurking about the farm; but they vanished, and he prepared for the horrible business. A snug place for the intended butchery was found, in front of some large trees, and behind these Hume and Horner retired to load the deadly instruments, leaving Jeffrey and Moore together.

What could the two creatures do, thus left to amuse each other, and so capable of affording mutual entertainment? Both were men of ardent imagination, of strong feelings and generous impulses; the time was an exciting one; and it would have been strange indeed if they had permitted the solemn character of their meeting to interfere at all with the current of their kindly natures. "We, of course," writes Moore—

Had bowed to each other on meeting; but the first words I recollect to have passed between us was Jeffrey's saying, on our being left together, "What a beautiful morning it is!" "Yes," I answered with a slight smile, "a morning made for better purposes;" to which his only response was a sort of assenting sigh. As our assistants were not, any more than ourselves, very expert at warlike matters, they were rather slow in their proceedings; and as Jeffrey and I walked up and down together we came once in sight of their operations; upon which I related to him, as rather à propos to the purpose, what Billy Egan, the Irish barrister, once said, when, as he was sauntering about in like manner while the pistols were loading, his antagonist, a fiery little fellow, called out to him angrily to keep his ground, "Don't make yourself uneasy, my dear fellow," said Egan; "sure, isn't it bad enough to take the dose without being by at the mixing up?"

Jeffrey had scarcely time to give a sickly smile at the story before the two seconds issued forth, placed their men, and deposited the weapons in their hands. The friends retired—the pistols were raised—blood was about to flow—rivers of ink were about to be spared, when some police officers, at a given signal, rushed out from behind the trees, knocked the pistols into the next field, seized the combatants, conducted them to their carriages, and, acting in the interests of humanity and the booksellers, conveyed them instantly to Bow street. One important fact was elicited by Moore on the way. Poor Horner, who knew nothing about pistols, had asked Hume to load both weapons, and Hume had accordingly performed the two operations.

Arrived at Bow street, all the offenders were shown into a sitting-room, while messengers were despatched for "bail." The police officers, supposing that dire malignity burnt in the bosoms of the antagonists, offered to separate them; but they had taken an enormous fancy to each other on the field, and desired nothing so much as to continue the interrupted discourse. Every man has experienced the gush of pleasant emotion that follows upon escape from visible and imminent danger. It overflowed in the breast of the released and happy Jeffrey. Fluent at all times, he became voluble at Bow street, and fairly charmed his new-found friend by "dressing his subjects out in every variety of array that an ever rich and ready wardrobe of phraseology could supply." The bail being forthcoming, the culprits were free to depart; but before they could do so another cause of detention had arisen. On examining the pistols it was found that Moore's had a bullet in it, but in Jeffrey's there was none. It was a horrible discovery; for had not Hume, Moore's second, confided to his principal on his way to Bow street the important secret that with his own hand he had loaded both? Fortunately for all parties, Horner had seen Hume put the bullet into Jeffrey's pistol—the lead had, no doubt, fallen out of the pistol into the field; explanations were deemed satisfactory, and Moore and Jeffrey became fast friends forever. The worst that happened was, that the newspapers of the day cruelly announced that "in the pistol of one of the parties a pellet was found, and nothing at all in the pistol of the other," and that Moore had to burn a series of sentimental effusions which he had written, to be delivered to some of his aristocratic friends in the event of his being left dead at Chalk Farm.

In April, 1807, Moore's friends were out of office, and he was miserable in consequence. He had not yet perfect faith in himself, but hung ignobly at the skirts of the great, literally singing his best in order to induce the powerful to drop their superfluous crumbs into his basket. It was a fruitless effort, as it deserved to be. For why should genius such as his sell itself for dross? The majority of Moore's letters in 1807 are dated "Donington Park;" but the burden of them is still mournful enough in spite of the locality. "I am made very comfortable," he writes, "but the main point is still wanting—il me donne des manchettes"—he is speaking of Lord Moira—"et je n'ai point de chemise." In 1807 the publication of the Irish Melodies commenced. In 1808 Moore magnified the offence he had already committed in the volumes of Epistles, Odes, &c., by publishing, under the name of Thomas Little, a collection of verses, the best apology for which is "that they were all productions of an age when the passions very often give a coloring too warm to the imagination." In 1811 the poet took a desperate step, and—married. This certainly not unimportant fact in the poet's life is communicated to the reader en passant at the foot of the page, and not another syllable is said on the subject. "Mr. Moore," writes Lord John Russell in a note, "was married to Miss Dyke on March 25, 1811, at St. Martin's church, in London." His lordship might have written as much had he been editing the life and correspondence of Bowles, of Rogers, or of any other man of Moore's acquaintance. Do we complain unreasonably when we assert that greater dereliction of editorial duty never was committed than in such instances as this? The wife of Thomas Moore proved a solace, a support, and a joy to her husband throughout his life—his best and fondest companion in the days of his strength—a priceless comforter in the time of calamity and during the last hours of mental gloom. She survives her illustrious partner, and merits something more than the mere record which Lord John Russell would surely have vouchsafed to Moore's merest acquaintance. There was the greater reason for a few words of explanatory comment, inasmuch as the very letter that follows the editor's announcement of Moore's marriage contains a suspicion avowed by the poet, that his choice had not proved agreeable to his humble parents, who, up to this very time, had been sharers in the small earnings of their gifted son. What marriage can this be, upon which the vintner and his wife look coldly and without the cordiality and interest which they owe to their child and benefactor? We refer for an answer to the biographer, who should be the best vindicator of his friend's memory, and his lips are sealed. We are sorry to say that we can find a better reason for old Mr. Moore's coldness than for Lord John Russell's silence. Tom had taken unto himself a girl after his own heart, but without a penny in her pocket. No wonder that the old couple, who had looked for a countess at least for their distinguished and much flattered boy, and who had regularly received a portion of his scanty gains, should have taken alarm at the step which threatened to cut off the supplies, and which decided forever—as marriage does decide—the social position of the newly-married pair. It is due to Moore to say that such alarm was not suffered to exist for an instant in the minds of his parents, for he writes off at once, bidding them rely upon him for the future, and to draw immediately upon his publishers for money if they stand in need of present assistance. We are loath to search for reasons for neglect of duty in one particular when the whole publication before us exhibits negligence of no common order; but when we remember how much space is generally devoted by biographers to prove the creditable descents of their heroines and heroes, we cannot but suspect that, had Mrs. Moore belonged to any one of the families whom Moore delighted to honor, we should have had from Lord John Russell something more than the brief and, because brief, disparaging notice of the poet's marriage with a lady who was only a stage dancer, although remarkable for her beauty and esteemed for her virtues.

In due time a little girl is born to Moore, and the natural anxieties of a parent warn him of the necessity of buckling on his armor manfully for the fight of life. He has wealth within him if he will but turn his gaze inward and withdraw it utterly from the gewgaws which have hitherto dazzled his eyes only to mislead his judgment. In 1812 glimpses of his duty come to him.

Thirteen years have elapsed since the eventful evening when Lord Moira lighted him to his couch, and substantial aid from that high quarter is still as far off as ever. His lordship is still excluded from power, and in that fact—

I see an end (writes Moore) to the long hope of my life. My intention is to go far away into the country, there to devote the remainder of my life to the dear circle I am forming around me, to the quiet pursuit of literature, and, I hope, of goodness.

He repeats the manly and becoming determination to another correspondent,—

The truth is (he says), I feel as if a load were taken off me by this final termination to all the hope and suspense which the prospect of Lord Moira's advancement has kept me in for so many years. It has been a sort of Will-o'-the-wisp to me all my life, and the only thing I regret is that it was not extinguished earlier, for it has led me a sad dance. My intention now is to live in the country upon the earnings of my brains, and to be as happy as love, literature and liberty can make me; and, though I shall have but few to talk to me, I will try to make many talk of me.

It was a wise resolve, and the poet acted bravely upon the suggestions of his better genius. He hired a small cottage at Kegworth, in Leicestershire, at no great distance from Castle Donington—a vicinity to be valued for the sake of a good library, if for no other reason—entered into an agreement with the Messrs. Power, of London, the publishers of his songs, in virtue of which he was to receive 500*l.* a year for the space of seven years—and from time to time to send forth into the world from his happy retreat those exquisite strains which will render the name of Moore famous wherever music enchants and the perfect language of song can find its way to the human heart. Now and then the modest retirement of the cottage was exchanged for magnificent visits to the castle itself, and then, you may be sure, the felicity of Tom was at its height. Hear the poor fellow when he writes to his mother, after having accompanied his "sweet Bessy" for a drive in one of my lord's own carriages!—

I think (he says), it would have pleased you to see my wife in one of Lord Moira's carriages, with his servant riding after her, and Lady London's crimson travelling cloak round her to keep her comfortable. It is a glorious triumph of good conduct on both sides, and makes my heart happier and prouder than all the best worldly connexions could possibly have done. The dear girl and I sometimes look at each other with astonishment in our splendid room here, and she says she is quite sure it must be all a dream.

And who shall say that the lady was wrong! Do men never "dream" with eyes wide open and in the glaring sun? When Thomas Moore first fell asleep on his downy pillow at Donington he did not dream more wildly and unmeaningly than when in that same coroneted carriage he built his airy castles, imagining himself the proud possessor of honors which no more belonged to him than "Lady Loudon's crimson travelling cloak" was the lawful goods of Bessy.

On the 11th of May, 1812, Mr. Perceval, the prime minister, was assassinated in the lobby of the House of Commons. Shortly before this event, Tom Moore, being on a visit to Lord Moira, was taken aside by that nobleman and politely asked about the state of his pecuniary affairs. Tom replied that he had "every prospect of being comfortable;" whereupon his lordship added,—"I merely inquired with respect to any present exigence, as I have no doubt there will soon be a change of politics which will set us all on our legs." It was an injudicious speech to a son of the Muses, who had just made up his mind to be "as happy as love, literature and liberty" could make him in a cottage; but Tom confesses it "was very pleasant, as being a renewal of his pledge to me, though I fear the change he alludes to is further off than he thinks." Moore is mistaken. As far as Lord Moira is concerned there is "change," and that speedily. It is true, that upon the death of Perceval, the Regent contrived, through the intractability of the Whigs, to retain the old Tory ministers; but it is also true that Lord Moira, before the year was out, agreed to take office under his political opponents, and to go to India as Governor-General. The news reached Tom in his retirement at Kegworth, and "the quiet pursuit of literature" was again temporarily forsaken for that "Will-o'-the-wisp" which had already made its victim dance so much and to so little purpose.

The curtain rises upon the last act of Tom's instructive drama of Ambition. Like all last acts, the interest accumulates at every step, and the dénouement contains a striking moral. The moment Moore hears that his noble patron is "on his legs" he feels his own limbs stronger and prepares to walk. His earliest letters after Lord Moira's promotion show the spirit of a man who has all the Indian appointments at his feet, and is rather puzzled as to the office which shall enjoy the honor of selection. "It must be something very tempting indeed," he loftily writes, "which would take me so far from all I have hitherto loved and cultivated. He could, of course, get me something at home by exchange of patronage; but I cannot brook the idea of taking anything under the present men, and, therefore, it will be either India or nothing with me." Fortunate poet, who could thus look down upon a whole administration and carve his honors for himself! Tom is calmly waiting "to be sent for" when a letter reaches him. The postmark is London, and the cover has the well-known signature of "Moira" in the corner. Ah, faithful found among the faithless! It is the order, no doubt, to prepare. "Love, literature and liberty" must, alas! be given up at the bidding of our country, and the tranquillity of Kegworth exchanged for the blazing heat of Calcutta. It is "India or nothing." Tom opens the letter and finds—"nothing." Not a single word does it convey about Moore or his expectations; but an elaborate explanation is given of the reasons why Lord Moira himself accepted his appointment from the existing administration. "I cannot but think it very singular," writes the innocent poet, "that after the renewed pledges and promises he made me so late at the last time he was here, he should not give the remotest hint of either an intention, or even a wish, to do anything for me. I shall be exceedingly mortified indeed," he gravely adds, falling down whole miles from his grand elevation, "if he should go away without giving me an opportunity of at least refusing something. I should like to have at least this gratification. However, he will be here the beginning of this week, and I must suspend all further opinion till he comes."

Next week arrives, and with it Lord Moira. Tom announces the fact to his mother, telling her that he "shall soon be put out of suspense," though he has "made up his mind pretty well to expecting very little. Indeed, when I say I expect very little, I mean that I expect nothing." It is clear Moore cannot be his lordship's private secretary, for that berth has been already given to Captain Thomson, an old American comrade. Well, we shall see what an interview will do. But an interview is not so easy. For a moment Tom catches sight of Lord Moria shooting in the fields, and Lord Moira catches sight of him. "You see a schoolboy taking his holiday," said his lordship, affectingly, and then proceeds to pop at the birds. From this moment, to use the poet's own expression, the Governor-General "fights shy" of his client; "his manner is even worse than his deficiencies of matter." He is always busy, and never "i' the vein." But Tom grows sick of suspense and determines to bring his business to a crisis. "At last!" he gets an interview. His lordship began by telling his friend, whom he had solemnly promised "to set on his legs," that he had not been "oblivious of him." "Oblivious of me!" shrieks Moore, in a letter to one of his friends; "after this devil of a word what heart or soul was to be expected from him!" His lordship continued: He was sorry to say that all the Indian patronage he was allowed to exercise here had been exhausted; but if on reaching India he should find anything worth Moore's acceptance, he would — let him know. In the mean time he would try to get something from the government at home, who were bound to help his friends during his absence; and if anything else —. Luckless poet! Tom saw desertion in every word, in every look, in every tone. He went home to his little cot at Kegworth, kicked his Will-o'-the-wisp once for all out of the house, no doubt kissed his wife and child, and, like a brave little fellow, wrote a parting word to his Excellency the Governor-General. He begged his lordship not to trouble the ministry on his account; not to look out for "anything good" in India; not to distress himself any further with the worldly interests of Thomas Moore; that it was too late in the day for the said Thomas "to go on expecting;" and that he must forthwith think of working out his own independence by his own industry. That letter Thomas despatched, and from that moment did his duty, as we all know, in that station of life to which it had pleased God to call him. We do not learn that Lord Moira replied to this farewell epistle; but it is right to this great man to record that he did not sail for India before he had handsomely despatched to the little family at Kegworth "a large basket of hares, venison, and peafowl."

A great lesson, that needs to be enforced, is to be gathered from the memorials that lie before us, or else assuredly we should not have dwelt so long upon the early career of a man who has but reached his meridian in the two volumes furnished to the world by his noble biographer. Before we attempt to dilate upon that lesson we call the reader's attention for a moment to another and a companion picture.

Thomas Moore was the contemporary of a man who, subjected to the same solicitations as himself, had less ability to overcome temptation, and exemplified in his history the last effects of a system the hollowness of which Moore had the grace to detect before it was too late for the discovery to be of use. The early career of Theodore Hook has a marvellous resemblance to that of the more fortunate, but scarcely more richly endowed, poet of the sister isle. Theodore Hook was born with brilliant talents, and "lived," as one of his biographers has said of him, "from the cradle in a musical atmosphere." He, too, had an exquisite ear, could play untaught upon the piano; and, as a child, astonished and delighted every eager listener. Like Tom Moore, he was scarcely breeched before he became "a show child," singing exquisitely to his own accompaniment ballads of his own writing — music of his own composing. What Moore's mother did for her favored child when she discovered the treasure which Providence had enshrined within him, we have already seen. Hook had the misfortune to lose his mother while he was yet a school-boy at Harrow, and his father, finding himself the possessor of a veritable prodigy, determined at once to take him home and make the most of his property. All the difference in the fates of these two men, who began the journey of life and travelled some distance on one and the same track, may possibly be attributed to the fact that the motherless boy was sent alone into the world with his impassioned soul to guide him as best it might, while Moore, well fortified at starting by the instruction maternal anxiety had procured him, labored beneath the influence of the mother's eye almost to the end.

As Hook grew up his genius expanded. Removed from school at his mother's death, and being both comely and precocious, he was flattered by musicians and players, and before he was sixteen he was a successful and distinguished author. One faculty he had to perfection. His talents as an improvisatore were miraculous. Mr. Lockhart, in his brief but admirable and most just biography of Hook, affirms that in this particular he stands alone in his own country, and Coleridge declared he was as true a genius as Dante.

It is singular how exactly the early histories of these two youths correspond. The marchionesses get hold of Hook precisely as they take possession of Moore. He also is invited to the supper parties of the great, in order to sing for their amusement; and he, too, is introduced to the Prince Regent, who, just as he had done to Moore, places his hand on the brilliant improvisatore's shoulder, telling him he is delighted to make his acquaintance, and that he hopes to see and hear him again, and frequently. On one occasion we are told that the prince said with feeling, "Something must be done for Hook!" and accordingly something was done for him, as something had been done for Moore. Tom, the poet, in his 24th year, had been sent to Bermuda to examine all skippers, mates, and seamen who might be forthcoming as witnesses in the cause of captured vessels; Theodore, the improvisatore, in the very same year of his age, was forwarded to the Mauritius to undertake the not very lively and æsthetical duties of accountant-general and treasurer to the colony. The result in both cases was very similar. Moore was nearly ruined by his carelessness in leaving a subordinate to do his work; Hook was wholly destroyed by allowing all his subordinates to do as they pleased. Both men returned to England to mix in its fashionable dissipation, and both were never so happy as when they were parting with their manly independence in order to give zest to the idlest hours of their aristocratic and too exacting entertainers.

But we must note a difference. Moore suffered a heavy loss by his official imprudence; but to his honor let it be known to all the world that he manfully resolved to pay every pound by the labor of his own capable brain, and steadily refused all help from sympathizing and ready friends. Literature owes the strong-hearted poet a debt of gratitude for that brave determination, which was as heroically carried out; and, in the name of his brethren, we tender to his memory the tribute due to it; for it compensates for affronts to literature most unworthy of the poet's fame, and otherwise inexcusable. Hook was not so scrupulous. He earned large sums by his intellectual exertions, but he died at last a beggar, with his debt undiminished by one farthing. We have made the reader acquainted with the fashionable proceedings of Thomas Moore; with his flutterings at lordly tables, with his pursuit of ministers of state, in order to wring from them an acknowledgment of the pleasure they had derived from his vocal powers somewhat more substantial than laudatory froth; with his untiring attendance in the halls of the powerful, and with his frequent and affecting complaints of his unrequited poverty, in the midst of all the hollow splendor by which he was surrounded, but which he could not touch. Hook was far more desperate in his assaults upon the high-born. With a debt of 12,000*l.* hanging over his head, and with no means save those derived from the public by his literary labors, he took a fine house in Cleveland-row, became a member of many clubs, visited all the great houses of the country, dined regularly with all the great people (including the royal princes), was promoted to the intimate friendship of all the Tory leaders, was times out of number the only untitled guest in the whole houseful of coronets, a lion where almost every beast was a king of the forest — and, in fact, represented in his own person to perfection a wealthy patrician chief without money and without rank. As Moore looked to the whigs for promotion and position, so Hook relied upon the tories for eventual release from all his difficulties; and, in the very same spirit that Moore returned from the magnificent saloons in which he had won applause and flattery from every beautiful and distinguished guest, in order to breathe forth in his diary bitter sighs at the insufficiency and barrenness of his social triumphs, Theodore Hook retired from his gratified and dazzling assemblies in order secretly to curse the fate which had rendered him, with all his gifts and successes, after all, only the first jack-pudding of his time.

Moore weeps to think that no mulberry leaves can be dealt out to the poor worm who so willingly spins his much valued silk for his magnificent masters, and makes no attempt to disguise the nature of the relation existing between him and his superiors. He sings his best in the hope of reward; and, if disgust rises in his vocal breast, it is not that he has condescended to the trade of the opera singer, but that the looked-for recompense is never forthcoming. Hook notifies in his journal that he “dines at Lord Harrington's, to meet the Duke of Wellington,” and that he finds as his fellow-guests “the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, Lord and Lady Southampton, Lord Londonderry, Lord Canterbury, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Redesdale, Lord Sprangford, and Lord Chesterfield;” but, the party being over, and his performances concluded, he has the candor to confess that “between diners-out and the common mountebanks of the theatres the only difference is, that the witting of the drawing-room wears not the Merry Andrew's jacket, and is paid in vol-au-vents, fricandeaux, Silleri, and Laffitte, instead of receiving the wages of tumbling in pounds, shillings, and pence.” The confession and knowledge, however, led to no good practical result. Hook clung pertinaciously to the skirts of the aristocracy, in the vain expectation of solid assistance from his titled associates, and died, as we have said, a beggar at last. He left a family of unprovided children behind him, on whose behalf a subscription was set on foot; but, of all the fine company, who had so frequently been charmed with his strains — who had again and again plied him with strong drinks to raise a flagging soul, which was in duty bound to give jocundness to theirs — who had sucked this grateful fruit so long as a drop of juice remained to slake their morbid thirst — scarcely one put out a finger to raise the helpless ones from the dust. The father found a humble grave at Fulham, and his children were left by his noble friends — to live, if they could — to starve, if they could not.

Is this a state of things creditable to either party, honorable to the patron, reputable to the client? Steele has declared that "the man who takes up another's time in his service, though he has no prospect of rewarding his merit towards him, is as unjust in his dealings as he who takes goods of a tradesman without the intention or ability to pay for them." We are no apologists for the fine people who could see the children of the "friend" who had once ministered to their ephemeral happiness pining for help, and turn aside as though they saw them not; but we are bound to admit, though even against Steele, that the case of Moore and Hook was fairly stated when the latter frankly allowed that he had received the value of his songs in fricandeaux, and a receipt for his music in Sillier and Laffitte. When Moore found himself alone with his marchionesses and dukes — when he looked up and down the sumptuous table, and discovered in all the brilliant company no poet but the charming author of the Irish Melodies, and no vintner's son but Thomas Moore, did it never occur to him to inquire how it came to pass that he constituted the one enviable exception? What had he done for his haughty associates that they should acknowledge him as an equal, and treat him as a friend? Men of humble origin, though endowed with rare intellectual power, have too frequently an inordinate regard for worldly splendor. Aristocrats have occasionally an equal and more commendable taste for the society of fine talkers, or rare singers, as the case may be. The humble man sells his brains for the splendor, the aristocrat lends the splendor for the brains, and there is an end to the transaction. If the man of genius looks for more than his hire, he is exorbitant in his demands, and should, at all events, have made a better bargain at starting.

When Moore flourished, the time had gone by forever when it was necessary for an author to look to a patron for the means of advancement; a miserable expedient at the best, since it has been admitted that fewer cripples have come out of the wars than out of such a service. Mr. Macaulay recalls to mind with melancholy regret the days when Horace was forced to invoke Augustus in the most enthusiastic language of religious veneration — when Statius was doomed to flatter a tyrant for a morsel of bread — when Tasso extolled the heroic virtues of a wretched creature who locked him up in a madhouse; but these were times when readers were scarce — when patronage was essential to save the needy writer from starvation, and when men exercised intellectual independence at the risk of their lives. Hook and Moore lived at a happier epoch, and never once appealed to the people in vain. The latter had only to devote himself exclusively to his art in order to fix his own price upon his precious labors. We have read that for his Melodies alone Power, the publisher, guaranteed him 500*l.* a-year; we know that for Lalla Rookh he received 3,000 guineas, that for the Loves of the Angels he received a proportionately large sum, and that for all his other works he was equally well paid. What business he to play the suitor at the festive boards of grand people, who valued him solely for the pleasure he could give them, when he had already secured the worship of the whole country and the homage of nations! What elevation, dignity, or ease could any poet afford him, beyond that which he already enjoyed by the united suffrages of his countrymen? We do not blame the coronetted entertainers for getting as much delight out of Tom Moore as they were able to extract, but we do blame him for being weak enough to suppose that the fine folks were fervently attached to him when they were only in love with his singing. It was a fair game on either side, but, being played out, Tom had certainly no more claim upon the hearts of the fine folks than they had upon the affections of Tom. What would he have said had they presented their bill of costs for all the feasts! Would he have paid it? If not, with what face can he demand extra payment for performances for which he has already given a discharge in full? Let poets hanker after great people if they will; but let them never complain if a lifelong pursuit of a most unworthy object meets with the ignoble reward it has earned, and with not a sixpence more. Racine was sought after by the great, who would not admit Corneille to their gilded saloons; but Racine was shrewd enough to pay the fine people in their own pinchbeck coin, and Corneille surely gained more than he lost by the lofty neglect when the theatre rose as a man to greet his appearance upon the scene of his legitimate triumphs.

When Tom had parted company forever with his will-o'-the-wisp, which had done him no good since he first made its acquaintance, it would appear that he began to enter society with a much more practical and useful object than that of merely hobnobbing with his superiors. In order to make his songs popular, and to render them a source of profit to the writer, it was necessary that they should be sung in the assemblies of the "first circles." Generally speaking, the author or publisher of a ballad will make friends with a favorite professional singer, whose performances are sufficient to bring a composition into vogue. Now, Pasta or Catalani could not do for Moore in this respect half as much as Moore could do for himself; and, accordingly, Tom, in a very business-like and commendable spirit, took his wares in his own person to Grosvenor-square, just as Messrs. Nicol might take their coats and pantaloons on their bodies to the same place, if they were only lucky enough to gain admittance. "It was only on my representing to Bessy," writes Moore to Mr. Power in 1813, "that my songs would all remain a dead letter with you if I did not go up in the gay time of the year, and give them life by singing them about, that she agreed to my leaving her. This is quite my object. I shall make it a whole month of company and exhibition, which will do more service to the sale of the songs than a whole year's advertising." Who shall complain that the poet carries his own board on his back instead of hiring a whole troop of advertising vans? Economy is a virtue, let it be of money or of time. But—shall we confess it!—there reveals itself in the correspondence something too much of deliberate bargaining with society, at all times, to please the unsophisticated reader, who would fain discover in the poet of his adoration some faint resemblance to the man fashioned by his own generous imagination. In 1813 Moore removes to the neighborhood of Ashbourne, in Derbyshire, where he hires a cottage, "secluded among the fields—just the sort of thing he likes." He is not there long before he makes the acquaintance of a wealthy Derby family, also "just the sort of thing he likes;" and the seclusion of the fields is relieved occasionally by the bustle and excitement of a warm and well-provided mansion. Tom, in fact, hardly smells his fields before he is corresponding with his friends in his old style about his "carriages," his "elegancies," and his "good company." He gives up Lord Moira to patronize a millionaire. "We have just been on a visit," runs a letter dated October 23, 1813, "to Mr. Joseph Strutt's, who sent his carriage and four for us and back again with us. There are three brothers of them, and they are supposed to have a million of money pretty equally divided between them. They have fine families of daughters, and are fond of literature, music, and all those elegancies which their riches enable them so amply to indulge themselves with." Bessy came back full of presents—rings, fans, &c. A letter written a few months subsequently informs us that the poet "likes the Strutts exceedingly." We have no doubt of it; for the epistle goes on to say that "they have fine pianofortes, magnificent organs, splendid houses, and most excellent white soup;" that Tom "does not think he wrote half so well" as the young Strutts at their age, and that Bessy, as before, "came away loaded with presents of rings, fans, and bronze candlesticks." Had Mr. Strutt been Governor-General of India, instead of Lord Moira, that munificent gentleman would have certainly poured all the treasures of the East into the lap of Thomas Moore, and, what is more, Thomas would not have been too proud to accept them. Tom goes over to Derby to buy a sofa, and, of course, pays the generous Strutt a passing visit. A sofa does not appear to have been handy at the time, but "Mr. Strutt, who never sees me without giving me something," insisted upon making Tom "a present of a very snug and handsome easy-chair for his study," which Tom did not refuse. In the warmth of acceptance, Moore pronounces the Strutts "most excellent and friendly people." We believe he does them justice; but we had rather that Tom had got his candlesticks, rings, and easy-chairs at the proper shops, and in the regular way of business, nevertheless.

It was at Ashbourne, in Derbyshire, that Lalla Rookh was written. The poem was the result of two or three winters' study; and when it appeared, in 1817, the reputation of Moore was made forever. Three thousand guineas was the price paid for the work, and of this sum Moore drew immediately one thousand for the discharge of his debts, leaving the remaining two thousand in the hands of the publishers, who were requested by the poet to pay the interest (100*l.* per annum) over to his father. Let us repeat, whatever were the weaknesses of Moore, his filial conduct was without a flaw, and his remembrance of home claims not darkened by one cloud of selfishness throughout his life.

When the praises of Lalla Rookh were at their height, Moore and his Bessy moved southward in search of another home, the damp, smokiness, and smallness of the Derbyshire cot proving no longer tolerable. It was a proud journey for Moore, and his heart beat stoutly, we may be sure, as he knocked at all the big houses with his good wife upon his arm. He had done more for his fame than a whole army of Moiras could have achieved, and had carved for himself a niche upon which all eyes will be turned years after the very name of his false patron shall have been forgotten. "Bessy," writes Moore to his mother from London, "took a round with me to return calls—Lady Besborough, Asgill, Cork, Hastings, &c. We were let in at almost all!" Beatified Tom! "Let in!" What condescension on the one hand—what silly ecstasy on the other!

A new home was speedily found in Wiltshire, close to Bowood, the residence of the Marquis of Lansdowne. It was a small thatched cottage, of which Moore took possession on the 19th of November, 1817, and in which he died at the end of February, 1852. The vicinity of the great house was of course a great recommendation to the poet, whose hours were divided at all periods, as far as possible, between the Muses and the House of Lords. Moore is once quite disgusted with Crabbe, because the latter maintained that Murray, the publisher, deserved a higher place at a public dinner than Phillips, the artist and academician, inasmuch as the former kept his carriage. "This," says Tom indignantly, "is inconceivable." But what to us seems equally inconceivable is Moore's own appreciation of high birth over every other consideration. Honest Crabbe made a mistake, no doubt. A carriage is certainly no absolute proof of moral or mental worth, nor is a coronet, Mr. Moore — as you suppose — invariably the crown of human greatness. Moore professes himself horrified because this same Mr. Murray is familiarly addressed in a letter from Lord Byron, and exclaims, "Murray, a bookseller, a person so out of his caste!" — trying to persuade himself, though he can never succeed — that his caste is not questioned for a moment in the very highest circles! This is bad enough; but the paragraph that follows reaches to the height of absurdity. Moore has dined at Bowood, and thus speaks of the dinner in his diary: — "Sat between Mackintosh and Lord Lansdowne. Talked of Fearon and Birkbeck. The singularity of two such men being produced out of the middling class of society at the same time; proof of the intelligence now spread through that rank of Englishmen. . . . WHAT IT WILL COME TO God knows." When Elliston played George the Fourth in the coronation pageant at Drury-lane, he was so overcome by the applause of the audience that he quitted the procession, approached the foot-lights, burst into tears, and exclaimed, "God bless you, my people!" In like manner, Thomas Moore acts his part of fine gentleman so admirably, that he positively forgets his own identity. What does he mean by proclaiming as "a singular fact" the production at the same time of two such men from "the middling class of society" as Fearon and Birkbeck? The words are arrant nonsense. Have all our great men stepped from the ranks of the nobility, that Thomas Moore should express absolute astonishment at the appearance of Birkbeck, and feign alarm at the phenomenon! To be sure the said Thomas had brevet-rank at Bowood, but, if we cannot claim for the "middling class" a poet whose grandfather, on the mother's side, was in the "provision line," and whose grandfather on the other side is utterly lost in the ocean of time, we are certainly not disposed to hand over the author of the Irish Melodies as a present to the Peerage. The "middling class" has given us our poets, our philosophers, our discoverers — all that we value most in our nationality — all that has made us what we are. Newton was the son of a small farmer; Shakspeare of a woolstapler, and Milton's father was a scrivener. It is an insult to the reader's understanding to insist upon the point, for we believe no man in the full possession of his senses is disposed to contest it. Moore, when he wrote the words, knew himself to be the son of a publican in Dublin, Southey to be the son of a tradesman in Bristol, Crabbe to be the son of a collector of salt duties in Suffolk. Had he thought for half the time it took him to insert such trash in the diary, it could never have been reproduced here to his disadvantage. He must have known that the wonder is, not that the "middling class" furnishes the country with the staple of its intellect and energy, but that occasionally "a proof of the intelligence" of the class above it presents itself to give variety to the general rule. Oh, that white soup, gold plates, silver-laced lacqueys, and velvet chairs should rob — though but for an hour — a fine soul of its manliness, and induce it to put on the flaunting and degrading livery of funkneyism!

Thomas makes frequent excursions from Wiltshire to London, and exciting enough is the life he leads in the metropolis. He generally arrives in town "just in time to dress for dinner," and he continues dressing and undressing until he finds his way back to the cottage. His published works are voluminous, and it is really astonishing how he found leisure and tranquillity of spirit for his labors. He has not a moment to himself in London; and in the country he spends quite as much time with the great folks as in his own study. His appetite for pleasure is gluttonous. He is an inveterate play-goer, delighting in Astley's and finding infinite amusement at the Coburg. He dances away at "Lady Grey's" ball, which is always of the best kind," and, as a matter of course, so fashionable a character finds instant admittance to Almack's. Indeed, he is so constant a visitor at this exclusive entertainment that Lord Morpeth, meeting him "at the regular assembly" on the 25th of May, 1819, said to him "You and I live at Almack's." Moore records the observation in his diary, and we will be sworn he never wrote a line that gave him greater pleasure.

The year was 1819, and Tom was, as usual, dining, dancing, singing, and playing, when he received the disagreeable, but not altogether unexpected, intelligence, that either the defalcations of the dishonest deputy in Bermuda (or rather, out of it — for the fellow had absconded) must be made good, or the poet bid adieu to Lord Morpeth and Almack's and go to prison. Moore had made friends in his progress, and now they ran to the rescue. He took counsel of some of the wisest. Dr. Lushington advised the unfortunate registrar to keep out of the way until he could make a compromise with the merchants. Somebody recommended Ireland as a good place for concealment, but Rogers thought better of France.

Longmans come forward and offer to advance any sum in the way of business; the defalcations amount to 6,000*l.*, and Leigh Hunt urges the instant opening of a public subscription. Perry thinks a private subscription more advisable, and cites the case of Charles James Fox as a precedent. Tom remembers that one of Fox's friends complained of that statesman's hauteur, though "by God, he was one of those who gave 300*l.*, towards his maintenance," and declines private subscription altogether. Rogers has no notion of Moore's making himself a slave to the booksellers, and offers 500*l.*, saying that Power will give 500*l.* more. Offers still more munificent pour in. Lord John Russell, the present biographer, places at once at his friend's disposal all the profits of "the future editions of his Life of Lord Russell," just published, and the authoress, whoever she may be, of "Come, Stella, arouse thee," full "of sorrow at my misfortune, offers the copyright of a volume of poems which she has ripe for publication." Strange creatures we are. In the midst of his agitation and alarm Moore dines at Holland-house. "I sang in the evening," he writes in his journal, "and was rather glad I had an opportunity of making the Hollands feel a little what I could do in this way, for they never heard me properly before. Lady Holland, evidently much pleased, told me afterwards that my articulation was the most beautiful she had ever heard." Pity Tom cannot sing the disgusted merchants into a compromise, and make them "feel what he can do in that way." But the feat is not easy. Negotiations still go on. Lord Lansdowne and Lady Holland prefer Scotland to France. They think Holyrood-house will afford all needful protection, and the banishment will not be so complete. Mackintosh writes—"You will find in Edinburgh as many friends and admirers as even you could find anywhere." Moore is puzzled, but prepares, at all events, for flight; he regulates his papers, destroys his letters, and makes his arrangements with his "darling Bessy, who bears all so sweetly, though she would give her eyes to go with me." His mind is at length made up. He will fly to France; and Lord Lansdowne, who is going to Paris, will give him his company. Bessy and the little ones are to follow if the negotiations with the merchants are protracted. Time for leave-taking draws on. On the 17th of August Moore gives "a tea-drinking party," dancing and pianoforte in the evening. On Tom's health being drunk at supper, he "makes them a short speech, alluding to the probability of his soon being obliged to leave them, which drew tears from most of the women." Thrice happy Moore—commanding money from the men, sobs and tears from the women—privileged even in his misfortune!

The second volume closes while Moore is in London, on the eve, we presume, of departure; but he lingers amid the fascinations of the metropolis—one night going to the Haymarket "to see Liston speak a speech on an ass;" another, dining at Lady Blessington's; a third, "dining at a coffee-house in Spring-gardens, and thence to Astley's." When he has gone the usual round he will no doubt depart. Joy go with you, Thomas Moore! You are a mature man of forty years of age, but, be you in London, in Edinburgh, in Paris, or among the celestials, yours will still be a jocund soul, and communicate pleasure and delight to all the spirits that surround it.

THE PLAINT OF FREEDOM.*

A QUARTO form, a handsome style of printing, and a generally expensive mode of "getting up," distinguish this volume, which appears without author's or publisher's name; the law, we believe, requires an acknowledged printer; who is found beyond the Finis—"Newcastle-upon-Tyne, imprinted by G. Bouchier Richardson." Yet there is nothing to require this mystery. The Plaint of Freedom is animated by poetical spirit; its sentiments are lofty, and of the old English heroic cast, when men willingly throw fortune and life into the balance of a high or worldly enterprise. The poetry will not be popular with "the Manchester school" or "the Peace party," though some of them, by the by, seemed to favor a war for Hungary, or at least to hold language which if supported must have ended in war. The Plaint of Freedom contains opinions of extreme Republicanism, in relation to our great civil war and the execution of Charles the First, of which many may not approve. The only bit in the volume that could induce the author to prefer concealment, unless from whim or from some professional motive, are four stanzas on Paine, as author of "The Rights of Man."

The framework of the poem may be described as a complaint uttered by Freedom on the spiritless supineness of England at the present day, and the sordid spirit which possesses her people. In reality, it is a series of poems on English history, always having some reference to the great question of the defences, or rather to the truckling spirit that opposes their execution. After a few dedicatory stanzas to Milton, Freedom—or the poet—addresses some Tyrtæan strains to England, provocative not only of a defensive but of a warlike feeling. In a series of poems not unlike the sonnet in singleness of subject and brevity, but of different structure, the poet then runs over the leading men and events of English history — as Caractacus, Alfred, Robin Hood, Magna Carta, the worthies of the Elizabethan and Commonwealth times; a general conclusion glancing at the present, but also dealing with the future, in the form of a prophecy on what a gallant and self-denying people might effect for mankind.

* The Plaint of Freedom. No Publisher's name.

The form and metre of the work resemble Tennyson's "In Memoriam." Something of the Laureate's manner there may also be — possibly imitated, with an occasional carelessness of versification, and sometimes a prosaic character, as well as a construction grammatically harsh. However, poetry is better judged of by specimen than by criticism. This is the opening picture of the actual state of the world.

Revolt his storm-flag hath unfurled
And New and Old (like giant foes
Who, tired of distant threatenings, close)
With desperate grapplings shake the world.

And thunder-voices rend the air —
For God and Right, for Elder Wrong :
The clangor of a battle-song
Flung heavenward in the lightning's glare.

And Change leaps like a springtide o'er
The landmarks of the ancient sway :
The fierce waves hunger for their prey ;
And monarchs tremble at their roar.

Their echoes break upon our coast —
The isle that freedom loved so well :
But stir not Freedom's Sentinel,
Asleep on his neglected post.

Freedom, or the poet, proceeds as follows, with historical logic — for undoubtedly, in past times, the late commotions abroad would have seen England in the van of the strife — but scarcely with sound reason, at least if this is to be read as an exhortation to offensive war, not to merely defensive preparations.

Of old my name had been a spell
To rouse thee from profoundest trance :
The shadow of a winged lance
Had warned thy slumber, ere it fell.

Then blazed upon thy haughtiest cliffs
My fires, reflected in the tide
Which gulfed the Armada's lofty pride —
Scattered before our English skiffs.

Yet higher soared the flame divine,
Whose rays illumined distant lands,
When Milton uttered my commands,
And Cromwell set his foot by mine.

But now no beacon marks thy shore ;
The old, undaunted soul is fled :
White Land ! canst thou be pale with dread
That Freedom needeth thee once more ?

Why tarriest thou ? Till sting of pain
Excite thy tamed Berserkir rage ;
Or till our foe cast down a gauge
Not even thy strength can lift again ?

What waitest thou ? Till Cossack feet
Spur thy slow courage ; till the war
Our sires had led to Trafalgar
Back desperately from street to street ?

Till London croucheth to its doom ;
When strangers, stepping through our walls,
Chant French Te Deums in St. Paul's,
And pile their arms on Nelson's tomb ?

What sloth of heart, or brain, or limb,
What count of fears, what doubt of right,
Hath hid thy spirit in this night,
Whose clouds thy starriest honor dim ?

Can Wickliffe's heirs permit the Pope ?
May Cromwell's lieges court the Tsar ?
Or Alfred's lineage shrink from war,
With shameful peace for only hope ?

And yet, thy sword a liar's tongue,
Thy highest faith some trick of trade —
What marvel England's name is made
A synonym for Coward Wrong ?

The land that boldly judged a king,
And slew the traitor for his crimes,
Now stoopeth to the poorest mimes
Of tyranny — an abject thing.

Passages similar in power and passing application might be quoted from the opening and close, as well as from the historical stanzas. One will suffice as a specimen. It is the death of Sir Richard Grenville, an Elizabethan worthy, who singly and successfully resisted the whole fleet of Spain, and when his powder was spent, the greater part of his crew killed or wounded, and himself disabled, "commanded the master's gunner, whom he knew to be a most resolute man, to split and sink the ship, that thereby nothing might remain of glory or victory to the Spaniards."

SIR RICHARD GRENVILLE.

A hundred men for fifteen hours
Beat back ten thousand ; morn shall see
One bark defying fifty-three,
And, shattered, foiling all their powers.

For warily distant in a ring
Spain's great armadas baffled lie :
Like dogs, far-watching till he die,
Around the dying forest king.

And "with a glad and quiet mind
Here die I Richard Grenville, who Have done what I was bound to do,
Leaving a soldier's fame behind."

A soldier's fame ! What else, while Life
Must battle momentarily with Wrong ?
Gird on thy sword, be true and strong —
And God absolve thee from the strife !

THE PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

This rich quarry of historic wealth is now, in completed state, accessible to every American, and certainly every American should dig in its ample mines. Mr. Loessing has come to the rescue at the right period. Ten years more and it would have been too late. Every year or month was sweeping away some tene-ment around which gathered revolutionary associations, some ancient record or furrowed face, and which soon would have been lost forever to the world, but which are now securely embalmed by the pen and pencil of this artist author. Our countrymen were so absorbed in the present that they were forgetting the past. Progress was striding over our ancient battlefields, regardless of the bones that bleached beneath her feet. Agriculture drove her remorseless coulter through the mossy ramparts that once sheltered the gallant heroes of our liberty. The time-honored structures that kept off the dew and the rain from many a patriot head, were tumbling indiscriminately before the blows of that improvement, which would destroy an association as ruthlessly as it would crush a weed. The mound, the wall, the ditch, that had witnessed the intensest suffering, the bravest endeavor, the most heroic defenses and assaults, over which the whistling balls had cut the air, and almost yet echoing with the clang of battle and the shouts of victory, were yielding to friendly strokes what they refused to hostile arms, and surrendering their ancient forms to the desecrating plough. Why should they longer remain to remind a people of the struggles their freedom had cost? Wheat would not grow in the ditch, nor corn spring out of the wall. And in a country so crowded for room, hitting its elbows against the oceans as it turned round on its narrow base of sixty degrees of latitude, it could not afford to let an old tree stand, though its rough bark held the testimony of a terrible conflict, nor permit the remnants of a venerable fortification, to mark to the eye of posterity some spot hallowed with patriot blood. Rapidly, rapidly were these glorious mementos disappearing before the utilitarian spirit of the age, and oblivion would soon have rolled her waters over them all. But the time so often gives what its necessities require. A historian of a new stamp appears as he is wanted; not confining himself within the four walls of a library, nor satisfied with collating, in new forms, the researches of others, he sallies forth to a personal inspection of every scene of revolutionary interest: he searches out the hoary actors that yet remain; he follows their tottering steps over fields of slaughter; sketches the physical features that were connected with the contest; and as his pen takes the narration from the trembling lips of these venerable partakers and witnesses, and transcribes their mouldy documents, his faithful and ready pencil transfers their features and figures to the enduring page. Thus we have fac-similes of the autographs of Washington and Jefferson, of Columbus and Cotton Mather, of Uncas and Brant, of Burgoyne and Gates, of Arnold and Andre, and of most of those stern men whose shoulders upheld the ark of our liberty. Thus, too, their lineaments look out from these life-like pages, and even the deep wrinkles that a century had worn in the cheeks of old John Battin, and the frosts that time had sprinkled on his locks, revealed the truthfulness of the artist's skill. The benignant features of Pocahontas beam with affection, and the countenances of Kosciusko and Lafayette, of Montgomery and Putnam, Stark, Wayne, Mercer, Marion, Sumter, and a host of others equally worthy of preservation, show the reader what cast of men led our armies to victory in the heroic days of the republic. Accurate maps of battle-fields, and monuments that gratitude has erected to the memory of our heroes, the habitations that were the scenes of stirring interest, are here truthfully depicted.

But for this all would soon become vague; important localities intangible; indefiniteness would conceal our consecrated places, and the roads encrimsoned by the bleeding feet of our warriors — their long marches and frosty bivouacs — would, in many instances, become indistinct and legendary. Dates and localities are the eyes of history, through which its truths are made manifest and steadfast. As we read these clear and beautiful pages, we feel a sentiment of nationality glow in our veins, and look with honest pride upon those inflexible, upright physiognomies, and with melancholy interest upon those quaint old specimens of architecture that held the living, and upon those tombstones that protect and mark the sleeping-places of the illustrious dead. Our author does not believe that the antiquarian spirit should be devoted only to unfolding the mysterious ciphers that decorate the sarcophagus of an Egyptian princess; but he would seize those hieroglyphics of our past — those frail memorials, so swiftly crumbling into dust — and enshrine them on his ample leaves; the record, the evidence, and the illustration of a great and triumphant struggle.

Accordingly we see our historic pilgrim traversing and retraversing the broad field of the revolution — touching at every memorable place — in trackless forests — amid mountain ridges — over fruitful plains — pursuing the devious windings of rivers — in thronging cities tracing the revolutionary relics, around which the multitude heedlessly tramped — in solitary walks hunting the footprints of our armies — suddenly performing some distant journey to save the impress of a fort or building about to be defaced by sacrilegious hands, following wherever the progress of American story beckoned him — till, compassing more than eight thousand miles, and transferring from fading reality to perpetual forms, many hundred cherished scenes and portraits, he consummates his interesting narrative of more than fourteen hundred large and compact pages, and gives the invaluable contribution to the descendants of those whose deeds he thus nobly commemorates and preserves.

These volumes are, hereafter, to perform an important part in educating the people in the details of American history. Certainly no work is so well calculated to lure the minds of the young through the different stages of the great drama of our independence. Uniting the two attractions of engaging narrative and pictorial representation, it interests the reader in a double sense, and will tend, we do not doubt, to imbue the generation now rising to manliness, with a deeper and fuller knowledge than it would else have had, of the labors, hardships, dangers and triumphs of the first sons of the republic.

In the modesty of his preface the author regrets that others, more competent, had not gone forth to this undertaking. But he is the competent man who does the work; and surely no one could have accomplished it with greater fidelity, truthfulness or skill, infused more freshness and vivacity into the current of his narrative, or poured out the enthusiastic devotion of a more thoroughly American heart. It was a task that indifference could not achieve. It required not merely the determination to write a book, but also the promptings of an ardent desire, a burning love of country, familiarity with her history, and an irresistible impulse to gather and preserve whatever might be subject to demolition or decay of all those things that could throw light upon, or that became memorable in the progress of this country from dependence to freedom. The patriotism that thus sacredly collects, guards and perpetuates the proof of American valor, is of the stamp that would perform deeds, themselves, worthy of record, when the time requires.

THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WE have been waiting some time for an eligible opportunity to say a few words respecting this journal. It is about the best written paper in the country, and in point of intellectual labor, copiousness of information, general and comprehensive ability, and the power of handling gracefully and with fine effect a large variety of subjects, it is without precedent or compeer in American journalism. It comes nearer to our ideal of an American newspaper than anything before undertaken on this continent. And yet there are serious defects, not in the design, but in the execution of the enterprise. The Times is frequently too abstract and magazinish; too fond of dissertation and disquisition; too much in the habit of settling controverted questions with an ex cathedra air; not sufficiently tolerant when its views are opposed, and at times both supercilious and pragmatical. It sometimes lacks candor, too; and we have known it to be exceedingly disingenuous and unfair in a controversial discussion. Then it is occasionally inconsiderate in mounting a popular hobby, and never gets off with grace when the creature is jaded or crippled—take the Kossuth furor for example. We doubt whether the Times, even now, when the whole thing has as little life as a collapsed tradition, does not regard the visionary Hungarian as a wiser, more discreet, and practical statesman, and possessing higher qualifications for building up a government than Alexander Hamilton. All these blemishes which disfigure the fair face of the Times, however, are incidental to the plan upon which it was established; inevitable, most of them, in the present state of journalism in this country, and the immature age of the paper. It is not to be denied that Raymond has made an enormous stride in the improvement and elevation of the press. He has subsidized more able pens, a greater amount of intellect, cultivation, and diversified knowledge, than was ever before dreamed of by an editor in the United States.

We have before referred to the attempt of Mr. Raymond, in founding the Times, to unite the currency of the cheap, or penny press, with the intellectual power of papers of superior pretensions and higher price. The experiment, thoroughly made, under the most favorable circumstances, proved unsuccessful, and the result must be regarded as conclusive against the feasibility of the scheme. The circulation of a sheet so costly and so attractive as the Times was made from the start, must constitute a source of revenue to render the enterprise remunerative. The Sun is a profitable speculation at a cent a copy; for its great circulation attracts a large amount of advertisements, and the limited quantity of reading matter leaves ample room for their insertion. Besides, it costs very little to conduct the paper. The expense of the original matter furnished to the Times has always been enormous; and we apprehend that it will ever be found impossible to combine the features of extreme cheapness and commanding influence to one journal. When the Times, on entering upon its second year, doubled its price, we felt certain of its entire success. Since that time, it has grown steadily in popularity and influence, and now it wears an appearance of strength and permanence that leaves no room for doubting that it will soon become one of the best paying newspaper establishments in the country. It is now one of the best mediums for every description of advertising, and it will not be long before it is crowded with that species of business.

We had intended, in this connexion, to notice somewhat in detail, a series of articles now in course of publication in the Times, under the title of "The Great Conversationists," but we have left ourselves little room for the fulfilment of our purpose. We recognize in them the hand of an esteemed friend—a man of the finest literary attainments, and an elegant writer. He has already treated of Jefferson, Calhoun, and several other of the great lights of the South. His last number is devoted to the "Lesser Lights of South Carolina." As a specimen of his style, we give an extract from his sketch of George McDuffee. The fidelity of his limning will be recognized by all who have had an opportunity to hear that very able man and powerful orator.

HOW TO HANDLE A BOAT AMONGST ROLLERS.

A SCIENTIFIC lesson upon the handling of a boat is of interest, for more than its novelty, for humanity. And let it not be imagined that the lesson is practically not needed. There is as much difference of skill in handling a boat as in handling a horse, and it is notorious that men-of-war's men are most deficient in this art. Captain Ward, of the Shipwreck Institution, observing that another life-boat under sail has been lost, offers these judicious and instructive remarks:—

It is a well-known thing to the seamen on the most exposed parts of our coasts, that the chief danger to a boat does not occur when going off against a heavy sea, but on returning before it, at which time the greatest skill and carefulness are necessary, even under oars, to prevent a boat from broaching to and turning broadside on to the sea. Their experience has taught them that, when seeing a heavy breaker following their boat up from astern, instead of yielding to the natural impulse of giving her all possible speed away from it, and so, as might be expected, to lessen the violence of the shock, their only safety lies in checking the boat's way through the water, and keeping her end on to the sea till it has passed them, to effect which they back their oars, or even face a portion of the crew round the reverse way, who row backwards with all their force against the heaviest of the seas as they approach. If this precaution be neglected, it is almost a matter of certainty that the boat will broach to broadside to the sea and be capsized. In truth, in this manner nearly all the crews of distressed vessels who take to their boats, and attempt to land through a heavy surf, are drowned.

The circulation of this information among merchant seamen may, I believe, be instrumental in saving many lives. It is not, of course, pretended that it is an infallible rule of safety. A boat may be so short or small in proportion to the magnitude of the waves, that they may break over her bow and stern (whichever is to seaward) and fill her at once, or throw her "end over end;" but in such a case it is their only chance.

With a boat under the command of oars this management may be readily effected, but not so under sail, since, even if the sails be lowered, the boat will probably still retain too much speed, and if she broach to with the top weight of a mast and sail, nothing can prevent her capsizing if the sea be very heavy.

Without the top weight of a mast and sail, and with a considerable amount of ballast, a lifeboat may, in the like circumstances, go no further than her beam-ends, merely half filling with water, and then turning round head to the sea.

It cannot, I conceive, be too urgently forced on the attention of the crews of such lifeboats as have the means of both rowing and sailing, that if they have been off to a distant wreck under sail, their proper course, on nearing the land and before getting into broken water, even if it be daylight, will be to get down their mast and sail, and to take their boat carefully in under oars. In the night time, as was the case in this instance, when the breakers cannot be seen until the boat is among them, to run over the bar of a river, or through any heavy broken water, under sail, I consider to be an act of extreme imprudence.

It may not be uninteresting, even to the general reader, to point out what is evidently the cause of this unexpected effect of the action of the sea, which requires a treatment the reverse of that which we should pursue on an impending collision between two opposite forces upon the land, and which makes it safer to boldly charge the danger than to flee from it.

It would be unsuitable here to enter on the theory of the waves, as far as it is understood; and the fact is observed by every one, that, as they approach the shore, and meet the rebound of those which have preceded them, their violence is increased, and, acquiring now an actually progressive motion, their upper stratum rushes onward, and falls over like a cataract, while a constant undercurrent, or backwater, at the same time setting off against them, serves but to increase their fury, and adds greatly to their dangerous effects.

On a boat advancing against one of these waves, or, as they are now denominated, rollers, from their rolling or tumbling motion, or breakers, from their broken surface, she receives the concussion of the blow, parts the wave with her bow, by her own inertia retains her position, and the immediate danger is past. To be sure, if she be too short and small in proportion to the height of the wave, she may be thrown almost into a perpendicular position, and turned "end over end," as it is termed. Or, again, if she be too cumbersome, or her bow present too broad or bluff a surface to the water, she may, in a very heavy sea, lose her headway and be driven astern, when, if she be straight sheered and have but little height at her ends, she may be forced down stern foremost or be turned over quarter ways. If, however, she have sufficient height of bow to prevent the sea from breaking in a large body over it, and enough power to retain her headway over the crest of the wave, she has nothing to fear.

On returning to the shore, however, if she attempts to run from a heavy breaker or roller, it soon catches her, throws her stern up, and carries her away with it; she cannot get away from it; she and it together are running along at a frightful pace over the ground, yet she has not steerage way through the water, and is quite unmanageable; it hugs her and crowds on her more and more; it runs her bow under water; the under current, acting on her fore foot, turns her round broadside to the sea, which still presses on her; her whole lee side is under water, and, if an ordinary open boat, she is instantly upset. Even if she be a lifeboat, unless she has a large amount of well-secured ballast, and although she have no mast or sail up, she will probably be turned quite over either by the same wave or else by the following one, which will fall on her before she can recover her position.

It may, therefore, be considered an axiom in the management of all boats in a heavy sea and shoal water, when going to windward to give the boat the greatest possible speed against each sea as it approaches, and when rowing to leeward to check her way and back her against each wave until it has passed.

These last propositions may perhaps require some qualifications. The Brighton fishing boats, for example, run in under sail in the worst weather, and with a heavy sea on and broken water, and it is seldom that an accident happens. They are, as every one knows, of the shape of half a walnut shell, and have good free board.

We cannot quite assent to the axiom of giving the utmost way to a boat in meeting a heavy sea, especially if it be short and breaking. In such case it is more prudent to diminish the speed, for the same reason that, in sailing craft beating to windward in bad weather and a heavy sea, it is often advisable to haul a headsail to weather to deaden the way, and meet the sea more easily. In hard westerly gales, pilot-boats and small craft, beating through the Needles on the falling weather tide, can only make their passage over the Bridge with their foresails hauled to windward, not hove to, but keeping way on but diminished way. The same principle must apply to rowing boats, especially if strongly manned, as life-boats generally are.

From Poems by Elizabeth Barrett.

THE SLEEP.

Come unto me all ye who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

Or all the thoughts of God that are Borne inward unto souls afar,
Along the Psalmist's music deep —
Now tell me if that any is,
For gift or grace, surpassing this —
"He giveth His beloved, sleep"?

What would we give to our beloved?
The hero's heart, to be unmoved —
The poet's star-tuned harp, to sweep —
The senate's shout to patriot vows —
The monarch's crown, to light the brows?
"He giveth His beloved, sleep."

What do we give to our beloved?
A little faith, all undisproved —
A little dust, to overweep —
And bitter memories, to make
The whole earth blasted for our sake?
"He giveth His beloved, sleep."

"Sleep soft, beloved!" we sometimes say,
But have no tune to charm away
Sad dreams that through the eyelids creep;
But never doleful dream again Shall break the happy slumber, when
"He giveth His beloved, sleep!"

O earth, so full of dreary noises!
O men, with wailing in your voices!
O delved gold, the wailer's heap!
O strife, O curse, that o'er it fall!
God makes a silence through you all,
And giveth His beloved, sleep!

His dews drop mutely on the hill;
His cloud above it saileth still,
Though on its slope men toil and reap!
More softly than the dew is shed,
Or cloud is floated overhead,
"He giveth His beloved, sleep."

Yea! men wonder while they scan
A living, thinking, feeling man,
In such a rest his heart to keep;
But angels say — and through the word
I ween their blessed smile is heard —
"He giveth His beloved, sleep!"

For me my heart that erst did go
Most like a tired child at a show,
That sees through tears the jugglers leap,
Would now its wearied vision close,
Would childlike on His love repose,
Who giveth His beloved, sleep!

And friends! dear friends! when it shall be
That this low breath is gone from me,
And round my bier ye come to weep —
Let one, most loving of you all — Say, "Not a tear must o'er her fall!" —
"He giveth His beloved sleep!"

ON CHOICE IN MARRIAGE.

MANAGEMENT IN PROMOTING MARRIAGE.

If an unreasonable opposition to a daughter's choice be not to prevail, I think that, on the other hand, the parents, if their views of marriage be pure from worldliness, are justified in using a good deal of management—not more than they very often do use, but more than they are wont to avow or than society is wont to countenance—with a view to putting their daughters in the way of such marriages as they can approve. It is the way of the world to give such management an ill name—probably because it is most used by those who abuse it to worldly purposes; and I have heard a mother pique herself on never having taken a single step to get her daughters married—which appeared to me to have been a dereliction of one of the most essential duties of a parent. If the mother be wholly passive, either the daughters must take steps and use management for themselves (which is not desirable), or the happiness and the most important interests of their lives, moral and spiritual, must be the sport of chance and take a course purely fortuitous; and in many situations, where unsought opportunities of choice do not abound, the result may be not improbably such a love and marriage as the mother and every one else contemplate with astonishment. Some such astonishment I recollect to have expressed on an occasion of the kind to an illustrious poet and philosopher, whose reply I have always borne in mind when other such cases have come under my observation: "We have no reason to be surprised, unless we know what may have been the young lady's opportunities. If Miranda had not fallen in with Ferdinand, she would have been in love with Caliban."

But management, if it is to be recommended, must be good management, and not the management by which young ladies are hurried from ball-room to ball-room, so that a hundred preliterations may give one chance to be swallowed. A very few ball-rooms will afford the means of introduction and selection of acquaintances; and the intercourse which, by imparting a real knowledge of the dispositions, will give the best facilities for choice, will be that which is withdrawn, by one remove and another, from gay metropolitan assemblies—first, to intercourse in country places; secondly, to domestic society. Our present manners admit, perhaps, too much freedom of intercourse in public, too little in private. The light familiarity of festive meetings is carried far enough, further than tends to attach; but the graver intimacy is wanting. Milton complained that in his time, choice in marriage was difficult, because there was not "that freedom of access, granted or presumed, as may suffice for a perfect discerning till too late."* In our age the freedom of access is sufficient; but the access is, for the most part, at times and places where nothing can be discerned but the features of a restless and whirling life. And if Milton could say, "Who knows not that the bashful muteness of a virgin may oftentimes hide all the unliveliness and natural sloth which is really unfit for conversation," we, on the other hand, who cannot reasonably complain of the bashful muteness of the virgins, may be in our own way perplexed in the attempt to discover what is the life that lies beneath those dancing and glancing outsides of which we see so much.

It may be observed, I think, that women of high intellectual endowments and much dignity of deportment have the greatest difficulty in marrying, and stand most in need of a mother's help. And this not because they are themselves fastidious, for they are often as little so as any, but because men are not humble enough to wish to have their superiors for their wives.

Great wealth in a woman tends to keep at a distance both the proud and the humble, leaving the unhappy live-bait to be snapped at by the hardy and the greedy. If the wealthy father of an only daughter could be gifted with a knowledge of what parental care and kindness really is, it is my assured belief that he would disinherit her. If he leaves her his wealth, the best thing for her to do is to marry the most respectable person she can find of the class of men who marry for money. An heiress remaining unmarried is a prey to all manner of extortion and imposition, and with the best intentions becomes, through ill-administered expenditure and misdirected bounty, a corruption to her neighborhood and a curse to the poor; or if experience shall put her on her guard, she will lead a life of resistance and suspicion, to the injury of her own mind and nature.

In the case, therefore, of either high endowments or great wealth in a daughter, the care of a parent is peculiarly needed to multiply her opportunities of making a good choice in marriage; and in no case can such care be properly pretermitted.

DUE MATURITY FOR MARRIAGE.

When the mother takes no pains, the marriage of the daughter, even if not in itself ineligible, is likely to be unduly deferred. For the age at which marriages are to be contracted, is a very material consideration. Aristotle was of opinion that the bridegroom should be thirty-seven years of age and the bride eighteen; alleging physical reasons, which I venture to think exceedingly inconclusive. Eighteen for the bride is the least to be objected to, and would yet be rather early in this climate. A girl of that age may be not absolutely unprepared for marriage : but she has hardly had time for that longing and yearning affection which is to be her best security after. Sir Thomas More, in accounting for Jane Shore's infidelity to her husband, observes, that " foresmuch as they wer coupled ere she wer wel ripe, she not very fervently loved for whom she never longed." But whether or not the girl be to be considered ripe at eighteen, I know no good reason, moral or physical, why the man should withhold himself till seven-and-thirty, and many excellent reasons against it. Some few years of seniority on the part of the man I do conceive to be desirable ; and on this, as well as on other grounds, the woman should marry young : for if the woman were to be past her first youth and the man to be some years older, it follows that the man would remain longer unmarried than it is good for him to be alone.

The woman should marry, therefore, rather before than after that culminating period of personal charm, which, varying much in different individuals, is but a short period in any, and occurs in early youth in almost all. She should marry between twenty and thirty years of age, but nearer the former than the latter period. Now the man at such an age would probably be too light for the man's part in marriage ; and the more so when marrying a wife equally young. For, when two very young people are joined together in matrimony, it is as if one sweet pea should be put as a prop to another. The man, therefore, may be considered most marriageable when he is nearer thirty than twenty, or perhaps when he is a little beyond thirty. If his marriage be deferred much longer there is some danger of his becoming hardened in celibacy. In the case of a serious and thoughtful man, it need not be deferred so long ; for, in such a case, a remark made in a letter of Lord Bacon's will probably be verified — that a man finds himself seven years older the day after his marriage.

There are other motives and circumstances besides those connected with prudence, which, in the case of men, militate against early marriages. If their first passion (as it happens with most first passions) have issued in a disappointment, and if they have passed through their disappointment without being betrayed, by the heart's abhorrence of its vacuum, into some immediate marriage of the pis-aller kind, resorted to for mere purposes of repose, they will probably find that a first seizure of the kind guarantees them for a certain number of years against a second. In the mean time, the many interests, aspirations, and alacrities of youth, its keen pursuits and its fresh hardships, fill up the measure of life, and make the single heart sufficient to itself. It is when these things have partly passed away, and life has lost something of its original brightness, that men begin to feel an insufficiency and a want. I have known it to be remarked by a Roman Catholic priest, as the result of much observation of life amongst his brethren, that the pressure of their vow of celibacy was felt most severely towards forty years of age.

If a man have fairly passed that period without marrying or attempting marriage, then, I think, or very soon after, he may conclude that there is no better fortune in store for him, and dispose himself finally for the life celibate.

Till age, refrain not ; but if old, refrain, says one of the shrewdest of the unpoetical poets.*

UNNATURAL ALLIANCE.

The marriages of old men to young women are, for the most part, as objectionable in their motives as in their results ; and the mistake of such marriages is generally as great as the moral misfeasance. There is no greater error of age than to suppose that it can recover the enjoyment of youth by possessing itself of what youth only can enjoy ; and age will never appear so unlovely as when it is seen with such an ill-sorted accompaniment—

A chaplet of forced flowers on Winter's brow
Seems not less inharmonious to me
Than the untimely snow on the green leaf.

For the young women who make such marriages there is sometimes more to be said than for the old men. When the motives are mercenary, there is nothing to be said for them ; and but little when the case is one of weak consent to the mercenary baseness of parents, or when they sacrifice themselves (as they will sometimes allege) in a rich alliance for the relief of a large family of destitute brothers and sisters. These are but beggarly considerations, and might be eagerly plead in defence of a less disguised prostitution. But a case will sometimes occur in which a young woman is dazzled by great achievements or renown ; and what is heroic or illustrious may inspire a feeling which, distinct though it be from that which youth inspires in youth, is yet not unimaginative, and may suffice to sanctify the marriage vow. And there is another case, not certainly to be altogether vindicated and yet not to be visited with much harshness of censure, in which a woman who has had her heart broken, seeks, in this sort of marriage, such an asylum as, had she been a Roman Catholic, she might have found in a convent.

LEPROSY IN NORWAY.

Messrs. Editors:—Much has been said of late in the papers relative to this disease, both as to its being "contagious," not contagious, "a misnomer to call it leprosy," "a scrofula," "curable," "incurable," and also that "its publication is made at the instigation of the Norwegian government, for the purpose of throwing impediments in the way of emigration." As a native of that country, permit me to state a few facts derived from many years' personal observation, and full five years' frequent intercourse with the diseased, being at that time connected with one of the establishments in Bergen, which furnished medicines to the hospital for that disease, the only one in the country, which was established many years ago, to which is attached one physician, one minister, and a church, in which is held weekly religious services.

The appearance of the disease is generally very loathsome. The parts of their bodies exposed to view are often covered with large knots on the face, eyes affected, with loss of nose, of fingers, of toes, limbs swollen, voice hoarse, amounting in many to a faint whisper, and those whose appearance shows less disease, suffer more internally from pains, to alleviate which, with internal and external applications, is the most that medical science has as yet affected.

This disease does not show itself at any particular age, but appears in children from the age of ten, up to the aged of sixty. Its first symptoms, I believe, are hoarseness and the knotty appearance of the skin, and when this shows itself, the person is generally provided with a certificate from the physician, the parish minister, or a magistrate, to the trustees of the hospital, where, after examination, he is admitted.

Bergen is situated on the south-west coast of Norway, in latitude sixty degrees and forty-eight minutes, near the North sea, and the diseased come from a little more south of Bergen, and northerly all along the coast, as high up as to the seventieth degree.

The occupation of these people is mostly connected with the fisheries, but also with the forest and agriculture. It is, as before observed, not confined to any particular age, nor is it frequent that more than one member of a family is afflicted. A father, a mother, a child may be diseased, but none else in the family; and again, the disease disappears in one or two generations, when it reappears. Those less diseased are permitted to walk abroad in the city, and dispose of the few articles made by their fellow-sufferers, and to the disagreeable sight of these unfortunate beings, the citizens have been accustomed from childhood.

The hospital is, in part, supported by the government. The number of its inmates has varied from eighty to one hundred and twenty, the average being about one hundred, some of whom arrive at old age. When I left Bergen, twenty-three years ago, I was not aware that any serious attempt had been made to cure this disease, but I remember some quacks in the medical profession made unsuccessful attempts.

A number of years ago, the attending physician, Dr. Danielsen, who had made this subject his study, was sent by the government to Paris and other parts of Europe, where diseases of similar symptoms had formerly existed, to study and collect every fact that could aid him in his investigation. He returned in due time, with fair prospects of beneficial results. A large edifice has been erected outside the city, in a healthy and beautiful location, under his superintendence, furnished with many of the modern improvements. I went over the whole building, with a medical friend, four years ago, and found it far more comfortable than the old one, in which I had been a frequent visitor. In this, Dr. D., who was then out of town, has greater facilities to accomplish his object, to which he has devoted himself, and from which I have been expecting to hear happy results.

The cause of this disease is yet unknown. The generally adopted opinion is, that it is caused by the constant living on fish, too frequently badly prepared, together with the too little attention paid to personal cleanliness, which characterizes some of the districts in which this disease mostly prevails. For this supposition there is some foundation. Bergen, and Bergenhuus Stift (State) derives its prosperity from the great fisheries all along its coast and in its numerous bays; and to that part of the country this frightful disease is mostly confined; it is not often found in the interior.

Norway is an independent kingdom. Its nominal head is the King of Sweden, who is also king of Norway. She has her own flag, is republican in principles, has a most excellent and liberal constitution, to which her independent but law-abiding sons are much attached. There is no nobility, and every farmer is master of his own soil. Most of the municipal authorities in the cities and in the country are elected by the people, who also elect their representatives to the Storting (Congress), consisting of two houses, which makes the laws, regulates the financial affairs of the country, and meets every three years—for about six months—and oftener, if convened by the king on extraordinary occasions. His power is very limited; he possesses, however, the veto power—but if the Storting passes the same bill at three successive sessions, then it becomes a law without his approval.

I heard great regret expressed at the leaving of so many able-bodied men for this country, which a sparsely peopled country, like that of Norway, of one million and a half of inhabitants, could ill afford to lose; whom she has nursed and educated in their younger days, and now, when they have arrived at manhood and should reward her with usefulness, they dispose of their farms and property, and with the precious metal in their pockets, leave their native land, where honest industry is rewarded, religion is respected, schools are established everywhere, knowledge is extended, and the benefits of their good constitution are daily developing themselves, and go to a distant land to meet uncertainties, and from where conflicting reports are received as to their improved condition. Such are the common expressions heard there. In order to ascertain from a reliable source their true condition here, the government instituted, a few years ago, thorough inquiries through her diplomatic agent here, with the view of spreading correct information among the people, in case erroneous ideas existed there of their being able to better their condition here.

From the long connection with Denmark — from which country Norway was separated in 1814 — she has been governed by Danish laws, many of which are antiquated, but essentially altered in the latter years; still, when a person will leave the country permanently for a foreign land, the laws require certain forms to be gone through, which are tedious, and thus far act as an impediment to his leaving.

From the foregoing the reader may form some idea of the disease, and how far the government interferes with emigration.

AMERICAN AND FRENCH MANNERS, &C.

A LETTER from Moscow speaks of the apparition of a French translation of Uncle Tom there. The book has not been authorized by the police, but its circulation is, nevertheless, not prohibited. It seems that the word Uncle, used in America as a term of attachment towards a faithful slave, exists also in the Russian language, and is employed by a master when speaking of, or to, a favorite serf. Copies of the book are rare there, and they pass from hand to hand, to be returned again in two hours. They are carried, says the letter in question, by confidential servants, wrapped up in silk or muslin, like a newly born baby. A Russian translation is spoken of, the sale of which would be authorized by the Czar.

In connection with the great negro romance, I notice a singular piece of affectation among the Parisians. It is the fashion to call it by its English name, and not by its French title. No one speaks of it as La Case de l'Oncle Tom. Everybody seeks to give it its appellation in the vernacular. The favorite method of pronunciation seems to be this: "Onkle's Tom's Cabin's" — with a plural or a possessive case at the end of each word. In this way, the speaker passes for an accomplished linguist.

The Palais Royal produces a parody of the novel almost immediately. Uncle Tom is to be a white man, wrecked on the coast of Africa, and reduced to slavery by the natives.

Newly arrived Americans always express an unmingled surprise at contrasting a ball-room here with the ball-rooms they have left behind. The distinguishing features of difference are the form and manners of the young unmarried ladies at home, and their retiring demeanor here. This difference is worth making a note of. Married ladies upon the Continent sway and give a tone to society, while in America, it is to those ladies whose youth and extent of experience render their conversation and manners anything but instructive or interesting, that the task of sustaining social intercourse is committed. True, you all know what a young lady in a ball-room is at home. Let me say in a few words what she is in a ball-room here.

In the first place, a young unmarried lady is expected to dress modestly and simply. She cannot wear velvet or lace; she cannot dress in yellow; she cannot wear jewelry, except perhaps ear-rings, containing each a single diamond, with as little setting as possible. It is only of late that she has been allowed to have flounces to her gowns, and to arrange her hair with artificial flowers. She may wear false pearls, but not real ones — may wear necklaces and bracelets of coral, ivory, Venice, small agates, &c., but not of precious stones. She cannot go to a ball without her mother or an elderly lady to chaperon her; she cannot go alone with her father. She stays with her mother or chaperon throughout the evening, except when she dances; and then does not leave her place till the music gives the signal, and returns to it the moment the dance is over. She cannot promenade with her partner — a tête-à-tête is hopeless; a private interview in a corner, or behind a curtain, would compromise her forever. The free and easy manners of an American parlor transported into the Faubourg St. Germain, would make a Frenchman imagine he was in a bedlam broke loose.

This restraint is necessary for many reasons. A gentleman, invited by the lady of a house, is considered authorized to ask any lady present to dance, without introduction. It is evident, however, that he cannot expect to become an acquaintance, or to claim anything further than the honor of the dance. Again, if the same facilities were allowed in France for the intimacy of young women and young men that are permitted in America, the most disorganizing consequences would ensue. At home I believe that the freedom of intercourse between the sexes leads to but little disorder and laxity of morals. I have heard that our young ladies go alone to the theatre with young men, go to walk with them, to ride with them (sleigh-riding even), and come home no wiser than they went, or perhaps only a kiss or two the worse. This would be utterly out of the question here. A young lady, seen walking or riding with a gentleman in Paris, would be at once supposed to have lost all she had worth keeping; and probably the supposition would be correct. If insurmountable obstacles are thrown in the way by a greater familiarity between masters and misses, it is because they have been found indispensable.

American families that live here as residents, are of course obliged to bring up their daughters in the French fashion. They never leave their mother's side, and walking, driving and theatre-going with them is as much out of the question as keeping company with the stars.

But families not familiar with Paris, sometimes make a very strange appearance without knowing it. I remember to have seen, some time since, a very beautiful young lady walking arm-in-arm with a daring-looking New Yorker, on the Champs Elysées! They had been accustomed to do so, I believe, on Fifth-avenue. I thought it my duty to go straight to the fair offender's mother, and remonstrate against a proceeding so inadmissible. The young lady hates me to this day, though she now knows enough of French manners to blush scarlet whenever she thinks of the appearance she must have made, on her first and last promenade. In an American parlor, too, one night, I saw a Boston girl, who supposed herself still in Summer-street, get behind a door and talk through the crack with a Baltimore boy! Two French ladies who were in the room, seriously contemplated rushing out of the house, as they were hardly sure that the place was respectable. Not wishing to earn this girl's hatred, too, I got somebody else to immolate himself, and to restore the two French ladies' composure.

SECOND AMERICAN EXPEDITION IN SEARCH OF SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

THE new Grinnell Arctic expedition, which is shortly to proceed in search of Sir John Franklin, is to be commanded by Dr. Kane, an officer eminently qualified for the task. Though serving previously in only a subordinate capacity, he greatly distinguished himself by his intelligence and the energy he displayed. He stands especially preëminent in one essential qualification—confidence. That Sir John Franklin still exists, and can be rescued by human means, is Dr. Kane's firm belief. His heart is thoroughly in the enterprise, and as long as a vestige of hope remains his hand will not fail to adopt those measures most necessary to discover the missing navigator and his party.

Although success has not attended previous expeditions, there are yet many grounds for further and continued efforts being made. The discoveries up to the present time afford conclusive proofs that Sir John Franklin passed the winter of 1845-6 on Beechy Island, at the mouth of Wellington Channel. Whether in the spring he proceeded up this channel westward or northward is doubtful. The former course was enjoined by his instructions, but a search by means of sledges in that direction, extending along the south shore to long. 103° 25', and along the north shore to long. 114° 20', has afforded no indication that such was the course actually pursued. That the two missing ships may be blocked up in some of the passages or inlets not yet explored is still very possible. Both the English and the American officers entertain the opinion that Sir John Franklin proceeded by the open sea north-west of Wellington and Victoria Channels, and is closed in by the almost unlimited region of water, ice, and land, extending between Victoria Channel and the lofty and immense tracts of land north of West Georgia, considered by some as a continuation of a range of mountains seen off Cape Jakan, on the coast of Asia. Two years ago Captain Penny stated it to be his decided conviction that there is a great polar basin with a higher temperature than that of the Arctic zone, abounding with animal life and ample means for human subsistence. Captain Englefield, who lately returned from a short cruise in the Arctic Ocean, substantiates this opinion of Penny's. He attained the latitude of 78° 35', or one hundred and twenty miles further to the northward than the highest point ever before reached. Having passed through a channel, the width of thirty-five miles, he found before him a vast expanse of open water. He endeavored to proceed further, but was obliged to desist in consequence of a terrific gale of wind, which his steamer was inadequately adapted to encounter. Captain Englefield is of opinion that Baffin's Bay is a wrong term—that it is, in reality, an arm of communication between the Atlantic and Arctic Oceans.

The past explorations tend rather to strengthen than weaken the chances of the safety of Sir John Franklin's expedition. If, at the outset, it was improbable that the two ships should have simultaneously perished, it is still more improbable that they should have been so utterly lost as not to leave behind some remnant of wreck to tell their fate. No such remnant, however, has been found, either by the vessels in search, or by the parties who, on sledges, have explored the coasts for hundreds of miles. There is no satisfactory proof that the disappearance of the Erebus and Terror is to be attributed to storms, or to the want of sufficient food to support the existence of their crews. We rejoice, therefore, to find that this humane search has not been abandoned—that, through the liberality of Mr. Henry Grinnell and Mr. George Peabody, a second expedition is fitting out, reflecting honor on the name of America and much credit on the American government for the interest it evinces in, and the active coöperation it has afforded to, the enterprise. May the undertaking be as successful in its result as it has been noble in its aim! — Times.

ENGLISH DULNESS AND STUBBORNNESS.

THE proper description of human progress may be said to be from the impossible to the possible, from the possible to the probable, and from the probable to the actual. These different stages are, however, by no means of the same length. The great difficulty with those who would innovate and improve is to persuade the English mind that such innovations and improvements are possible. This point once gained we may be sure success is near at hand; for it seems to be a habit of the public stubbornly to deny the practicability of anything which is not about immediately to take place. Napoleon told Bourienne never to mention to him "that beast of a word," and we heartily wish that a similar exclusion could be enforced in favor of the English vocabulary. A man's life in these days is spent in the realization of impossibilities, in fervently denying one week what he sees put in practice the next. So wedded are we to custom, so hampered by precedent, so enslaved by habit, that we cannot bring ourselves to believe that what is wrong in our proceedings can possibly be corrected, or what is right in the practices of our neighbors can possibly be adopted. The Committee of the House of Commons which pronounced railways "impossible," scoffed at the draining of Chat-moss, and rejected the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Bill out of mercy to the demented projectors, was too faithful a type of the English mind. Active and indefatigable within its own range it recoils with a pusillanimous horror before whatever is new and untried.

Few of our readers will probably agree to remarks at once so sweeping and so paradoxical

cal; but let them suspend their judgment till they have heard us out, and then deny the truth of our assertion if they can. To begin with the objects nearest to us. The atmosphere we breathe is contaminated by the smoke of a hundred and fifty thousand chimneys. We live in the contact and under the influence of dirt, because it is "impossible" to apply well known scientific principles to the purification of our atmosphere. We submit to boundless imposition and insolence from a legion of privileged ruffians called cabmen, because it is "impossible" to place them under police regulations. Of six bridges over the Thames three must bear the whole traffic and be prematurely worn out in the service, because it is "impossible" to buy up the tolls and throw the others open to the public.—Hundreds of thousands of the poorer classes perish annually because it is "impossible" to enforce the most ordinary cleanliness or carry out the most obvious sanitary regulations. The Thames is converted from a noble river into a putrid ditch, because it is "impossible," in this poverty-stricken metropolis, to find money to carry out a complete system of drainage. The air is poisoned by intramural interments, because it is "impossible" to deal with the vested interests involved in piling up our pestilential churchyards with fresh heaps of festering mortality. We are condemned to drink water full of filthy elements, which filtration may clarify but cannot purify, because it is "impossible" to fix on one out of half-a-dozen excellent sites from which the pure fluid might be brought into the metropolis. It was long "impossible" to remove Smithfield, and that possibility has only been recognized on condition of its transference to a spot which will soon be as objectionable for a cattle market as its present position, and from which of course it will be equally "impossible" to remove it. Nineteen-twentieths of this city of London are denied the privilege of corporate self-government, and a twentieth has that privilege in such a way as to make one regret the exception, and wish the deprivation universal. But this absurdity cannot be remedied, because it is "impossible" to alter the constitution of the Corporation of the City of London. Everybody feels that it is a disgrace, an anomaly, and an anachronism that its resources are wasted and its offices disgraced; but it is "impossible" to reform it. This same corporation, has, by a succession of clauses fraudulently introduced into private acts of Parliament, and, lastly, by the barefaced trick of smuggling four words into an interpretation clause, rendering tributary to its revenues the rural population residing within twenty miles of St. Paul's; but the rural population must bear it as they may, for it is "impossible" to undo any iniquity which the Corporation of London has once perpetrated. Travellers by railway never feel confident when they start whether they shall reach their journey's end or be ground to powder in the process of locomotion; but travellers must be content to take their chance, for it is "impossible" to meddle with the management of railways. Directors advertise time tables, and give notice, fully carried out in fact, that they do not mean to adhere to their promise; but such divinity doth hedge a director that it is "impossible" to make him keep his word. Excursion trains have been proved to have a decidedly homicidal tendency, and goods' trains, sent to find their way as they can, to be the constant cause of destruction and of death. But it is "impossible" to prohibit excursion trains and oblige luggage trains, like those which carry passengers, to start and arrive at a particular hour. We have a coinage made as if on purpose to render computation difficult and intricate; but it is "impossible" to do violence to the habits of the people by introducing the simple remedy of a decimal system. A penny cannot be anything except the twelfth part of a shilling, or a farthing anything but the fourth part of a penny. Our usual heaped measures are peculiarly liable to fraud; but it would be "impossible" to sell by weight. Pint and quart bottles are rapidly receding into the regions of ancient, or even mythical, history; but it is "impossible" to enact that all bottled liquors which are sold shall contain an aliquot part of a gallon. There is no stronger wish in the public mind than to be allowed to form partnerships with limited liability; but this, though it can be done everywhere else, is "impossible" in England. France and America have reduced their laws to a code; but the English law cannot be codified. Our statutes are a mass of verbiage, contradiction, and repetition; but, though everybody is bound to understand them, it is "impossible" for anybody to simplify them or reduce them to common sense. Ancient Rome and modern America could assess the whole property of the country at its actual value, and levy taxes upon it with ease and simplicity; but, though it is quite feasible in England to tax income, which is one kind of property—land, which is another—or legacies, which are a third, it is "impossible" to assess all property and make the tax just by making it uniform. We are afraid of invasion, but it is "impossible" to recall our troops from Canada, where they are useless; or from the West Indies, where they perish ingloriously of the yellow fever; or from the Cape, where they are worse than useless, to defend the citadel and centre of our empire. Something might, indeed, be done by our fleet; but it is "impossible" to keep a fleet in the Channel, or recall from the Mediterranean a squadron alternately engaged in frightening the kings of Naples and of

Greece. In another column will be found a sample of Indian impossibilities. It is "impossible" to spend fifty pounds a-year to keep a channel open and preserve a revenue of four thousand a-year. There appear to be public works in Madras which would yield from fifty to a hundred per cent.; but it is "impossible" to execute them. The extract will show that India is the very paradise of impossibilities.

We apprehend, that we have made out our case, though we have by no means exhausted our subject—a feat which we believe to be, among all the "impossibilities" we have mentioned, the only real and insuperable impossibility.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL DISCOVERIES.

ONE of the most important and interesting archæological discoveries that has for some time been made has been effected in that part of the Kingdom of Naples commonly known by the name of Puglia (Apulia), which formed a portion of Magna Græcia. I believe it is known to many that Cavalier Carlo Bonucci, architect and director-general of antiquities and excavations in this kingdom for twenty-five years, has recently discovered, near Canosa, founded by Diomedes, a subterranean necropolis, quite entire. Its principal entrance is decorated with four doric columns, two niches for statues, and a second line of Ionic columns, all of slight and elegant proportions, and of a workmanship which recalls the best age of art—that between Pericles and Alexander. This elegant entrance was painted in various colors, which produced an effect not less pleasing than surprising. This specimen of the polychromatic architecture is valuable for its high state of preservation, its freshness, and for the classic time to which it belongs. Entering the city in question, over which time and death have spread an eternal silence, we find streets which lead to various groups of dwellings. The gates are decorated with elegant ionic columns, whose capitals present the accessory ornament of a festoon. Signor Bonucci tells me, that on entering the chambers he found everything arranged in its place as it had been left twelve centuries ago. The walls were covered with linen embroidered in gold;—garlands of flowers, withered it is true, but preserving all their forms, hung in festoons from the ceiling. All kinds of furniture and precious vases were distributed about in the most varied and graceful manner. Here were to be seen statues of marble—busts of deities and priestesses in terra cotta, beautifully painted—vases of "creta" of an extraordinary size, on which are represented the most interesting scenes of private life, and the most classical traditions of mythology. Of these I spoke in a recent letter as having just arrived at the Museo Borbonico. They are not yet arranged, but yesterday I was favored with a nearer and a longer inspection. On the larger vase, which is of gigantic size and is still unpacked, though lying exposed, Homer is painted with the lyre in his hands, as if he were singing some passage of the Iliad or the Odyssey. In the midst of all these treasures and miracles of art of every form, lay the mistress of the house reposing tranquilly as though she slept. So great was the illusion, that one might have almost said "She is not dead, but sleepeth." She rested on a gilt bronze bed, supported by friezes, figures, and genii, exquisitely carved in ivory. In the adjoining chambers, which were all filled with the same wealth, lay her daughters and servants. These young girls were still clothed with dresses embroidered with gold. Their heads were surrounded with garlands of gold which represented the sacred flowers of Proserpine, in the midst of which were sporting, as it were, birds and insects. Other garlands there were of roses:—some wore diadems covered with precious stones finished in the highest style of art. One of these I saw yesterday in private hands, and nothing can exceed its extreme beauty. The ears of these children of death were all ornamented with pendants of various forms, and their necks with necklaces in which emeralds and hyacinths were interwoven with chains of gold. Two of these, which were obtained by contraband means, I have also seen. The arms were ornamented with bracelets of a spiral form, or winding as a serpent. An abundant and sumptuous table was laid by their side. The fruits consisted of pomegranates, pines, the corns of the fir pine, and apples—whilst the flowers were narcissuses, hyacinths and asphodels, apparently fresh. They were made either of painted "creta," of colored glass, or of rock crystal. Their styles were made of metal threads, with green smalt, or simply gilt. The plates, basins, cups and every other article necessary for dinner, and the lamps which were to shed their light upon it, were of an extraordinary size, and all of glass. This glass was formed of a kind of paste worked in mosaic, with the most beautiful designs, in which were interspersed small bits, or dice, of gold. On some of the plates were painted landscapes, and others were ornamented with lines of gold representing elegant and sumptuous edifices. These discoveries were terminated only about the middle of last year; and it has occurred to me that, now while we are seeking for all the wonders of art with which to adorn the crystal palace at Sydenham, it is right to make known to the British public the above extraordinary facts. The plans and the designs are all in the hands of Cavalier Carlo

Bonucci;—and I am not aware that they came under the notice of the Commissioners from the Crystal Palace Company during their hurried visit to the capital.

In sending you the above notices, I feel almost as if they would be received with incredulity;—indeed, as I write it appears that I am wandering again among fairy scenery. But I have seen at least a portion of the objects which have been recovered,—and surely nothing so exquisite or graceful have I ever beheld.

CLING TO THY MOTHER.

CLING to thy mother, for she was the first

To know thy being and to feel thy life;

The hope of thee through many a pang she nursed,

And when, 'midst anguish like the parting strife,

The babe was in her arms, the agony

Was all forgot for bliss of loving thee.

Be gentle to thy mother! long she bore

Thine infant fretfulness and silly youth;

Nor rudely scorn the faithful voice that o'er

Thy cradle played, and taught thy lisping truth.

Yes, she is old, yet on thy manly brow

She looks, and claims thee as her child e'en now.

Uphold thy mother! close to her warm heart

She carried, fed thee, lulled thee to thy rest;

Then taught thy tottering limbs their untried art,

Exulting in the fledgling from her nest;

And now her steps are feeble, be her stay,
Whose strength was thine in thy most feeble day.

Cherish thy mother! brief perchance the time

May be that she will claim the care she gave

Passed are her hopes of youth, her harvest prime

Of joy on earth; her friends are in the grave.

But for her children she could lay her head

Gladly to rest among the precious dead.

Be tender with thy mother! words unkind,

Or light neglect from thee, would give a pang

To that fond bosom, where thou art enshrined

In love unutterable, more than fang

Of venom'd serpent. Wound not her strong trust,

As thou would'st hope for peace when she is dust.

Oh! mother mine! God grant I ne'er forget,

Whatever be my grief, or what my joy,

The untreaured, the inextinguishable debt

I owe thy love; but find my sweet employ

Ever, through thy remaining days, to be

To thee as faithful as thou wert to me.

THE DUEL.

How I became acquainted with the circumstances I am about to narrate, or when they occurred, the reader must not inquire. I have taken the liberty of arranging the incidents, so that their narration will afford no clue whatever to the solution of these questions. The reader must be content to accept of the assurance of an old friend, that the narrative of this chapter is a true account of events which, to my own knowledge, did actually occur.

Ellen Irving was the only child of a clergyman, well known and respected in the neighborhood of Dublin; a man distinguished in the church by every quality calculated to ensure popularity and command respect, he filled for many years a prominent position in the public eye. By the mysterious dispensations of that Providence which so often takes away "the excellent of the earth," just when earth seems to want their excellence most, he was removed in the very prime of his life, and the very height of his usefulness. A beautiful monument in the parish church of —, erected by his surviving parishioners, bears record that they felt his removal as a bereavement. Just over the costly memorial of his people's grief, a small marble tablet, plain and unadorned, except a deep sable border can be called an ornament, records, in a few simple and expressive lines, the sorrow of his widow—a sorrow far transcending the grief, the tale of which is inscribed on the proud monument below.

I might have taken another and a shorter method of telling my readers that his wife survived him; but I confess I have never gazed on that tablet without feeling my heart touched—as if there was something in its erection that told better than many words the character of her that placed it there. In the monument below there was enough, more than enough, to satisfy the vanity of grief. The public tribute to public worth—the long inscription where the sculptured figures bear the storied urn, and art has chiselled with her choicest imitation the forms of mourning—here there was more than enough to satisfy the vanity of woe—the only sacred vanity of the heart; but over and above it all, more precious in its simplicity, more touching in its unpretending sorrow, is placed the simple tablet, which is the offering to the memory of the dead, of her to whom that memory was most hallowed. The heart of the widow demands for its memories a tribute peculiar to themselves. The grief with which no stranger can intermeddle, would not unite in its record with the sorrows of the multitude.

At the time of her father's death, Ellen was about seven years of age. With this child of many hopes and many prayers, Mrs. Irving retired to a secluded residence near the village of Clontarf. Her husband, unlike but too many of the clergy, had left his family in a competence which amounted almost to affluence. Mrs. Irving was induced to select Clontarf as her place of residence, by the vicinity of her husband's only brother, a gentleman who had acquired a large fortune as a merchant. He had never married. His sister, a lady who had some time passed the period when ill-nature attaches to unmarried ladies the name of old maid, had lived with him for many years. He made no secret of his resolution to die an old bachelor; and, being warmly attached to his brother, he had declared his intention of leaving the great mass of his large fortune to Ellen. After Mr. Irving's death he had earnestly pressed Mrs. Irving to make his house her home. This offer, however, that lady had declined. With all that was amiable and upright in his character, the merchant united a deep respect for religion; neither he, however, nor his sister seemed to feel its importance, as Mrs. Irving had been taught by her husband to do. She knew that the first wish of his heart was that Ellen should be trained up with more than a respect for religion, and Mrs. Irving believed that she could better fulfil his wishes by keeping Ellen in a home, over all the management of which she herself should have the full control. A beautifully situated cottage, as it was called, was procured for her in the immediate neighborhood of her brother-in-law's residence. This arrangement gave her all the advantages of his society and his counsel, while it left her still to bring up her child in a home where she should learn to see piety the regulating principle of every movement.

My readers must suppose some years to have elapsed, and time, of course, to have brought its change on all parties. The old maid, Miss Irving, had become Mrs.—not by the regular title of matrimony, but by that unauthorized assumption of maternal dignity, which some one has facetiously termed brevet-rank. The merchant had grown older and richer, and as his hairs grew whiter, his disposition appeared to grow still more kind. Ellen's mother was beginning to sink with years; sorrow had hastened on the steps of old age; and Ellen herself had become a woman, and, without flattery, a lovely woman. Descriptions of female beauty are justly excluded from all narratives of which the writers desire to pretend to the reputation of common sense. Without any piratical interference with the peculiar property of fashionable novel-writers—an interference which would be as cruel as dishonest—I may perhaps be permitted to say that Ellen was now about twenty-two years of age, rather low of stature, with black hair, features full of intelligence and good-humor, a very white and high forehead, and eyes through which "her soul looked," and that soul was full of softness and affection. My readers may fill up the description as they choose.

I must, too, introduce them to a new character, with whom it is desirable, for the progress of my narrative, that they should make acquaintance. Mrs. Irving's brother had been also a clergyman in the north of Ireland. He too had died, leaving an only child, but he left him nearly altogether unprovided for. Charles Wilson had just completed his first year in college, with distinguished success, when the unexpected death of his father left him parentless and almost penniless in the world. His mother was many years in her grave, and all he inherited from his father was a good name, and a few hundred pounds, to struggle through a world where a good name is said to be but a poor inheritance, and merit and talents without wealth are but too frequently despised.

As Charles stood by the grave of his father, he felt the bitterness of all this. He heard the clods of dust fall with a deep echo on the coffin of his parent, and it seemed like a knell to proclaim to him that he was alone in a cold and heartless world. In bitterness of soul he returned from the grave, which seemed to have covered all his hopes and prospects on earth.

It was necessary for him to remain a few days at his father's late abode. He was there alone; and during these days of solitude, it is easier to conceive than to describe the feelings that passed through his bosom. Few persons but those who have experienced them can ever conceive the mingled feelings which enter into the pride and the ambition of a young man, successful in his first entrance into college. Indistinct hopes of the future grow upon the imagination, and mix themselves up with the hallowed recollections of the past. Many a one that will read these pages will remember that the sweetest and most sacred ingredient in that honorable pride is the joy that success may bring to a parent's heart—the knowledge that a father's and a mother's eye will grow brighter at the news of the distinction of a son. Charles had felt all this. Many a time had his mind been excited in the laborious struggle of competition, by the thought of his father. Many a time had the satisfaction of his success been enhanced by the pride that glistened in his father's eye. It was a union in which the purest sympathies and emotions of our nature hallowed and beautified the passion for personal distinction, and the pride of personal success. But his father was now gone, never more to be glad at the honors of his boy—he felt his heart to be stricken down—the stay of his pride and his ambition was broken, and the feelings that leaned upon it hung drooping on the ground.

The violence of grief subsided into the cold and cheerless feeling of desolation. He regarded himself as an outcast on the world. He was poor, and he fancied himself friendless. His pride could not bear the notion of struggling with the real ills of poverty, and with a thousand others which he imagined to belong to it. He had confidence enough in his own talents to believe that he might depend on them, but when he thought of raising himself by their exercise, he felt as if he was a penniless adventurer, and his spirit could ill brook the taking of a character which the proud ones of the earth regard at once with suspicion and contempt. He was ready to give up all his prospects rather than meet the sneers and the repulses of a world which he pictured to himself all that was selfish and cold. A simple incident taught him a lesson, if not of truth, certainly one of usefulness.

The evening before he was to leave forever the place of his birth, he went alone to take a last farewell of his father's grave. Unseen, as he thought, by any eye, he threw himself upon its new laid turf, and he sobbed as if his heart would break.

All the feelings which I have attempted to describe rushed through his bosom. In bitterness of soul he wandered from tomb to tomb, until he came to the low wall by which the church-yard was separated from the parsonage where his infant days had been passed, but which never must be his home again. He had now no home. Every spot called back some recollection of former days—and the brown hues of a cloudy March evening, which was rapidly closing in, shed over each familiar spot a sombre character, that was suited to his state of mind. The little stream still purled through the grove, where many a time he had searched for the blue-bell or the May-flower. The old thorn still rose in its rude and jagged antiquity, behind the rustic seat, where his father had often taught him the lessons of religion. Every shrub was familiar; he could tell almost every blade of grass within the precincts of the place that "should know him no more." No wonder that his heart was full;—he leaned against the grave-yard wall, and again gave vent to his feelings in a flood of tears.

He was startled by a step close beside him—he turned round, unwilling that a stranger should have surprised him in his grief. It was a relief to him to find that it was old Robert Browne, sexton, who had known him from his childhood. He had been long a servant in his father's family; when appointed to the office of sexton, he occupied a cottage on the glebe land, and still regarded himself as a servant of "his reverence." There was something in his appearance suited to his office. His dress was sombre, and, without being threadbare, its shape and fashion was of the olden time. In one hand he carried a shovel, in the other the huge key of the church-yard gate. There was a slight hobble in his gait, which was perceptible as he trod upon each of the grave mounds with which the yard was full. He transferred the key to the hand which held the shovel, and touched his hat to Charles, with a respect that seemed accorded as much to his grief as his station.

"Master Charles," said the old man, "I don't wonder that you should take this sore to heart; but it's God's will, and the poor master was ready for it; he's happier in his grave to-night than many are out of it."

Charles muttered an indistinct assent.

"We must all submit to the will of God," continued the old man. "I ask your pardon, sir," he added, after a pause, "for being so bold; but let an old man that loved the poor master speak to you. I seen you, sir, when you were sobbing on the grave beyant. I thought your grief was more violent than a Christian's ought to be—more than your father would like to see. . . . We must all submit to God's will."

"It is not always easy," replied Charles. "You don't know, Robert, what it is to be left a lonely orphan in the world."

"Indeed, sir," replied the old man, "I knew it once;" and a sigh escaped him as he spoke. "Just at your age I was left without father and mother in one week; and what was more, I did n't know where to get my dinner the day after they were buried; and I thought my heart would sink in my bosom. But my mother's last words were to me, that God was the father of the fatherless—and they gave me comfort; and from that day to this I never knew what it was to want. And I have brought up a goodly family, and seen them all well settled in the world but Sally, that's with me yet, and is a comfort to my old age, and her mother's. Thank God, Master Charles, you're good at the learning, and got on well in the college; there is no fear but you'll come to good, though I often heard the poor master say he had nothing to leave you but a good name; but, indeed, as I said to his reverence, that was better than riches with a bad one."

"But Robert," said the other, "the world does not think so. It's a cold and heartless world for a person to go through; a good name is little thought of without money. It's a selfish world, Robert," said Charles, bitterly.

"Master Charles," replied the old man, "it's not for an ignorant man like me to teach a college-bred gentleman like yourself; but old men sometimes know things. Now, it's odd enough that a great many ladies and gentlemen, I've remarked, are fond of speaking that way of the world; but, in throth, I don't just think it's all out so bad; it's wicked enough, God help it, but ~~there~~ are many kind and good people in it; and us to selfish, why, every one looks to their own, as it's only proper they should; but, indeed, Master Charles, I believe that in the world there are plenty of people to do a good turn in reason to a neighbor. I never could understand them that was always complaining of the selfishness of the world, unless, may be, that they would expect that every one would put themselves out of their own way for them they might know nothing about, which to my mind would not be reasonable at all; but for kindness within reason, I think the world is far better than you might think, considering the wickedness that's in it."

There was something in the shrewd common sense of the old sexton that jarred upon the gloomy philosophy in which Charles had been indulging. Still he felt that there was truth in what he said; he mused for some time; at last he replied,

"I'm afraid, Robert, it's but a poor world for one without either money or friends to get on."

"Don't say that, Master Charles; if a man will stay complaining of the world, it's the long odds but he'll make reason for himself to find fault with it; but, if one will only just think nothing about whether the world's good or bad, but see what, with God's help, he can do for himself, and do it—and if he will trust, Master Charles, in One who is far better than any one on this earth, he'll find, I'm thinking, that the world's nothing to complain of, and wonder how ever he could have thought it so bad. Many persons, I'm thinking, complain of the world because it won't do for them that will do nothing for themselves."

Their conversation was interrupted by the appearance of Sally, the old man's daughter, of whom he had spoken. She came bounding over the graves as lightly as if nothing of death were under the sod—her long black hair flowing down upon her shoulders, and her black eyes laughing with the glee of youth. It was impossible to avoid being attracted by her singularly handsome figure, which her light step showed off to great advantage. On perceiving Charles she stopped and seemed confused; her confusion appeared to proceed from the feeling that her levity of manner was inconsistent with his grief. With a natural propriety of feeling, which often in persons of an humbler rank anticipates the effect of those conventional rules which bind their superiors, she stopped and sobered down her manner to a suitable gravity. With a blushing hesitation she offered her simple condolence.

"Master Charles, I'm sorry for your trouble, sir."

Charles' reply was anticipated by the reproof of her father for climbing over the church-yard wall. Sally, it seemed, had been sent by her mother to call the sexton to his supper, and had found a short way to fulfil her message over a part of the wall which had partly fallen down.

"Indeed, Sally," said the old man, "you are too wild; you are getting a woman now, and must not be getting on with the ways of a wild girl."

His reproof, however, was delivered in a mild tone, and he could not conceal the satisfaction with which he looked on the sylph-like form of his really handsome daughter. She looked up archly and said,

"Father, I'll get old and sober time enough. I'm only a wild girl yet. They say," she added thoughtfully, "that none know sorrow sooner than those that are born with a light heart; so I may make the most of mine;"

"Sally," said Robert, "Master Charles is leaving us to-morrow, for good and all," — his voice faltered as he spoke, — "the last of the old stock is going away" — and he struck the spade deep into the ground, and folded his arms across it. Sally's eyes filled with tears. "Well, God bless him wherever he goes. Master Charles," she added, "will you ever think of Glenvale, and the poor old parsonage here!"

Charles felt his emotions overcome him; large tears streamed down his cheeks. The little party were silent for some time; Charles leaned with his back to the wall, old Robert still resting on his spade, and Sally standing, looking wistfully up into the boughs of an old hawthorn that shot out its gnarled and straggling branches over the graves of the dead. The sexton was the first to break the silence; he spoke as if unconscious of the presence of his companions.

"Well, many a grave I have dug in this church-yard, and many a one, gentle and simple, I have seen laid low; but never did I grieve for mortal as for him that I last put in. I hope those that come after him may be like him."

He dropped the spade on which he had been leaning; he advanced towards Charles, and grasped both his hands. "Master Charles, God Almighty bless you, and keep you wherever you go; and maybe, when you are a great man in the college, you would sometimes be coming back to look at his reverence's grave; and I'm thinking, Master Charles, you'll be a very great man before you're too proud to come to see old Robert Browne; it would do my old eyes good if I could once see you in your father's pulpit, and yet, maybe I might live to see you made provost or some other post as good, in the college."

"Sally," said the old man, "bid Master Charles good-by; the old master was always fond of you — fonder nor one would think from your wild ways. I hope, when Master Charles sees you next, you'll not be as wild as you are now."

"I'm thinking maybe he'd find me wilder; but I pray God, he may see me as light-hearted, though indeed my heart is sore for the old master; but, father," she added thoughtfully, "they say that when a light-headed body comes under this old thorn they can spee; so I heard the people tell. Maybe it was speeing of me, that put into my head; so mind, Master Charles, when next we meet I may be wilder, but not so light-hearted."

She said these words in a half-solemn, half-cheerful tone of voice; there was the superstition she mentioned connected with the tree — that half-witted persons, when standing under it, became endowed with the gift of speeing or prophecy. She took Charles' offered hand — "Good-by, master Charles," she said, "God bless you and keep you; and maybe," she added, looking up at the tree, "when next we meet you'd have much need of his blessing."

Her father rebuked her for what he deemed her ill-timed levity.

"Indeed, father," she said, "I could not help it. Master Charles knows my heart is sad, God help me, for them that's gone; indeed, father, there is no lightness in my words; they come into my head, as if I could not help to say them; maybe they have their meaning. God bless you again, Master Charles."

Charles took her extended hand; he almost involuntarily imprinted on it a kiss; "Good-by, Sally, and God bless you."

As he grasped the rough hand of the old sexton he felt a warm tear fall on his own. "God bless you again," said the old man. "Mind, Master Charles, don't mind abusing the world, but see what you can do for yourself in it, and trust in God, sir. I'm like David, Master Charles; I have been young, and now am old, yet never saw I the righteous forsaken, or his seed — no, never, Master Charles, never" — He did not finish the quotation; he could not bear to use an expression that would even imply the possibility of his old pastor's son being brought to beggary.

This conversation the reader must suppose to have occurred a few years previous to the time at which I have chosen to commence my narrative. Charles had taken the old man's advice. He had not abused the world, but tried what he could do for himself in it, and old Robert's words had turned out true. He obtained a scholarship in the university, and with the help of this, and the few hundred pounds which his father had left him, he was able to make his way to the bar; the profession to which he had chosen to devote himself. His prospects were now fair of advancement in life. He had made many friends, and had met with much kindness, and began seriously to wonder how ever he had believed the world to be so bad.

Other hopes too had come in to animate his efforts. When children, he and Ellen Irving had been playmates; and the recollections of her childish beauty had never wholly lost their influence on his mind. When his collegiate pursuits fixed his residence in Dublin, it was of course natural that he should be frequently at his aunt's, and in the society of his cousin; perhaps equally natural that he should form for her an affection which he persuaded himself was returned. Not that ever a word of love had passed between them; Charles' pride prevented this. He knew that Ellen was the heiress to a large fortune; he determined that he would not seek her hand until he could appear not altogether to seek it as an adventurer. With the natural enthusiasm of youth, he imagined that the attainment of his profession would immediately place him in a position in which he might honorably seek it. He knew that Ellen felt for him as he did for her, and on this assurance he was content to rest.

Mrs. Irving was not unaware of Charles' feelings towards Ellen, and she more than suspected these feelings to be returned. She did not, however, feel it right or necessary to discourage him. In Charles' principles she had the fullest confidence. She was not one of those who sought for her daughter a good match; or rather she had different notions of what constituted a good match. She did not covet great wealth for her child, but happiness, and she believed that with a competence happiness might be found. She feared, however, that her brother-in-law might entertain different feelings; and, although she was determined to act as she thought right, whenever her daughter's happiness would be concerned, she rather desired that she might not be obliged to act contrary to the wishes of one whom she naturally regarded as her protector.

Charles' father had been succeeded at Glenvale by a Mr. Leeson, who had been recommended to the appointment by the possession of some aristocratic connections. At the time of Mr. Wilson's death, Mr. Irving had very kindly undertaken to settle some matters of business with the new incumbent. This created an acquaintance between these gentlemen, which was subsequently kept up.

Mr. Leeson had a nephew, a young man who had just succeeded to the family property, and was heir presumptive to a title now in the possession of some very distant relative. He had been educated at Oxford, which learned place he left with the enviable reputation of being the most dissipated man, the best pistol shot, and the idlest fellow in the university. After leaving the university with these valuable acquirements, he spent a few months with his cousin at his living; after this he visited Dublin; during his stay there Mr. Irving showed him some attention; at his house he met Ellen; he was struck by her beauty, and understanding that she would certainly be left a large fortune by her uncle, he began to think, as he himself expressed it in a letter to one of his companions, "that he might do worse than give over raking for a little while, and commit matrimony with a devilish good fortune, and a devilish fine girl."

An unexpected summons from England, the nature of which he did not disclose, and which no one of course inquired, prevented him from taking any steps, at that period in his schemes. The following year, however, he accepted Mr. Irving's invitation to renew his visit. And as he had learned, on accurate authority, that Mr. Irving's wealth exceeded even the sum that common report had assigned to him, he did so with the full intention of carrying his matrimonial speculation into effect.

Charles was, at this time, just at the eve of being called to the bar. Every day confirmed him in his belief that Ellen was not indifferent to him. His ardent spirit, too, fancied that every obstacle would be soon removed, and that his prospects in his profession would soon assume so brilliant a coloring, as to present his proposal for Ellen's hand in an unobjectionable light even to Mr. Irving. Poor fellow! he knew little of the profession he had chosen — of "the hope deferred that maketh the heart sick!"

It was just then that the gay and fashionable Mr. Leeson presented himself as his rival. He was a young man of polished exterior, and of prepossessing manners. And having, of course, tact enough to conceal his real character, he was a favorite with Mr. Irving. Without much difficulty he obtained that gentleman's sanction for his addresses to his niece. Mr. Irving was flattered by the prospect of a coronet, and imagined that there would be but little difficulty in procuring Ellen's consent to become Lady —.

Mrs. Irving did not regard this matter with the same composure as she had looked on the attentions of her nephew. Her first wish was, that her daughter's husband should be a religious character. She told her brother-in-law, however, that she had made up her mind not to exercise any undue influence over Ellen's choice; she had great confidence, and justly so, in the judgment and feeling of her child; and if she thought she would be happy with Mr. Leeson she would give her full consent to her marriage with him.

Leeson had been an open scoffer at religion.

at Oxford he had narrowly escaped a heavy collegiate censure for his daring avowal of infidel opinions. With wonderful tact, however, he now accommodated himself to the feelings of those whom it was his object to conciliate. He professed a deep respect for religion; with great candor, however, he acknowledged that it had hitherto occupied but little of his attention. He assumed the attitude of an inquirer, and, if things must be called by their right names, he played the part of the hypocrite most admirably. On Mrs. Irving he completely imposed — on her daughter partially.

Ellen and Charles had never interchanged a word on the subject of their mutual attachment, and yet, in the inmost recesses of their souls, each had long regarded the other as the object of a conscious love. To Ellen's pure mind this feeling carried with it all the sanctity of an engagement; and, although she could not plead this in reply to her uncle's persuasions to encourage the addresses of Mr. Leeson, to her own heart it was in itself a sufficient reason why she should refuse them.

Not that she needed this motive to determine her. With that intuitive perception of character which often seems an instinct of the female heart, she felt that there was an undefinable something about him which she could not like, and, with all his winning manners, and even his appearance of regard for religion, she distrusted him. She felt, or fancied, her dislike was an unreasonable one, and, therefore, an unjust one; and, therefore, she tried to overcome it, but in vain; there are untaught and unreasoning antipathies of the heart, which are under the guidance of something higher than either reason or experience.

Charles, however, could not see what was passing in her mind. It was natural that he should feel a jealousy of the addresses of one who had over him so much advantage in external circumstances — in all that men regard as calculated to bribe the female heart into regard. Born of a family far higher than his circumstances, Charles had all that sensitiveness of pride which such a position is calculated to nurture. He dreaded the character of an adventurer above all things. Had Ellen been destitute of fortune he would long since have plighted to her, in words, those vows of constancy and love which he had registered in his heart.

Upon such a disposition, the sensitiveness of which was aggravated by a morbid nervousness of temperament, the result of sleepless midnight hours, and intense application to study, the presence of a rival like Mr. Leeson produced effects almost amounting to madness. He fancied that Ellen encouraged his addresses, perhaps because he thought it most probable that any woman in her circumstances would do so. His pride could not bear the thought that ever he had offered the homage of his heart where it had been rejected. He determined to appear indifferent — he rejoiced that never had a distinct avowal of his affection passed his lips. He resolved to make Ellen believe that any past attentions had not been serious upon his part; he wished her to believe that he had trifled with her affections, so false is the passion which men call pride; he had rather that she should have a just cause for reproach, than an unjust cause of triumph.

And he almost succeeded in conveying to her the impression he desired, and he made her miserable; his visits gradually became fewer and fewer at the cottage, until even his aunt remarked to him that he was neglectful of his friends. Occupation, and the necessity of intense study, furnished him with an excuse.

In the mean time her uncle, and even her mother, urged upon her the propriety of receiving the attentions of Mr. Leeson, which were so marked as no longer to be capable of being misunderstood. Mrs. Irving had been imposed on by the artfulness of his hypocrisy; she believed that he was such a man as her father would have chosen for Ellen; and, while she was not altogether dazzled by the worldly advantages of the match, so as to overlook higher considerations, she certainly did feel proud of seeing her daughter occupy that exalted station which she knew she was qualified to adorn.

Poor Ellen was greatly perplexed; she feared that Charles, if he had ever loved her, no longer regarded her with feelings of affection. She could find no rational grounds for her dislike, or rather distrust of Mr. Leeson; but she felt that she could not love him. Had she been a girl of less high principles, she would not long have hesitated; but she shrunk from solemnly pledging, at the altar of her God, the tender of feelings which her heart told her she could not fulfil.

She told her feelings to her mother; Mrs. Irving was not altogether capable of understanding their depth. "My child," she said, "if your heart tells you that it will not go with the vows you make, let nothing ever tempt you to make them; but Ellen, my dear, do not be led away by the notions of a romantic attachment which young people so often believe should be the foundation of marriage. Esteem is the real source of the only love that will last; it is almost in itself the love that a wife owes to her husband. Do not, Ellen dear, refuse a man whom you esteem, because you do not feel that wild, girlish sentiment which perhaps your education has not fitted you to form; but consult your own heart, and pray to God to guide you to what is right."

The mother affectionately kissed her child; Ellen made no reply. She might have answered her mother's argument by analyzing her feelings towards Mr. Leeson, and questioning whether the distrust she felt for him was consistent with esteem. But her own heart suggested a more sufficient reply; she had but to compare her sentiments towards him with those with which she still regarded her cousin, to know that she did not love him.

In sadness and sorrow she went out alone to a favorite seat which overhung the sea.

Clontarf is a little village on the sea-shore, at the distance of about two miles from Dublin. The magnificent bay spreads its broad waters before it; far across them, on the opposite side, rise the romantic hills of Killiney, and further still behind them, the Wicklow mountains repose upon the sky; the city itself lies to the westward, like a German metaphysician, almost always obscured in the dun atmosphere of its own smoke; a little to the north-east rises the Hill of Howth, and far away to the eastward you can discern nothing but the blue and apparently boundless billows of the Irish channel; except, indeed, at eventide, when, like a solitary star on that wild waste of waters, you can see glimmering afar off, the lantern of the light-ship, a vessel which is moored on a sand-bank many miles out at sea; bearing, even on the bosom of the perilous element itself, the starlike signal of safety, or, to speak more correctly, of danger to the mariner, presenting this really romantic object, and performing these important services under the unromantic and unpretending designation of "the Kish Light."

The residence to which Mrs. Irving had retired was situated on the sea-shore, some little way farther down than the village of Clontarf. The grounds, confined as they were, reached down to the beach. Just on some rocks which breasted the billows of the deep, a rustic seat had been constructed, so as to command a view of all the scenery of the bay. It was a favorite retreat of Ellen's; and, in her present frame of mind, there was something attractive in its sequestered situation.

It was almost the dusk of an autumn evening; the clouds hung heavily in the sky, and cast their dark shadows over the sea, along which the waves were running in troubled and irregular succession. The tide was near its height, and the spray was dashed high upon the rocks. One or two leaves from the trees, which grew down to the water's edge, were now and then whirled round and round in the eddies of the rude blast. Ellen wrapped her cloak close round her, as she walked rapidly along the gravel walk. There was a melancholy in the aspect of nature, suited to the state of her own mind. She sat down on the seat, and, leaning her head on her hand, she looked over the sea, where the wind was sleeping along the waves.

She had sat for some time; the shadows of the clouds were getting darker on the waters, and the Kish light, shining distinctly on the black horizon around. Ellen was just thinking of returning home, when her attention was attracted by a female figure that had been apparently making its way along the rocks upon the sea-shore, and was moving up to the cultivated grounds about the cottage. The female stopped, and looked earnestly at the cottage, for a few minutes, not many yards from where Ellen sat; she had, therefore, concealed herself by the trellised paling that surrounded her, an opportunity of scanning the singular figure that presented itself.

The figure was tall, and, even amid the disfigurement of a large gray cloak that was wrapped around her, singularly handsome. The head was fastened round with a red band, and a profusion of the most luxuriant black hair streamed half way down the back, outside the cloak. Her feet and legs were quite bare; the cloak was manifestly intended for a shorter figure, and so, indeed, it appeared was the red petticoat which appeared under it, for the legs were uncovered nearly to the knee, and the skin, which was of a delicate whiteness, appeared torn by brambles. Her back was partly turned towards Ellen, so that she could not see the face; but the form appeared to have her finger in her mouth, and to be gazing intently on the cottage, and muttering to herself. Ellen thought she distinguished her own name.

"Ay," cried the figure in a louder tone, "ay; little she knows about him; little — little — little —" The rest of the sentence was lost in muttering.

The beating of Ellen's heart was so loud as almost to prevent her from listening; she caught by the trunk of the beech tree which was close to her.

"Little she knows; little — little;" again resumed the stranger, "maybe, little she cares that he has forsaken one; and made the light heart a sad one;" again she fell into the low muttering. Ellen could distinguish nothing but the word "Glenvale." A mist came over her eyes; she thought she should have fallen. Her mind instantly reverted to Charles: she knew not what to fear; a thousand thoughts were in that moment. Her agitation made her move so as to attract the notice of her mysterious visitant. She turned round with a glance of fire from eyes of the deepest black. There was an expression of wildness in the countenance. Ellen felt as if she had seen the features before. Indeed, even through its wildness, there was a beauty that made it not easy to have seen and have forgotten. She rushed, or rather sprung, towards Ellen — “Ay, then, Miss Ellen, I’m glad — glad to see you; it is for you I’m looking; maybe, darlint, to save you from a sore heart — a sore heart, Miss Ellen, it’s a sore thing. Maybe you don’t know; — put your hand here, Miss Ellen;” and the poor creature flung open her bosom, and placed Ellen’s hand upon her heart.

“Miss Ellen, you don’t know me;” she continued, looking up earnestly in her face, and in the earnest gaze Ellen recognized a face which she had not seen for years. My readers, perhaps, have before this recognized Sally Browne.

“I did not know you at first, Sally; I did not expect to see you here,” replied Ellen, startled at the manner and appearance of her old friend; still more startled at a thousand terrible thoughts with which her appearance was associated.

“No wonder,” replied the other; “no wonder. I’m not like what I was when I used to catch the lambs for you at Glenvale. I used to be light-hearted. I am light-headed now — my brain’s not right, Miss Ellen, dear.”

It needed not these words to assure Ellen of the truth. The poor maniac put her hand to her head and tapped several times with her finger on her forehead.

“I might tap long, Miss Ellen,” she said; “but they’re in it — whirling about — ay — ever since the day I saw them both — the sod’s over them — and white daisies are on them — you know his hair was white — white, white — like the snow;” and she walked away, apparently forgetting her companion altogether.

Ellen recalled her with a voice trembling with agitation. She raised its tone almost to a scream, before the other heard it. She started.

“Who says Sally? O, ah, Miss Ellen, dear!”

“Did you not say, Sally, you had something to tell me?” said Ellen, scarcely knowing what she said.

“Oh, Miss Ellen!” replied Sally, “I have to tell you — look at me, darlint; you would n’t like to be like me — you would n’t like to wander the world — you would n’t, Miss Ellen, dear — now take care, Miss Ellen, don’t trust him — he loved me too.”

“Who?” interrupted Ellen, in violent emotion.

“Who!” exclaimed the other, looking with a piercing stare into her features; “are not you to be his bride — won’t he make you a grand countess — did n’t he say it to me?”

The maniac paused; Ellen breathed freely.

“Ay, Miss Ellen, he will put diamonds in your hair, but they will turn to serpents, and they will get about your heart — so don’t take them — they’re here;” and again she bared her bosom and pointed to her heart.

She sat down at Ellen’s feet, and seemed more collected.

“I’ve wandered far to-day, Miss Ellen, to tell you this story; and when I did come I wandered in my mind — I can’t think of anything.”

“How is your father, Sally?” inquired Ellen, hoping that the question might recall the scattered recollections of the poor creature.

She looked up full in her face, and an expression of deep meaning passed across the wildness of her features. She clasped her long, lank hands; and her only reply was by a troubled moan. For some minutes she continued this low and dismal sound, while she rocked herself backwards and forwards with a motion that kept a sort of time to her moans.

She continued this motion for some time: at last she started to her feet. She grasped her head wildly with her hands, and then caught Ellen’s with a violence that made her shrink. A sudden fire seemed to light up the maniac’s eye. “Listen to me, Miss Ellen,” she cried, while her voice appeared to assume new energy; “listen to me — I must tell it. A woman does not like to tell her shame; but the vow of the dead is upon me;” and as she continued to speak, her breathing rose higher and higher. “Be warned, Miss Ellen; it was Edward Leeson that made me what I am; it was he that broke my father’s heart; be warned, Miss Ellen. He wants to marry you; I know he does. Come, listen to me; there is no one near us, but them that you don’t see. Come, now, here give me your solemn oath that you’ll never marry him.” She paused — an unearthly fire lit up her eye — she squeezed Ellen’s wrists with a painful and convulsive grasp. “Swear it, swear it,” she repeated, with a violence that was becoming alarming, “as you would miss the curse — the curse — the curse, Miss Ellen!” she screamed. “They’re here to curse you — do you see him — there, there — swear — look at him — he’s beckoning me — his hair is all white — swear.” Her eyeballs were straining on some point by the seaside. A cold shudder passed over all her frame, while Ellen was literally compelled to give the required vow. The maniac became calm. “Did you see him, Miss Ellen?” she said, in a low and fearful whisper — “my father — he was there;” and she pointed in the direction in which her eyes had been previously directed. “I saw him standing on that rock.”

She paused for a long time, overcome by excitement; she resumed, in a subdued tone: “Poor old man! he was always fond of you, Miss Ellen. Do you remember, long ago, when you were at Glenvale; and we were both children; and then I was the bonniest child in all the country except yourself; and Master Charles used to vex you, saying I had blacker eyes than you, and the old man would take you on his knee, when you would begin to look downcast, and tell you that you had the sweetest face in all the country side; and that you would yet make a nice wife for Master Charles. Even in death he did not forget you. You have all my story, Miss Ellen, darlint. My father and my child are in one grave; his white hairs are in it; but when he was cold under the sod he came to me in his winding-sheet, and he sent me to you; and I have to tell you—he—he—Miss Ellen—he forsook me—he left me to die by the road-side, if I chose, when my father put me out; ay, and the old man's heart was broke, and he never looked up more. I bore it all until I saw him die—and my child, too. I was with him when he died; I saw him as the breath went from him; and he forgave me, and he blessed me; ay, and he blessed the baby; but that, Miss Ellen, went hard with him; but he did bless it, and he died; and I sat day and night beside the corpse. I talked to it all night. They wanted me to quit it; and before the morning light the child had gone to him. The dead man's blessing was on it; and it took fits and died. Then something passed through my head; and from that morning out—they say I'm mad—but I saw him that's gone. He came to me in his white shroud; and he laid the vow upon me to come to you, and then I was to wander the wide world, a desolate creature, to go near neither kith nor kin—to disgrace them—that was what he put upon me. But maybe there's good for me in the next world; there's none in this. But I've done one vow, and I'll keep the other, though it's a hard one too, to be desolate in the earth—desolate—desolate—desolate!" and, repeating the word with bitter emphasis, she turned to depart down towards the sea.

It was now almost dark, and the tide had risen so high that there was no passage along the rocks. The mad girl stood just upon the edge of the water; her dark figure clearly discernible amid the white spray that was dashing round her. "Look, Miss Ellen!" she cried; "look!" pointing out towards the light that glimmered on the horizon from the light ship; "look! it's all black but that one star—all, all, all!"

She stood for a moment gazing on the light; then turned round, having discovered that there was no egress by the way she had come.

She once more advanced towards Ellen. "Good-by, Miss Ellen; if I have said anything queer don't be angry with me—remember my poor brain is turned. I've told you all, Miss Ellen; and keep your promise, darlint, and sometimes think of me. Maybe, Miss Ellen," she added doubtfully, "you would sometimes pray for me; pray that my wanderings may be short." She hesitated, as if it were almost impious in her to ask prayer for the only blessing she seemed to regard as possible for her.

"The tide's full in," she began again; "and one might fall in along the rocks, but I'll be watched; my time's not all in yet. Would n't I make a pretty corpse, Miss Ellen, dear, if they found me with my long hair all wet with the salt water!"

They were startled by the sound of Mrs. Irving's voice, in gentle tones, exclaiming, "Ellen, my love, why are you out so late!"

Sally started; "I must be off," she cried wildly; "my business was with you."

Ellen almost mechanically held her.

"It is my mother, Sally—tell—tell her all."

Mrs. Irving was now quite close to them. She was surprised at the strangeness of the figure which she saw wildly held by her daughter; she had no time, however, for inquiry. The maniac suddenly disengaged herself with violence from the gentle grasp that had detained her. Her eyes glared with fire; she raised herself up with proud dignity to an elevation that gave her fine figure a look of commanding energy; and while she raised her voice to a shriek, expressing the mingled emotions of terror and triumph, she cried out in an unearthly tone, "There!"

Ellen looked in the direction to which her out-stretched arm pointed; there stood, motionless and breathless, Mr. Leeson; her uncle was following a few paces behind.

There was, perhaps, fortunately for all parties, little time for thought or reflection. The maniac moved towards the object of her hate, as if she would have scorched him with her just indignation.

"Edward Leeson," she cried, "I have found you! Edward, do you know me; do you know the mother of your child? When last you saw me you told me I might go with it to hell; but it's in heaven, where you'll never be. Listen to me, villain, listen! The very dead have come to warn me about you. The blessed dead don't come back for nothing. If there is a God in heaven, vengeance will overtake you. You broke my father's heart. Let this lady ask what of the old sexton of Glenvale. Well she knew poor Sally when she was a child; she would not know her now; but she's promised; and listen—the curse of the light heart that you have made heavy is with you wherever you go!"

A wild peal of laughter, such as none but maniacs laugh, closed this address, in which no one had ventured to interrupt her. She rushed down towards the sea, and disappeared apparently into the wave.

"Good God, she'll be drowned!" exclaimed Mr. Irving, as he rushed to stop her; but her movements were too rapid; she had passed with a light step along rocks that seemed almost impassable; and before he reached the water's edge the same fearful laugh was echoing from a place which he knew to be one of safety.

From the incoherent ravings of poor Sally, my readers will gather as much as they can wish to learn of the dismal tale of the transactions in which she was concerned. They can have no difficulty in conceiving the natural result of her terrible disclosures.

Of all these occurrences I knew nothing at the time. My readers may therefore conceive my astonishment, as I was accidentally present at the scene which I must now describe.

Charles Wilson, I have already mentioned, had obtained a scholarship in the University; and he made his rooms his residence up to the time of his being called to the bar. An intimacy subsisted between him and me for some time. I remember, it must have been within some days of this strange interview, we had made a plan for a day's excursion into the county Wicklow: we returned late in the day by one of the evening coaches; we both were tired, and as we passed a tavern in — street, Charles proposed that we should have supper.

I do not now remember by what accident we were shown, not into the coffee room, but into a small room set apart for more private parties. There were two tables in it; at one of which Charles and I seated ourselves, and were soon engaged in the discussion of our supper with the appetite of hungry men.

While we were thus engaged, a second party entered the room and took possession of the other table. One of them, who seemed to be the leader, was a handsome young man; at least he would have been both handsome and gentlemanly in his appearance, if he had not both the manner and look of a roué. He was accompanied by a dandy-looking young officer, who was smoking a cigar, and a bluff and vulgar-looking, middle-aged man, who had something the look of a dog-stealer, but was also engaged in the gentlemanly occupation of the cigar.

A strange glance passed from the leader to Charles. Charles was evidently confused; there was, however, no sign of recognition.

"Do you know those chaps?" I asked, thoughtlessly.

"I don't want to know them," he answered, shortly, and began vehemently to pick the leg of a turkey, which had constituted a portion of our supper; he showed, however, no other symptom of agitation.

I understood the shortness of his reply as a reproof of my impertinent inquiry; and like most persons who have received a deserved rebuke, I was very well inclined to be silent. Conversation altogether flagged at our table; but the others appeared well inclined to make up for it by their noisiness.

Their leader commenced calling for champagne; and I could not help thinking that he did so in a pointed manner, as if to ridicule the less aristocratic call which Charles had just that instant made for two tumblers of punch. It was not, however, pointed enough to justify a notice. Charles' face colored, and he again vehemently picked a bone.

The others commenced a conversation in a tone so loud that most of what they said could be heard at our table, particularly as our humble beverage by no means appeared as exalating in its effects as the champagne, of which their libations were certainly not stinted.

The officer talked of cock-fights and horse-races; the fat-faced gentleman of fighting bull-dogs, in a tone, and with a zest that seemed to confirm my guess as to his occupation. The other was generally silent, although occasionally he joined with the others in boasting of exploits of a character even more disgraceful than those of the heroes of the cockpit and the dog-fight.

At last he said to his companions, "Boys, I must tell you of my last adventure. Only think of it; an old rascal thought to hook me into matrimony with his niece."

"Into matrimony!" exclaimed the officer, incredulously.

"Ay," he said, "an old Jew of a Dublin merchant, who thought his money would be well spent in buying even the contingency of a coronet for a vulgar-looking niece that he has taken as his child; she was the daughter of some country curate; but I humored the thing, and had a month's sport out of it, feasting with the uncle and flirting with the niece. I had them all in high tune; but, egad, the plebeian wretches took the matter too seriously, and I have been forced to cut it short."

Charles' features underwent a thousand changes of color and position during this speech, which the speaker rendered still more disgusting by language and insinuations of which no gentleman could be capable. I felt anxious to escape the contamination of such society.

"Who were the wretches that had the impudence to try to take in your lordship?" exclaimed the dog-stealer, as he thrust repeated spoonfuls of some made dish down a throat which gaped like the crater of a volcano, which, indeed, he made it resemble in other respects by being guilty of a certain practice to which volcanoes are said to be addicted.

"Honor bright," exclaimed the officer, in a tone of jest with which much of seriousness was mingled.

"By——!" said the other, striking his clenched fist on the table, "there is no 'honor bright' in it; their name is Irving."

It was the work of an instant for Charles to rise from his seat and move towards the blustering bully. He was calm and collected. In tones of thunder he said, "You are a liar and a scoundrel!" burst from his lips; and his clenched fist had stretched Mr. Leeson beside his chair.

I now rose to interfere; for the dog-stealer had grasped a bottle of champagne, apparently with the intention of breaking it on Charles' head; the officer, however, dashed it from his hand, and raised up his fallen companion. Charles kept his ground unmoved. Mr. Leeson very soon revived. "This," said the officer, "must of course be settled elsewhere."

"Sir," cried Charles, "Mr. Leeson knows me. I am nephew to the gentleman of whom he has dared to speak with disrespect; I am cousin to the young lady whose name he has dared to pollute with his ruffian lips; he was for months the guest of that gentleman; he sought that young lady's hand; he has been rejected because he was found out to be a scoundrel; and you know sir," he added, emphatically, "if what I say be true, his conduct to-night has been that of a liar, a ruffian, and a coward."

"You shall answer for this, sir," cried the infuriate Leeson. "Fortescue, the matter must be settled soon," he added, with a cold, sneering expression, to his companion; "the sooner the better—you will be my friend."

"I'm damned if I do," was the quick reply of the other, "in this or anything else to a man who has acted so."

The young officer rose in violent agitation and pulled the bell; he asked for his share of the bill; and with a significant "Leeson, you know where to find me," he left the room.

Charles flung his card most contemptuously on the table; and we followed his example. Mr. Fortescue was apparently waiting for us in the passage; he addressed Charles—"Sir," he said, "I feel it right to apologize to you for having been in any way a party to the wanton insult that was offered to you to-night; but I have done what I could in the way of reparation."

Charles assured him that he had more than exculpated himself. The young officer walked down with us towards college. As we went along, he said, "We are both in for a shot from him; I may put you on an equal footing with myself. Leeson is a professed duellist; he can snuff a candle at twelve paces; this accounts for his conduct to-night; these bullies are always cowards at heart; but perhaps one or other of us might bore him;

if the first of us does it, it will save the second: but I fear it's a blue look-out."

At parting, he shook hands with Charles. I could not help thinking, pretty much as two men would do, who found a source of sympathy in being both condemned to death.

"O'Brien," said the poor fellow to me, "will you stand by and see me shot? It is but little trouble; but I must get some one to do it."

I scarcely knew how to act in taking this office upon myself. I was utterly unacquainted with the laws and usages of duelling; and it seemed a matter in which a knowledge of them might be essential. At last I thought of consulting a relative of my own, an officer whose regiment was then quartered in Dublin. Charles and I had spent some evenings with him in barracks; and having obtained Charles' permission to communicate all the circumstances to him, I set off without losing a moment to ask his advice.

At the time of which I write, the law of public opinion did not bear so strongly against the practice of duelling as it does now. A duel, even where its termination was fatal, was esteemed a light matter. In this, as in every other instance, the tone of general feeling influences that of individuals. I confess I looked upon the matter in which I was engaged in a light very different from what I would now regard it. This much I may just hint in extenuation of myself to those who may be disposed to try my conduct by a rule more unerring than the fluctuating laws of public opinion. The world has grown wiser upon the subject since—the same years have taught me much. No one, perhaps, has ever passed through the changes and chances of a varied life without feeling that much of wisdom lies in the lessons of experience.

With some difficulty I made my way to Major Williams, in his apartments at George's-street barracks. He listened calmly to my story.

"The fellow escaped too lightly," he said, when I had concluded. "Of course he will send a challenge. Wilson must, of course, meet him; but he is not to receive his fire; he may shoot him the first time if he can."

I mentioned to him what I had heard of the skill of the other. He started and betrayed visible emotion. "Poor fellow," he cried, "this is a cursed system—this villain will shoot him like a dog—fellows like him insult society—damn the bully!" he repeated, bitterly, at the conclusion of the broken sentences which he had uttered half as an address to me, and half soliloquizing.

"Are you up to such matters?" he said eagerly.

"I can't say I am," I replied.

"Did you ever load a pistol?"

"I have," said I.

"What for?" he said, with a smile.

"To shoot sparrows," I replied, catching at the moment from him an expression of gaiety that was far from my heart.

"Good heavens!" he exclaimed; "his chance is not worth a groat; this noble young fellow will be shot by that scoundrel; it is a cursed system—damnable—damnable—if it could be done without."

He paced up and down the room for an instant. "He shan't be murdered—no, by,—" he added, with an oath. "Will he let me be his second, O'Brien?—will you give me your place?" A smile played on his features as he spoke.

"Are you serious, major?" I asked.

"Perfectly serious," he replied; "his only chance is in an experienced second. I have seen some affairs of the kind," he continued, with a melancholy air; "they are horrible businesses; but this poor young fellow must not be shot without a fair chance."

It was not difficult to obtain Charles' consent to the proposed substitution. "I do not, however," he added, with a ghastly smile, "release you from your promise; you must come and see me shot."

Contrary to our expectation, we heard nothing from Mr. Leeson that night. I felt a kind of regret; I thought it would have been all over the next morning. There was a horrible suspense that was worse than the most terrible certainty; and yet I could not but feel that it was a day's reprieve to the poor victim of the system, by which a coward first insults and then murders, and calls this satisfaction to injured society.

Next morning, however, a gentleman waited on Charles, from Mr. Leeson. There was no apology asked or offered. The gentleman was referred at once to Major Williams to "arrange" everything.

The place chosen was the celebrated spot in the Phoenix Park, known by the name of the Fifteen Acres; the hour fixed was as early on the next morning as there could be sufficient light for the work of death. All these arrangements were made, and communicated to Charles before twelve o'clock in the day.

"I have the rest of the day to myself," he said, bitterly, as Major Williams left him, promising to call for him at five in the morning; and telling him that he would settle all other matters, so that he need think no more about it.

My readers have of course—that is, if, as I am bound to believe, they be possessed of an ordinary degree of intelligence—understood the results of the disclosures of the unfortunate Sally. It may be imagined that Mr. Leeson very speedily took his departure from the cottage. Mrs. Irving fervently thanked God that her daughter had been preserved from misery. Mr. Irving appeared hurt at his own want of discrimination; he consoled himself, however, by the reflection that "the rascal was a most accomplished hypocrite;" but, he added, "I might have suspected him when he took so suddenly to religion."

Upon Ellen the effects of the extraordinary scene she had witnessed were such as might have been expected from its agitating nature. An illness, that confined her for some days to her room, was the consequence. Charles had heard something of the occurrence from her uncle, who told him at the same time that Ellen showed more sense than they all. She never could endure the fellow, though she could give no reason for her dislike.

These few words excited a tumult of feeling in Charles' breast. His agitation could not escape the notice of the other.

"Ho, ho!" he cried, with the air of one who had just made a discovery; "maybe the secret's out—maybe she liked her cousin best, ho, ho!"

There was nothing of displeasure in the tone in which he spoke. Charles' heart beat too violently to permit him instantly to reply, and, something having called off Mr. Irving, the conversation dropped.

Brief, however, as it had been, it had a deep import to Charles' heart. Ellen had rejected Mr. Leeson. How deeply had he wronged her by his unmeaning jealousy! Her uncle, too, had alluded to the possibility of her loving him, in a tone that conveyed no disapprobation. How did he long to ask her forgiveness, and declare his own love! Something told him that he should find it no hard matter to obtain the one, and induce her to accept the other.

It was in this state of mind that he had met Mr. Leeson in the manner I have described. He had not yet seen Ellen, as she was not yet sufficiently recovered to leave her room. When he found that he had one day, perhaps his last day, to himself, he almost mechanically bent his steps to Clontarf.

The face of nature wore a gladness that could not but throw its hues of cheerfulness over one who felt that he might never look upon that face again. The keen air of autumn gave a clear blueness to the sky and the sea—and the bright sunshine colored every object with a tinge of joyousness. As Charles passed along the shore, he paused to gaze upon the scene. The white sails of a hundred skiffs moved joyously along the little billows that danced in gladness on the bosom of the sea—the white clouds sailed slowly over the sky—and far away the mountains raised their summits, standing out in unusual distinctness from the blue line of the horizon. All nature was in harmony with life—life and gladness—but that time to-morrow, what might he be? There was something sickening in the thought.

He thought, too, of her who had been the vision of his dreams. He felt assured she loved him. Then could she bear his death? What right had he to sear the heart that was devoted to him? But it was now too late. It must be; and with this thought he quieted the emotions which, despite of himself, rose in his soul.

He thought, too, of another world, and of Him, before whom, perhaps, he must shortly stand. The recollections of his childhood rushed back upon his mind. He thought of the act in which he was about to engage. A cold shudder passed through his frame as conscience whispered that it was a violation of God's law.

"And yet," he reasoned with himself, "am I not risking my life in a cause that conscience must approve — to defend the peace and sacredness of a happy home, against injuries perhaps as deep and deadly as those of which the law takes cognizance? The soldier on the field of battle may look for protection while he defends his home and his country from his foe; why may not he who singly defends the peace of society against the enemy that would invade it?"

His conscience distrusted the soundness of the reasoning, but it satisfied him.

On arriving at the cottage, he found that Ellen was so much better as to have altogether left the confinement of her room. A deep blush crimsoned her entire features when she met him; both their manners were embarrassed. Persons are always embarrassed when each is conscious of their own acquaintance with a subject of common interest upon which they have never spoken.

Mrs. Irving insisted that Charles should remain there for dinner. Her brother and sister-in-law were to come and take share of a family dinner, and Mr. Irving would be glad to meet Charles.

Charles fancied there was some significance in the manner in which she spoke. He thought it might be his last day. He did not regret that it would be spent with Ellen.

Her cheek was pale from the effects of recent illness. When he gazed upon that pale cheek, and thought that before the morrow was over, sorrow might blanch it to a more ghastly hue, he felt as if his heart would break.

And yet, when he looked upon her, and thought of her so free from guile, so pure and upright, he felt as if she was not to suffer for his sake.

The Bible was lying open on the table, when he entered. His arm involuntarily rested on the sacred page.

"Charles," said his aunt, "will you finish for us a chapter we were reading when you came in?"

It was that chapter in the book of Genesis, in which Abraham prays for Sodom. When he came to the remarkable verse, "That be far from thee, O Lord, to punish the innocent with the guilty," his voice faltered; he could not go on.

Both his aunt and cousin fixed their eyes on him. He pleaded nervousness as an excuse for his emotion. He could not but remark the anxious glance his cousin cast at him, and the anxious tone of voice with which she told him to take care and not injure his health by study.

My readers must conceive an interview which I confess I am utterly inadequate to describe. He dare not allude to the feelings of his heart. Indeed, he had no opportunity as Mrs. Irving remained constantly with him until the hour of dinner.

Mr. Irving came in great spirits, at the unexpected success of some mercantile speculation. He rallied both Ellen and Charles on their paleness.

"Why, man," said he to the latter; "you look like a man going to be shot." Fortunately, he turned away too quick to remark the effect his chance words produced.

Dinner passed away, and Charles and Mr. Irving were left alone. Their conversation was on indifferent subjects, until, just as they were rising to join the ladies, Mr. Irving said, standing—

"Charles, you never told me if I was not right. There is something between you and your cousin, is n't there?"

"Indeed, sir," said Charles, "if ever we had spoken to each other as you seem to suppose, it would not be concealed from you."

"Well, well," said the other, "that's very right; but I see plain enough you've a liking for each other." He moved off towards the door, and, putting his hand on Charles' shoulder, he added—"She's my child, Charles, and, believe me, I would rather see her married to you without a penny, than to some we know of with a title and estates."

Charles' heart was touched. He felt as if he should communicate to Mr. Irving the perilous adventure in which he was next morning to be engaged. He attempted to speak, but his voice was choked in his throat; and, while he was hesitating, the other had passed on, humming a tune.

The state of his feelings during the rest of the evening was bordering on agony, but he felt a mysterious assurance that he would be safe. The words "Thou wilt not punish the innocent with the guilty," rested on his soul. When he looked on Ellen, he felt that there was a safeguard in her interest in him. Even when taking leave, the only sign of emotion he manifested was, that he mechanically retained her hand and pressed it for some time. She reddened and withdrew it, with something like an expression of anger.

Mr. Irving's carriage was at the door; he pressed Charles to accompany him, and remain all night. Charles pleaded business as an excuse.

"Well," said the other, "come out to breakfast with me; get up early, and do your business first. Nine o'clock," he shouted, as the carriage rolled off.

"Yes," answered Charles, and proceeded to make his way home, with some rather gloomy reflections as to the probability of his keeping his engagement.

That night he addressed two letters, one to Mr. Irving, and the other to Ellen, both of which he entrusted to my care to deliver, in case he should fall.

The college gates had just opened next morning, when Major Williams, true to his appointment, came to Charles Wilson's rooms. Charles and I were both waiting for him. He was wrapped up in a military cloak, under which he carried a box, which, of course, I conjectured to contain a case of pistols.

"Make haste, Wilson," he said. "I have been kept waiting at these cursed gates until the hour for opening came. Your college clock is, like everything else about it, infernally slow."

Charles put out the candle which was burning on the table, and we moved down stairs. It was a rainy morning; a thick mizzling rain was drifted in our faces. As we passed through the college gates, two or three half-sleeping porters eyed us suspiciously, and yawned. Outside the gate, a hack car was waiting; on one side of it a gentleman sat, beside whom the major desired me to get. Charles and he got upon the other.

"Where now, yer honor?" said the driver, touching his hat with a leer that implied that he anticipated the answer.

"Up Dame Street," said the major, sternly, anxious to avoid the inquisitiveness of a porter who loitered lazily after us.

The driver applied the whip to the thing of skin and bones which supplied the place of a horse, and the animal dashed forwards with a speed which his appearance did not promise.

"To the Acres, yer honor!" said the driver, when he had gone far enough to need fresh directions. The major nodded assent.

"Gee up, my ould play-boy," said the fellow to his horse; and he applied the lash with a zest that seemed to indicate that he expected some sport and good pay.

The first dawn of day was scarcely discernible. The lamps were all burning in the streets. Scarcely any one was astir. It was altogether a dismal morning, and, wrapped up in our cloaks, on the crazy vehicle on which we sat, we seemed a dismal party. Not a word was spoken. The gentleman who sat next me, I presumed to be a surgeon; but we had enough to do to keep the rain and foggy air out of our mouths, by keeping our mufflers close to them, and neither of us spoke.

We had reached that part of the Phoenix Park where the road winds at the bottom of the glen, the sides of which are thickly covered with hawthorns. I do not know whether it has any particular name. A lady of my acquaintance has assured me that it is called "The Valley of Thorns;" but I more than suspect that her own poetical taste has been the source of this appropriate name. About one hundred yards above the magazine, the major desired the car to stop. We were then just in the very heart of the Valley of Thorns; we struck off the roads at once. The light was by this time so clear that we could distinctly discern objects. Just as we passed an old hawthorn tree, a most extraordinary apparition burst upon our sight. I need not tax my reader's patience by circumlocution. It was that of Sally Browne. None of the entire party knew her except Charles, and even he at first did not recognize her. She presented, certainly, a most singular appearance, standing in our path in that sequestered situation. Her long hair was streaming behind—the red band could not confine it to her head. She rushed down, and looked from one to another of the party. She soon recognized the object of her search.

"Master Charles," said she, looking steadily in his face, "do you remember when last I saw you I speyed, Master Charles, and my speying is come true."

Even the coolness of Major Williams was completely disconcerted by this singular interruption.

"Sally Browne," said Charles, "what in the name of Heaven brings you here?"

"What brings me here? I know what brings you here. Did you not revenge me long ago—long, long ago?—and now—he's gone up there—he would have taken my life but for them that were with him, who said it was a sin to harm the mad girl. I stood in his road like his wraith, and I cursed him—and he trembled like that tree that the wind's shaking. It's a morning, Master Charles, that one would fear to meet their bad conscience; I cursed him—here—cursed—cursed."

"What, in the name of Heaven, is the meaning of this?" said Major Williams, in a whisper to Charles.

"The curse be upon him," said Charles, earnestly; "this—this is his doing."

"The speying's come out, Master Charles, when they that heard it are with the dead. I'm wilder now, but not so light-hearted."

"Poor, poor soul!" said the major, feelingly.

"Sally," said Charles, "we have not time to talk now; go back home again; this is no place for you at this hour."

"Home!" she cried, with an hysterical scream, that was something like a whoop; "home! I have no home—I must wander the wide world till I meet with the old man—the dead man with the white hairs—my home's the home of the wind—but I'll go—I'll not stop you as I stopped him—I tracked him these three days, and I found out that he was coming here, and I met him to curse him—and I saw his heart all wither up, and now I'm gone to wander for the dead man—the old man with the gray head—my father—father—father!" and, still muttering these words, she passed us at a rapid step, and disappeared among the white-thorns.

The delay had kept us so much that we had not time to ask for explanation of this singular occurrence. I heard Charles say to the major, "A victim of his perfidy." The major sighed heavily, and we walked on.

A few minutes more brought us to the ground. Mr. Leeson and his second were there before us; and a third person, whom I recognized as the gentleman to whom I had attributed the office of dog-stealer. Mr. Leeson had brought no surgeon. By this time the light was clear enough for all our purposes. The gentleman who was to act as Mr. Leeson's second stepped out to Major Williams:—

"You have taken proper precautions—a professional gentleman, I presume," said he, in a tone that seemed to imply that his friend had no need of such precautions.

"I have done all, sir," said the veteran, "that I thought right," with a dignified tone.

"Very probably," said the other, dryly.

"We are now ready for business," said the major in a tone approaching to haughtiness.

"Quite," replied the other, in a voice of imperturbable composure.

They moved a little further from their principals to settle preliminaries.

"Twelve paces," said Mr. Leeson's second, with an appearance of sang froid.

"No, sir," said the major, sternly.

"It's the usual distance."

"I believe, sir," said the major, "the challenged party has a right to some discretion; I wish fifteen."

The other retired to consult his principal; they talked awhile in visible agitation.

The major eyed them with a look, of which the scorn was not concealed.

"Major Williams," said the other, returning, "my friend seeks satisfaction for an outrageous insult—the distance you propose is too great."

"Then, sir," said the major, "you can have no objection to nine?"

I felt my blood run cold.

"It would be little better than murder," said the other.

"Nine, sir," taking no notice of what he said, said the major; "you have refused fifteen; I am anxious, on the part of my friend, to give you every satisfaction."

After some few words, the ground was measured at nine paces. When Mr. Leeson was placed, he became deadly pale. His coat was open, so as to expose a part of his linen on his breast. He attempted to button it; but his hand trembled so violently that he could not. The dog-stealer remarked it, and buttoned it for him.

The seconds loaded the pistols, and handed each to his respective friend. Some few words had previously passed between Major Williams and Charles, at which I moved off, that I might not overhear. He now handed him his pistol, and we all moved off.

The word was given—there was first one report—an instant afterwards the other. I trembled to look round. I heard some one exclaim, with an oath, "He's killed!" I looked towards the spot where Charles stood, certain that my eyes would be blasted by the sight of his bleeding corpse. But he stood, just in the attitude in which he had fired. Opposite to him his friends had raised up his unfortunate antagonist.

I ran towards him. Our surgeon was beside him. The wounded man had his hand upon his left side, indicating the direction the ball had taken. He had opened up his coat and waistcoat to search for the wound—the ball had carried in a portion of his dress into the wound. The surgeon shook his head.

The dying man perceived it. "I know it," he cried; "I'm done—curse it—I wanted his blood, and he has mine—curse him!" he cried, as he clenched his fist. "Nine paces—it should have been three—then we would have gone together—curse that mad banshee—CURSE YOU ALL!" he roared with a fiendish energy. A few more terrible imprecations, a few gnashes of the teeth, and that ferocious spirit had passed away.

There was silence for some seconds; the surgeon was the first to break it.

"Fly, gentlemen," he said; "it's all over here."

The admonition to fly was quickened by the appearance of a party rapidly moving towards us. All dispersed in different directions—Major Williams almost dragging with him his unheeding principal. There was something terrible in thus leaving the corpse of a fellow-creature, who, but a few minutes before, had come with us in health and strength. I felt I could not fly. I was amazed when I found that the party approaching was that of Mr. Fortescue.

"It's all over," I said, pointing to the spot where the dead body lay.

"Gracious Heaven!" exclaimed Fortescue, "it is Leeson!"

I answered in the affirmative. He walked over where he lay stiff upon the sod. He gazed upon the dead body with a strange expression of features. I thought there was something of satisfaction in the consciousness that he had himself escaped. He said nothing, however, but merely asked me the distance they had been placed.

"Ah," said he, "he had a second up to his business. He saved his life—perhaps mine too. Leeson would have hit his heart at twelve—but he was unaccustomed to nine; besides, he was at heart a coward, and he got afraid."

He turned away from the corpse, apparently well satisfied that he was not occupying its place.

"It's a nice morning's work," he said, with an expression half of gayety, half melancholy. He took his intended second's arm and they walked off.

Charles kept his appointment with Mr. Irving that morning. "He had gotten up early and done his business." Of course he communicated to him the transaction. Mr. Irving was greatly shocked. The entire matter, however, ruined Charles in his estimation. When he had a little recovered from the shock, he began to question Charles about the particulars of the quarrel.

"Did the fellow say I wanted to hook him in?—bad luck to his impudence!—did he dare to say it? Well, Charles, you are a brave fellow; a pity your name's not Irving; you would be worthy of it. Maybe, Charles, you might take it yet," he added, significantly. "You must hide, Charles, for a little while. I suppose there will be a coroner's jury. You will not be prosecuted, but you had better keep out of the way just now. I know no better hiding-place than just where you are. You must not let yourself be seen by daylight; you can take out one of the horses, and have a gallop by moonlight for exercise. The search will not be very diligent for you; and this, very likely, is the last place they will think of looking. I remember the old woman in the country used constantly to put you in the chimney-corner to avoid the smoke, when the whole house was full of it. And sometimes you may avoid danger by staying near to it. Even if you are taken, the worst is a few weeks in jail, and of course a verdict of not guilty."

Thus lightly did he talk of a transaction in which a fellow-creature had been sent to his last account—

With all his imperfections on his head.

The coroner's jury, after examining one or two witnesses, found a verdict—"That deceased came by his death by a shot fired by Charles Wilson, Edward Williams and another being assisting thereat, and that the value of said pistol was twenty shillings." The coroner, on this very grammatical verdict, issued his warrant for the apprehension of Charles Wilson, and Edward Williams.

It was generally said that there was gross mismanagement in allowing a coroner's inquest at all. I could not help thinking it a very natural result of leaving a body, with a pistol bullet in its side, lying in his majesty's park.

Major Williams obtained six weeks' leave of absence the very day the duel was fought.

Mr. Irving made very light of the legal proceedings; but Charles, in his own mind, could not divest himself of anxiety. The duel had been fought at an irregular distance; he had overheard the expression of Mr. Leeson's second, "It will be regular murder;" and just before the pistol had been placed in his hand, Major Williams had said to him, "Remember, there is no time for foolery now;" words which Charles feared that others might have overheard, and which, manifestly, were meant as advice to shoot his antagonist if he could; for I believe he was correct in his opinion, that when two gentlemen challenge each other to deadly combat, and fire loaded pistols, each towards the other, with the best aim they can, it alters quite the character of the transaction if anything has occurred, which would give reasonable ground of suspicion that either of them did all this with any intention of shooting the other.

Charles, therefore, entertained reasonable fears that all the circumstances I have mentioned, by furnishing grounds for such a suspicion, would tell against him on his trial. His imagination was haunted with the most dismal visions of the future; perhaps only the reflection of remorse for the past.

He could not but feel remorse. None of my readers can know—I pray they may never know—the feelings of the man that has ever, under any circumstances, taken away a life. Blood, no matter how justly shed, leaves a stain upon the hand that sheds it. The shadow of the murderer's curse darkens where the curse itself does not fall. "He who sheddeth man's blood," still walks in the gloom of that shadow. It is a terrible consciousness to feel that you have been forced to cut short a fellow-being's days. The soul darkens under the solemn sanction by which He who gave it guards the awful sacredness of human life.

If this feeling attaches itself to the mere act of taking away human life, even where the necessity that justifies it is most plain, much more did it exist in all its bitterness, when Charles had shed a fellow-creature's blood under circumstances, the propriety of which he could not help feeling questionable. Not but that he reasoned himself into the belief that it was an act of self-defence; in truth, it was so when he was engaged in combat; but why had he thus placed himself in a position in which he was forced to take another's life to save his own? In defence, he reasoned with himself, of those charities of social life, which it is the first duty of every man to guard from aggression.

He might have calmed all the secret upbraidings of his conscience by this reasoning, if it had not been that he saw, in the glance of Ellen, her judgment that he had done wrong. He dare not allude to the subject in her presence; but there was an air of calm and resigned melancholy about her, which seemed to denote that a wound was rankling at her heart. The bloom of health had fled from her pale cheek, and often did the large tear fall unbidden from her eye.

Charles could not but mark the change. Day after day he passed in her society, until his whole soul became absorbed in the passion that preyed on it. Yet there was something in the calm and settled melancholy of her look—in the quiet sorrow that dimmed her eye—in the meek paleness of her cheek, which, while it added to her loveliness, seemed to awe into silence even love.

A few weeks thus passed, and the time came when Charles and his companion surrendered themselves to trial. A previous intimation from Mr. Leeson's friends had assured Mr. Irving that they would take no steps to prosecute. The trial was a mere matter of form—the prisoners were arraigned for the murder of Edward Leeson—a jury were impanelled—no witnesses appeared—and a verdict of not guilty was pronounced.

The day of his trial he drove home with Mr. Irving in his carriage. The joy of that gentleman manifested itself in a manner more expressive than was usual. He repeatedly shook Charles' hand.

"Well, my boy," he cried, "it's all over now—not guilty—it can never come against you again. It was far better for you to stand a trial—not guilty—huzza, my boy!"

His joy subsided a little into a reflective mood. "Well, this is a glorious constitution under which we live—no man can be twice tried for the same offence. Quit forever, my boy—it is a glorious constitution."

Charles heartily concurred in the eulogium on the free genius of British law.

"Your aunt must see you a free man," cried the good-hearted old gentleman, as he desired the coachman to drive to the cottage. Charles' heart fluttered in his bosom at the direction.

Mr. Irving's delight at Charles' acquittal appeared to have carried him quite away from his usual sobriety of demeanor. "Jane," he cried, as soon as he entered the cottage, "come and see your nephew quite free—not guilty, huzza!"

Mrs. Irving heartily embraced Charles, and welcomed him, as she said, back to liberty. Her congratulations, however, were mixed with tears. There was one, however, who met him pale and trembling. She had no congratulations either on her countenance or her lips. Faintly she held out her hand, and with an effort she murmured, "Charles, I am glad—you are—acquitted."

"Come, come, Ellen," cried her uncle, the ardent character of whose joy deemed such cold congratulations peculiarly inappropriate: "come, Miss, you are more glad than any of us. No pretence," he added, in a significant tone. Charles' face became scarlet—a slight tinge passed over the paleness of Ellen's cheek. She sat down without speaking, and took up her work, which was lying on the table.

"Well, well," said her uncle, "you women are the queerest beings in creation; it's well for them," he added, smiling, "that keep clear of you. There she is, happy in her heart to see her cousin back, and she looks as if she was just ready to cry—women always cry on their wedding day—I suppose it's the best method of expressing joy. Here, here," he added impatiently; "I know it all, Ellen," and he caught her hand. "Here, Charles, take her hand—I know it all." But the hand was sternly withdrawn. The old gentleman was surprised. "Perverse, perverse," he muttered. "Here, Jane, we'll leave them to themselves. Charles may make something of her; I can't."

Without giving her time for resistance, he hurried Mrs. Irving through an open casement into the garden, leaving the young people alone. Ellen did not raise her eyes from her work, but her face was deadly pale. Charles stood leaning on the mantel-piece. For some minutes he was silent.

"Ellen," he said at last, "Ellen, there is no need of affectation between us; you know I have loved you long—don't you, Ellen, know that I have loved you for years?"

"I do, Charles," replied the other calmly, without raising her eyes. Charles drew a chair close to her; she was trembling violently. "And, Ellen," he added, softly, "may I not believe that you have loved me?"

The other made no reply: tears fell large and fast upon the embroidery at which she was working.

Charles laid his hand upon her arm; his own heart was throbbing violently; she started — she looked full in his face.

"Charles," she said, "there is no need of affectation; I have loved you, but never, never speak to me on the subject again!"

There was an expression of agony mingled with determination, in the manner she made the request, that gave it more the appearance of a command.

"Ellen, dear," said Charles, but he knew not what to add; it was a pause of deep and painful embarrassment to both — "will you not be mine — mine forever?"

She had risen from her seat, pale and breathless; she seemed like some marble statue, chiselled with incomparable skill; her hair, black as the raven's wing, fell down in glossy ringlets; the blood had left her lips.

"Charles," she said, evidently with an effort; "Charles, never, never speak to me on this subject again; it must not be; I dare not — no, I dare not. You have taken away a fellow-creature's life; I dare not — I would share with you poverty and suffering, but I dare not share God's displeasure."

As she uttered these words, she looked up to heaven, as if for support. Charles reasoned with her; he addressed to her the arguments by which he had silenced his own conscience — "It was self-defence," he said.

"Self-defence!" she answered; "Charles, dear, do not deceive yourself; why did you meet him in mortal combat? It was not self-defence that took you to the place."

"No, Ellen," he answered, "but it was the defence of what is dearer to me than life; I could not hear you spoken lightly of; I risked my life first."

"Charles, dear," she answered, in a tone of tenderness, "Charles, will this be a good excuse to your God for taking away the life he gave? What harm did those words do me? Were they worth being washed out in the blood of an immortal being?"

Charles was awed by the solemnity of her manner. "No man could listen to it, Ellen, and not punish it."

"Vengeance is mine, Charles, God says; it was not for you to take it from him — it was not for you to send a sinner to his presence."

In vain did Charles reason, and argue, and entreat. The simple girl answered every argument by an appeal to the words of the Bible, "Thou shalt not kill." Sternly did she refuse to be entreated. "I did love you," she said, "but my duty demands that I should forget that. I would have borne anything, but I dare not displease my God; perhaps it is a mercy. My foolish head had its dreams of happiness here below; they are gone forever. I will now think only of God."

She uttered those words in the spirit of one of those religionists who, in the Catholic church, solemnly dedicate themselves to God; indeed, as she spoke — her hands clasped in the attitude of attention; the calmness of resignation settling with a lovely radiance on her pale and sorrowful features; her eyes turned upwards, as if to gaze henceforward only on heavenly things — she might, but for her dress, have been the original of the beautiful picture of "the Nun."

Charles still hoped that time would wear away, in Ellen's mind, the stern resolution which now alone seemed to interfere between him and perfect happiness. But when weeks had passed away, and no change came over the spirit of that dream of duty, he gave himself up to the hopelessness of despair; he looked upon it as a judgment from God for having taken life. I might tell of scenes of suffering such as seemed enough to atone for guilt far worse than his. There was in the dark and gloomy history of the next few months, a chapter of truth which many might pronounce too highly colored even for romance; it is time, however, that I should bring this chapter to a close.

Ellen's health and spirits declined so much, that her mother removed to the south of England, in hopes that the change might restore her. Mr. Irving, who was deeply attached to his niece, accompanied her. Some short time afterwards, Charles Wilson left the country without bidding me farewell. I supposed that he had gone to some foreign climate, in the hopes of finding an early grave. I heard nothing of any of the party until, some months afterwards, casting my eye over one of the English papers, I met the following announcement, under the head of marriages:—

"In the church of South Molton, Devonshire, by the Venerable the Archdeacon of —, Charles Wilson, Esq., Barrister at Law, to Ellen, only daughter of the Reverend Charles Irving, late rector of —, in the diocese of Dublin."

Many years had elapsed, when I saw them both happy and honored in the midst of a growing family. Mrs. Irving was sitting by their fireside in a venerable arm-chair, smiling on the domestic circle. Mr. Irving had died full of years and honor, and left all his wealth to his nephew and niece, with the exception of an annuity to his maiden sister, who spent the rest of her life wheeling about in a wheel-chair, and drinking the waters at Bath. Charles had taken the name of Irving, and transferred himself to the English bar, where he had settled down into a snug situation.

From Chambers' Journal.

SLEEPERS AWAKENED.

THE phenomenon of trance is a subject almost equally interesting to the imaginative and the scientific. The world, when in its infancy, recorded the marvel in the myths of the Seven Champions of Christendom, and the hundred years' repose of the Beauty of Faërydom; and as these dreams of imagination faded before the awakening power of knowledge, philosophers and grave physicians took up the tale, and sought to explain a mystery still full of darkness and awe.

Now, although of late the philosophic public have appeared more interested in sending people to sleep than in waking them up—as in mesmerism and electro-biology—it is possible that two or three incidents of the natural resurrection of the supposed dead, may not be void of interest to the general reader. We will begin with a winter's tale, to which we listened, under a most favorable conjunction of domestic and friendly planets, this last Christmas; the narrator being grandson to the heroine, and of course able to vouch for its authenticity.

Once upon a time—somewhere in the reign of George II.—a certain German colonel, in the service of the house of Hanover married a young English lady of great beauty and little fortune. In accordance with a courteous modern fashion, not common, however, in those days, some noble friends of the bride offered the young couple a home during the honeymoon, in their ancient and splendid castle in the north of England. The hospitality was accepted; and, as at the end of that period the soldier was suddenly compelled to rejoin his regiment, and embark for Germany, then the scene of war, the lady's stay was to be prolonged, at the request of her hostess, till his return. That period never came. He fell in battle a few months after his departure, and his wife did not long survive him. She died after giving birth to a daughter, whom on her death-bed she commended to the guardianship and care of Lady P——.

The trust was accepted. The orphan thus cast upon their protection was reared by Lord and Lady P—— as their own child in all things save one. They were Romanists; but her mother having been of the Church of England, their sense of honor prevailed, and they had her educated in the reformed faith, sending her every Sunday to the clergyman of the parish for religious instruction. She grew up a beautiful woman, accomplished also beyond her sex in those days; and so it chanced that Lord P——'s third son, returning from his continental tour, was struck by the change time had wrought in his heretofore playmate, and forthwith fell in love with the portionless but bewitching little heretic. Now, it might fairly be imagined, that they who had loved and reared the young girl as their own daughter, and who had proved themselves so generous, just, and honorable, would have gladly sanctioned this union; but it was not so. Her religion—albeit she owed it to themselves—was an objection not to be overcome, even although she offered to change her faith, which, taught only at intervals, and contradicted by the habits and tone of thought of her daily associates, had not taken very firm root. Such a conversion, in truth, might justly be suspected under the circumstances, and the usual plan, therefore, was adopted—the lovers were separated. Lord P—— procured a commission for his son in the army of Frederick the Great of Prussia, and sent the young lady on a trip to Portugal, under the care of the English ambassador, who was his intimate friend, trusting that she might meet with somebody abroad who would prove a successful rival to the young soldier.

If worldly prudence was not one of William P——'s virtues, its lack was not apparent in his new position. He was serving a master who was not at all inclined to think discretion the better part of valor, and who watched with admiration through his telescope the desperate and daring courage with which the young Englishman carried a difficult post in his second battle. Turning to one of the officers of his staff when the day was won, Frederick desired him to summon "that brave English captain" to his presence. He was respectfully reminded that the young soldier did not hold that rank. "He has done so from the moment I remarked his conduct," was the reply. In the same summary style of promotion, the king greeted the Englishman at the close of another battle as "Major P——," adding a gracious wish to know if there were anything the young officer desired which he, Frederick, could grant. No more unwelcome reply could have been devised than the one made to this royal kindness. Major P—— respectfully requested permission to quit the service! Frederick heard him with as much surprise as displeasure; but after his implied promise to grant the request, he could not refuse. An order of dismissal was therefore drawn out officially, ending, according to the usual form, thus: "Major P—— is therefore at liberty to go —," the blank being left for the king to fill in. The angry Frederick added these words: "au diable, Frederick Rex." This curious dismissal and royal autograph are still preserved in Major P——'s family.

The officer did not go in the direction indicated; he merely proceeded to a country, the fends of which are, according to a sailor's proverb, "too civil by half." He went to Portugal; and, shortly after his arrival in Lisbon, renewed, as a matter of course, his family intimacy with the English ambassador, who having never heard of the forbidden love-passages between his fair charge and the younger son of the P——s, made him always welcome at the Embassy; and so the days glided happily away, till a letter from the ambassador communicated to Lord P—— the startling intelligence of his son's presence in Lisbon, and his frequent visits to his old friend. The reply to this missive was a positive prohibition to the intercourse of the lovers, with which the good-natured envoy was obliged to comply. Their enforced estrangement fell heavily on both, especially on the lady, whose delicate spirits became suddenly and strangely affected. She grew faint and languid, without apparently suffering pain; and finally, to all appearance, died. The ambassador's daughters, young women of her own age, were greatly touched by this tragic catastrophe of the romance. The corpse was kept beyond the usual time in warm countries; and at their earnest and tearful entreaty, the despairing lover was permitted once more to behold his fair betrothed before the grave closed over her. It was the night preceding the intended interment; the coffin, which had already received its cold, still inmate, was placed upon a table covered with a black pall; the chamber was hung with black, and dimly lighted by large wax tapers, placed at the head of the bier. Tremblingly, the young man raised the veil which covered the face of the dead, and gazed upon the calm, fixed, colorless features in silent agony; then, bending down, he kissed the white lips fervently again and again — and oh, strange marvel of nature! the tale of the Sleeping Beauty, became a reality;

A touch, a kiss! the charm was snapt;

the lips trembled slightly, the eyelids moved; and the truth — enough to have turned a weaker head — flashed on him: she was not dead, but in a trance! With wonderful presence of mind, he extinguished the lights, lifted the sleeper from her coffin, and bore her into the next room, thus saving her from perhaps a fatal shock. Gradually the vital powers were restored; but no commands could now keep William P—— from her whom he had thus restored from the grave.

There had been no possibility of doubting the reality of the trance. The young lady had been insensible, cold, motionless, and, in the judgment of her physicians, dead for more than a week; and a full and faithful account of this strange incident was forwarded by the ambassador — now an intercessor for the lovers — to Lord P——. But, singular and touching as the incident was, it wrought no change in the sternness of the parents' determination; and feeling that he could not again expose his betrothed to such suffering, and hoping that when the deed was irrevocable they should be pardoned, William married the fair sleeper in defiance of all prohibitions, and carried her with him to England.

If happiness were to be estimated by worldly prosperity, it had been better perchance for her to have slept on. They wrote a supplication for pardon to Lord and Lady P—— as soon as they reached London; but no reply was vouchsafed, no pardon ever granted, and the rash young couple found themselves in the great city friendless and destitute, the younger son's allowance having been discontinued by his father. What was to be done? Never were moral courage and energy more needed. But the fair sleeper possessed both; she was, moreover, an excellent artist, painting flowers admirably, and in those days the market for talent was not overstocked: perhaps, also, her story may have been whispered abroad, and the secret interest of the ambassador exerted in her behalf. She sold her paintings and little fancy articles — the fashion of the times — screens, and baskets, and painted fans, successfully, and thus supported her husband and herself. Strange contrast must their life have presented from its earlier years! Instead of the stateliest of England's homes — the poor obscure lodging; instead of all luxury and ease, appliances and means to boot of grandeur — the toil and the struggle for daily bread. Yet they were very happy. Both had doubtless learned the insufficiency of wealth and station to confer bliss, and found pleasures undreamed of before in the exercise of talent, in the pretty, needful toil, in the thousand little ties of sympathy and mutual hopes and fears, comfortings and encouragements. The fancy loves to dwell upon the interior of that home: the quaint little room with its old-fashioned furniture, the few stiff chairs, the polished table, the worked fire-screen, partially protecting the fair young artist from the blaze of the cheerful fire as she bends over her task, and groups of roses and lilies, and all the sweet old-world flowers, upon her paper, or on the velvet or tiffany destined for her lady-employers; whilst her husband, seated at her side, beguiles the incessant toil of its weariness by reading to her in a low sweet voice, or telling her of the great Frederick, and of the battles fought beneath the Prussian eagle. This is the fairest side of the picture. Many a real care and harassing anxiety must, nevertheless, have haunted the mind of the sleeper awakened, especially when the birth of her child, a daughter, demanded greater exertion and larger means. But there was no end to the ups and downs in the life of the honorable William P——. About this time, a distant relative, who had been interested by the romance of his love, died, and left him a large fortune — a greater trial than poverty to many a spirit. For a time, however, they enjoyed this sunshine of fortune — the more, indeed, from recent privation and poverty; but William was not—as his story thus far has shown—gifted with any great store of worldly prudence. There were numerous bubbles afloat in that day, marvellous contrivances for making—or, more certainly, marring—fortunes in an incredibly short space of time; and he was seized with the prevailing mania, entered into a wild speculation, and lost nearly all the wealth that had been so opportunely sent.

Once more the gaunt spectre, poverty, stood in the path of the sleeper, at a time, too, when the energy and spirit of youth had fled; and this time it forced the separation which nothing had been able to effect before. William P— resolved to return to Prussia, and reënter the service of Frederick; whilst his wife and their only daughter established a school for young ladies, with the money still remaining from their recent wealth. And thus years rolled by. The patient, industrious mother succeeded in retrieving some portion of their losses; the rash, eager, but generous husband, won laurels and wounds in still quicker succession. The daughter married, and became ultimately the grandmother of the narrator of the story; and, finally, General William P— returned, a few limbs minus, and very gray, but still fondly beloved, to his home, and died, full of years and honors, in the arms of his awakened sleeper.

Let us next introduce our reader to a small chamber in a country parsonage, a little later in the same century. The room presented a perfect picture of neatness, quiet, and repose. It was very plainly furnished, but manifested a certain elegance and refinement in the arrangement of the few simple ornaments on the chimney-piece, the flowers and books, and the old china cup of cooling drink that stood on a small round table by the open window, through which the warm air of summer stole softly, laden with perfume from the mignonette and stocks that flourished in the little garden beneath it. The sun's rays, broken by the fresh green leaves of a large walnut-tree, cast a clear, pleasant light through the snowy dimity-curtains of the bed on the face of an invalid who lay there, gazing with the listlessness of weakness, on the glimpse of blue sky visible from the open casement. It was a countenance that sunlight might be imagined to love, so good and gentle was it. Nor did its expression belie the heart within. A holy, charitable, unselfish man was that village pastor; but with the resemblance he bore—and it was a strong one—to Goldsmith's portrait of his brother, there mingled much of the thoughtlessness and improvidence of the poet himself; and the consequence of his boundless charities, and of his ignorance of money-matters, had led him into embarrassments, from which he saw no escape. He would have cared little had his difficulties affected his own comfort only; but they fell likewise on those dearest to him, and anxiety for their sakes preying on his affectionate and rather timid spirit; the probable shame of an execution in his house, and the nervous horror he felt at the idea of being consigned to a prison, had brought on his present illness, and haunted his thoughts as he lay there in solitude after many restless nights of agonized and perplexed reflection, listening to the church-bells ringing for Sunday service, at which a stranger was to fill his place. From the days of Whittington to the present, the imagination has frequently given a language to those airy voices; and the poor pastor, as he lay overpowered and exhausted by long hours of painful and fruitless meditation, felt the nightmare, like a load of care which oppressed him, pass off as he listened, and a childlike faith in the goodness of Providence once more dawning on his mind. We do not pretend to interpret what they whispered, but it is certain that, soothed by the chimes, he yielded to a gentle and profound slumber, in which his wife found him shortly afterwards.

Care was at first taken not to break this desired repose; but as noon, evening, night, nay, a second day passed, and still it continued, his family became alarmed, and tried to rouse him. In vain! The awful slumber was as inexorable as that of death itself. It bound his senses in an iron forgetfulness. He could not be awakened by sound or touch. Sun after sun rose and set, and still the deep sleep continued. Meantime the evils he had dreaded gathered round his family. His physical condition preserved his personal freedom; but an execution was put in his house, and his wife and daughters were exposed to the direst evils of poverty. The rumor, however, of his trance-like slumber was noised abroad, and reached the lordly dwelling of a nobleman who resided near the spot, though he was not one of the clergyman's parishioners. Being much given to the study of physical science, he visited the parsonage to request permission to see the sleeper, and thus learned the varied sorrow that had fallen on its gentle inmates. With equal delicacy and generosity he proffered as a loan the means of paying the harsh creditors, assuring the poor wife that if her husband should ever wake, he would give him the means of repaying the pecuniary obligation. The offer was thankfully accepted, and the debt discharged. For the following two days, Lord E— was a regular visitor at the parsonage.

Sunday morning again dawned—once more the sun-light fell on the sleeper's pillow, and the bells called men to pray. Beside the couch were seated the miserable wife and her noble friend. The faint, regular breathings of the trance-chained man deepened, and to her anxious ear the difference was perceptible, though Lord E—— shook his head, as she told him of it. She bent eagerly over the pillow: there was a slight flutter of the eyelids; she held her breath, and clasped her hands in an agony of expectation and dawning hope. The hand, so long motionless, stirred; the eyes opened: she could not speak for overpowering joy. The sleeper raised his head, slightly smiled on her, and observed; "I thought I had slept longer—the bell has not yet ceased ringing!"

He was unconscious that a whole week had elapsed since its tones had soothed him to rest. The wife fainted, and was conveyed from the chamber. The doctor was summoned; he found his patient weak, but not otherwise ill. A still more extraordinary mental cure had been effected by the genius of Sleep: he had totally forgotten his threatened difficulties, and from that hour recovered rapidly. Lord E—— conferred a living of some value on him; and when he was strong enough to bear the disclosure, his wife informed him of the loan so nobly bestowed on them, and the suffering from which he had been so marvellously preserved. The lesson was not lost. The new rector henceforward strove to unite prudence and generosity; and a career of worldly prosperity, as well as the far greater blessing of an implicit and cheerful faith in Providence, attended the renewed life of the sleeper awakened.

In both these instances, the sleep or trance was dreamless and unconscious. But there is one remarkable case on record,* in which the body only of the sleeper was subject to this death-like thralldom of slumber, the mind remaining awake; and the account given by the individual who endured this interval of life in death, is very singular and interesting. She was an attendant on a German princess; and, after being confined to her bed for a great length of time, with a nervous disorder, to all appearance died. She was laid in a coffin, and the day fixed for her interment arrived. In accordance with the custom of the place, funeral songs and hymns were sung outside the door of the chamber in which the fair corpse lay. Within they were preparing to nail on the lid of the coffin, when a slight moisture was observed on the brow of the dead. The supposed corpse was of course immediately removed to a different couch, and every means used to restore suspended vitality. She recovered, and gave the following singular account of her sensations:

* In an old magazine, dating 1798; and also in Dr. Crichton's Essays.

"She was perfectly conscious of all that passed around her; she distinctly heard her friends speaking and lamenting her death; she felt them clothe her in the garments of the grave, and place her in the coffin. This knowledge produced a mental anxiety she could not describe. She tried to speak or cry, but vainly; she had no power of utterance; it was equally impossible for her to raise her hand or open her eyes, as she vainly endeavored to do. She felt as if she were imprisoned in a dead body. But when she heard them talk of nailing the lid on her, and the mournful music of the funeral-hymns reached her ear, the anguish of her mind attained its height, and agony mastering that awful spell of unnatural slumber, produced the moisture on her brow, which saved her from being entombed alive."

One more little anecdote of a somewhat similar kind, which was related to us on the authority of a Hastings fisherman, and we will close our paper. It occurred during the cholera. The people of England have an especial horror of this terrible scourge, and nothing will induce them to believe that the infection is in the air, and not in the person affected by the complaint; consequently it was difficult, in some places, to persuade them to perform the last offices for the dead, and they hurried the interment of the victims of the pestilence with unseemly precipitation. A poor seafaring-man, who had been long absent from his native land, returning home at the time it was raging, found that his wife had been dead about three days, and that her coffin had been placed in a room with those of others, who, lodging in the same dwelling, had also perished of the disease. Greatly afflicted, the sailor insisted on seeing his dead wife. The neighbors would have dissuaded him, but his affection and grief disdained all fear, and he rushed into the chamber of death. There, forcing open the lid of the coffin, and bending over the beloved corpse, the rude mariner shed tears, which fell fast upon the pallid face, when suddenly a sound, something like a sigh, was emitted from the white lips, and the next instant the exhausted and death-like sleeper opened her eyes, and gazed up in his face! The joy of the poor fellow may be imagined.

We might multiply instances of this phenomenon, but as they would probably be familiar to the reader, or have at least been told before, we shall but add a wish that the old adage, "Too much of a good thing," may not be found a practical truth with regard to his sleep; and wish

To all and each a fair good-night,
And pleasing dreams and slumbers light.

From Sharpe's Magazine.

THE GARDEN OF EDEN.

FROM A TRAVELLER'S NOTE BOOK.

I HAD been travelling all the weary night, aching on my saddle, and longing for repose. It was an October morning, crisped with frost, when I had to ford the Euphrates river, at that time about girth deep. I was strongly imbued with the impression that I was now entering upon the site of the reputed Garden of Eden; the traditionary lore of the Armenians now occupying the district was to this effect; they will have it that Adam was an Armenian, and that he was of their own color, though from whence the black race proceeded they never could make out. The stream was diverted into different channels, from one of which I drank, and would imagine it to be the spot where Father Adam had similarly refreshed himself, nearly six thousand years ago, though he had not the advantage of my drinking-cup.

What a wild and desolate aspect did this reputed Eden present to me! the low and swampy soil teeming with rushes. Desolation had swept it with her blasts; the cormorant and the bittern had here their hiding-place, but that sterner savage, man, was the most feared of any animal. Our little caravan was halted, the fire-arms were looked to, our chief, marshalling us in battle array, expecting every moment a surprise.

Some horsemen were seen in the distance. At rapid rate they came down upon us; but, instead of Koords, they were three Armenian bishops, with their attendants, from the little monastery of "Uch Kileseu," which was perched on a rock at the margin of the stream. The church is said to be the most ancient in Christendom, being built more than twelve hundred years ago. The whole is a remarkable-looking fabric, having the appearance of three churches, which its name implies. These worthies of the Armenian Church, instead of sporting cowl and cosnick, sported sword and pistol. Seeing travellers in the distance, their hospitality led them to come out to escort us to the refectory, and to warn us of those hidden dangers with which the country teemed. The monastery itself had been formerly converted into a fortress to protect them against the Koords; such was the excess of brigandage even in Eden! The worthy fathers had been often bearded by these Koords in their own entrenchments, and had withstood many a siege of chapel and battery.

The grim outline of the country bespoke sterility and waste in its harshest features; the low boggy soil which we were traversing was sandy, sedgy, and well stocked with wild boar; it did not suit our day's travel to accept the worthy monks' hospitality, so, with much cordial exchange of greetings, and thanks on our part, they galloped off to a ravine in search of Koords. The bridle-rein seemed quite as familiar to them as the crosier, the high-peaked saddle as the pulpit cushion; they seemed to enjoy the sport of Koord-hunting, and, like old accustomed sportsmen, could almost scent their tracks.

Of all my Asiatic travel, which has occupied me so many thousands of hours, I scarcely recollect any place so utterly desolate and wasted as I was now going over, though great interest was attached to it as being reputed Bible ground. Mount Ararat was visible in the distance, towering in the sky with majestic grandeur, and a brilliant sun lit up the mass of snow on its summit, the clouds rolling visibly at the base. It was a glorious sight, and Little Ararat at the side, in mimic pomp, served as a sort of foil to the huge dimensions of one of nature's loftiest summits. An immense plain intervened, on which Noah's descendants might have located, and I could imagine creation, preservation, and all those glorious events to which Scripture testifies to have taken place there. There is a holy awe inspired on going over the soil which we imagine God to have personally visited; to see the mountain where he had evidently sheltered his chosen Noah from the raging of the mighty floods, and to be on the spot where was first seen his promised token, that he would no more drown the earth in her own waters, and where he had provided a spacious plain for his people to multiply, and from thence accomplish his great purposes of creation.

We are obliged to draw largely upon the imagination to "feather the wings of time" in Asiatic travel, and I was full of dreamy speculations respecting the earthly abode of our first parents until we arrived at the village of Diaden, which was occupied with Russian troops, the invasion of Turkey by the latter power being then in full force. I went to the citadel to pay my respects to the commandant (Prince Tchitchiwisouff), who was very gracious to the weary traveller. He commented immediately on the interest of my morning's ride, by saying, "Vous avez passé par le véritable Paradis." I bowed my assent to his excellency, hoped it was so, felt rather incredulous, and having obtained permission to continue my journey (the country being then subject to Russian rule), I proceeded to a wretched mud-hovel, the best accommodation which we could procure, to cater amongst the villagers for food, as well as for Paradisiacal information. The Turkish villages are burrowed under ground, and small hillocks appear here and there, with a central hole for the ingress of air and the issue of smoke. To my great consternation and surprise, I once rode over a dwelling in this way, without being aware of it until my horse's feet became plunged amongst the rafters (see Three Years in Persia, vol. I.); and in this instance, we were sadly inconvenienced by the dust, since the roof of the house where we were accommodated was the principal thoroughfare of the village. The rude villagers, ignorant as they were, were yet agreed on the point as to the locality of Eden, that the ground which I had come over was the site of the garden of our first parents; it was beyond all controversy with them, and I query if they had ever heard of any other. They are a remarkably ignorant race, having never learned letters; but few can read beyond the priests, for whom they have great veneration; their government is ecclesiastical, the chief patriarch residing at Etch Meizen on the other side the mountain. They spoke of the "Frat," or, as some call it, the "Hu Phrah," that ancient river Euphrates. This and Ararat are two undisputed points with all geographers, however much they may otherwise differ.

I had crossed it at different places; this river has its principal sources in the mountains of Armenia, one of which is about twelve miles from Erzuroume, the other is near Byzid; these two streams, pursuing a westerly direction, are near Mount Taurus turned into a south-east course by a range of mountains in that neighborhood; it is then joined by the Tigris, and these, when united, form one of the noblest rivers in the East, which falls into the gulf of Persia, fifty miles south-east of Bussorah, the whole course being about 1,600 miles. The Araxes, said to be the Gihon of Moses, takes its rise in a mountain called Abbas; it runs south-east across Armenia and a part of Persia, in a serpentine course of upwards of 500 miles, ultimately discharging itself into the Caspian Lake. This is a very rapid stream, and when swollen with the winter snows, nothing can withstand its violence. The Tigris is said to be the Hiddekel of Moses, and the other branch of the Euphrates to be the Pison of Moses; the latter flows into the Persian Gulf.

Having thus ascertained, from the best authorities which I can find, what are the four rivers mentioned by Moses, I will now briefly state what these authorities say as to the locality of the Garden of Eden.

Several of the fathers believed that there never was a local Paradise, and that all which the Scriptures say of it must be taken in an allegorical sense; and so preposterous have been the speculations respecting it, that some have planted it in the third heaven, within the orb of the moon, and under the equator. I will not recapitulate the absurdities, or rather the ribaldry of the Mahomedan superstitions on the subject; they merely testify to the concurrent belief that there was a terrestrial Paradise somewhere on the earth.

To show the wide latitude entertained by some writers, Josephus supposed that the Ganges and the Nile were two of the rivers mentioned by Moses. Other commentators have looked for it in Arabia, Syria, Chaldea, Palestine, and Armenia, near the cities of Damascus and Tripoli; and some have been so absurd as to suppose that it was on the spot now occupied by the Caspian Lake.

There are many places in the world which bear the name of Eden; there is one near Damascus, another near Thessaly in Chaldea, and again near Tripoli in Syria; and Aden, on the coast of Yemen, is construed into Eden; but this is straining a construction too far to meet any reasonable credence.

Opposed to all those chimerical absurdities, I will now state what appears to me the most reasonable conclusion as to the site of the Garden of Eden, and it agrees with the locality which I have traversed. A very eminent writer says: "Eden is as evidently a real country as Ararat, where the ark rested, and Shinaar, where the sons of Noah removed after the flood. We find it mentioned in Scripture as often as the other two, and there is the more reason to believe it, because the scenes of these three remarkable events are laid in the neighborhood of one another in the Mosaiical history; but the Jews, from their distractions, losing all remembrance of these localities, hence the Christian inquirers have lost their way for want of guides." Calmet, and some other ingenious writers, were of the same opinion, viz., that the terrestrial Paradise was in Armenia, near Mount Ararat, where Noah's ark was left. They imagined that they there discovered the sources of the four rivers which watered the garden of Eden. I can only say, that, with the exception of the Euphrates, they had dried up, or had disappeared, when I went over the ground, since I was many days near and under Ararat; the mountain was so huge, that, after travelling a whole day from it, it scarcely seemed to lose its dimensions.

Of this mountain, I learn from the same authority, "The situation of Ararat is very convenient for the journey of the sons of Noah from thence to Shinaar, the distance not being very great and the descent easy. We discover plainly, through the Mosaiic history, a neighborhood between the land of Eden, where man was created; that of Ararat, where the remains of mankind were saved; and that of Shinaar where they fixed the centre of their habitation."

I am the more confirmed in my opinion as to this locality of the Garden of Eden the farther I extend my researches, and, when I beheld this towering pillar, Ararat, standing on the frontiers of three mighty empires, Russia, Turkey, and Persia — this "mountain of the deluge," 16,000 feet high — it was a most imposing monument of nature. Tradition sublimates it, and Bible associations give it a grandeur scarcely to be exceeded by any in the world; at the north, south, and east, it stands completely alone; in the west it is connected with the Adraigag chain, which stretches down to the Araxes. The village of Argicire, which once stood in a ravine of Ararat, 2,500 feet high, was according to tradition the oldest village in the world; here the vine was first planted by Noah, but it no longer exists. On the 20th June, 1840, after a hot and sultry day, at about dusk, the ground clave asunder, yielding up smoke and steam, the earth heaved, the mountains were rent, and hurling down immense masses of rock upon the village, the whole was buried! and, of nearly a thousand inhabitants, mostly Armenians, only about a hundred and forty escaped, in consequence of their absence. The next day Noah's mountain was as silent as the morning after the deluge; it may be truly said that "Ararat is not dead, but sleepeth."

Mr. Mylne says, that "in all ages learned men have labored to find out the situation of Paradise, which seems to be but a vague and uncertain inquiry; for the Mosaic description of it will not suit any place on the present globe. He mentions two rivers in its vicinity Pison and Gihon, of which no present traces can be found; the other two still remain, Hiddekel, supposed to be the Tigris, and the Euphrates, whose streams unite together at a considerable distance above the Persian Gulf, in some part of which it is probable the happy garden lay; but since the formation of the earth it has undergone great changes from earthquakes, inundations, and many other causes."

Where did Moses write his history, becomes a question. Some say that it was at Nineveh; others in the wilderness of Sinai; and, again, that it was written in Arabia Petrea, in some place nearly adjoining the river Pison, which bounds Havilah, and discharges itself in the Persian Gulf, this river being the nearest to him of the four which he named in the book of Genesis. The etymology of the word from "Poscha," to spread itself, corresponds to its situation, the waters of which are sometimes so high and violent that no sufficient defence can be formed against their irruption.

Havilah was at the eastern extremity of this part of Arabia; the land abounded with gold, bdellium, the onyx, &c. Writers have differed respecting the meaning of the term bdellum or bedolaeh, some supposing it to have been pearls, and others that it was gum. Moses takes his wife, Zipporah, from this country, and here his first son was born, Gersham, and here he takes leave of Jethro, his father-in-law, to visit his brethren in Egypt.

It has been argued that Moses, by saying that the garden was planted "eastward in Eden," that it was designed to mark the particular spot where it was situated, which must have been at one of the turnings of the river, which goes from east to west, and which here branches into two streams, the Pison and the Euphrates; and, subsequently passing out of Eden, are divided into four heads. This hypothesis, which was first started by Calvin, is followed by many other writers. After all these speculations on the subject, the Mosaic description does not agree with the present state of things, for there is no common stream of which the four rivers are properly branches. Some say that Moses had a very imperfect knowledge of the world of which he wrote. How can this apply to the inspired Word! Others speculate on the changes which the flood had produced. Scarcely any two authorities do I find to agree, and the more I grope my way to the real Eden, the more difficult and intricate does it seem to be.

I will now trace a little further how these intricacies arise. Pastellus will have it that Paradise was under the North Pole; others contend that it was not limited to any particular place, but that it included the face of the whole earth, which was then one continued scene of pleasure until altered by Adam's transgression. Both Origen and Philo treat the Scripture account of Paradise as an allegory. Huet, Bochart, and others, place it beyond the confluence of the Tigris and the Euphrates, with both of which the Garden of Eden was watered. Pison was a branch arising out of one of them, and Gihon was another branch flowing from it on the side of Armenia. Huet thinks that it was situated in a valley between the mountains of Libanus and Anti-libanus, in that part of Syria of which Damascus was the capital. A town called Paradise was in this vicinity, which is mentioned by both Pliny and Ptolemy. There is a village called Eden in Tripoli, situated on Mount Libanus, near to the river Adonia and to the cedars of Libanus. Maundrell mentions this village as being in the vicinity of the terrestrial Paradise; but this seems to bear no analogy whatever to the description given by Moses. The term Eden is often used in Scripture (see Amos i. and v., and other Prophets).

Having wandered about in the mazes of speculation to find the terrestrial Paradise, I will now cursorily dwell on the etymology of the word "Paradise," which was primarily used to indicate the place in which Adam was seated during his innocence. The Greek word implies "orchard," or a place stored with apples and all sorts of fruits. It may be also called the "garden of delight," from the same language, "voluptus," or pleasure. It is likewise used in the New Testament for the final habitation of the blessed, or "Heaven." The word "Eden," according to its primary meaning in the Hebrew language, likewise means "pleasure," or "delight;" and it has been imagined that this gave rise to those curious gardens in the East, which princes caused to be made to represent the most delightful spots. Even going back to Nimrod's time, he insisted that the Tower of Belus, erected by Nebuchadnezzar, was in structure and in size a typical Paradise, with its appurtenances of hanging gardens and quadruple watercourses, representing the four rivers which went round the garden planted eastward in Eden. These gardens are celebrated in Persia, and I have visited several of these delightful enclosures; the name "Baguy Soffre," the literal translation of which is "Garden of Delight," (see Three Years in Persia, vol. 1, p. 76). The Elysian Fields, the Gardens of the Hesperides, of Jupiter, and of Alceneus and Adonis, are supposed to have their origin from the Garden of Eden. Other curious speculations have arisen out of it, as to how far the ground of Eden was bituminous, since they say that a large portion of it to the eastward was on fire during the awful expulsion of Adam. God's judgments being executed by his angels, who are sometimes compared to flames of fire, it is supposed that the flaming sword was nothing more than the ground being ignited, and that at a distance it appeared like a brandished sword, turning every way with the wind. Others imagine the sword to have been no more than the torrid zone, or a region of flame inconceivably hot, like a furnace, and consequently impassable—its encompassing the whole earth sufficiently answering the Mosaic description that it turned every way.

What became of our first parents, after their expulsion from Paradise, I cannot find out. It is presumed that they did not remove far off. The corpse of Adam was said to have been carried by Noah into the ark, and to have been afterwards buried by him; and I visited the reputed tomb of Noah's wife at Marand, a village about a hundred miles from Ararat. The period of their remaining in Paradise is very vaguely given. The sixth day, when God terminated his great work of creation, is mentioned as the day of transgression; but some think that a day and a year had at that time the same meaning. The juice of the forbidden fruit is said to have opened the eyes of the criminals by that awful mystery of sin! They felt the full degradation of their nature—they fell from innocence to shame—they shuddered at the presence of their Maker; the ground was cursed for their sake, as was all their posterity, and I feel in every pore of me that legacy of the divine vengeance which can only be cleansed by that precious blood "which cleanseth from all sin." The awful realities of the curse were before me of this reputed Garden of Eden. "Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth." A few wretched huts were occupied by the most degraded species of the wild Koords; these were notorious brigands. Nothing remained of that once blissful garden of DISCOVERY OF A BURIED CITY.—A buried city has been discovered in Egypt, named Saccakareh. It appears to be situated about five hours' journey from Cairo, near the first cataract. An Arab having observed what appeared to be the head of a sphynx appearing above the ground near this spot, drew the attention of a French gentleman to the circumstance, who commenced excavating, and laid open a long-buried street, which contained 38 granite sarcophagi, each of which weighed about 68 tons, and which formerly held evidently the ashes of sacred animals. The French gentleman has got a grant of the spot from the Egyptian Pacha, and has exhumed great quantities of curiosities, some of them ancient earthenware vessels of a diminutive size. This street, when lit up at night, forms a magnificent sight. It is upwards of 1,600 yards in length. Many of the curiosities dug out have to be kept buried in sand to preserve them from perishing.

The Miseries of Human Life,—an old friend in a new dress. Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Co. have published in a neat form, a new edition of this work, which had great popularity when it first appeared some thirty-five years ago. The present editors have made some alterations in the work, judging it "best, in some cases, to substitute for certain dilemmas which are neither old enough nor new enough to be piquant, corresponding ones costumed for our own time and meridian, lest the Testys and Sensitives of to-day—it is a great family—should set us down as fellows of no mark or likelihood; a conclusion which might affect our market and livelihood, in the long run, by making it short."

It is sometimes a doubtful experiment to unearth the forgotten jokes of the last generation, but there is so much real wit in the "Miseries," and men and women are always so much the same, that in this instance we think it will prove successful.—Daily Adv.

TO THE READER.

Don't skip "Sunday in the Nineteenth Century." Perhaps it is not so good as you think. There is a great deal of variety in it which will interest you. Some parts of the subject, which are generally neglected by good people, are brought out in a strong light; and the style and manner of the whole article are new, piquant, peculiar. Perhaps you may get entertainment enough out of it to make amends for the instruction you will get at the same time.

M. and Mad. Pulszky make a very free, and yet kind, use of a good many private names and houses. The Baroness D'Oberkirch gives a picture of the times of Louis XVI., which may serve as a pendant.

The great difficulty is to get grave old gentlemen to read the Tales. If they will try, they can do it, for these are good.

The number pleases us, though we hope to have generally a greater variety, especially of short articles.

THE promise that a second dramatic version of Uncle Tom's Cabin should be produced at the Gaité on Saturday last was duly kept. The authors, MM. Wailly and Texier, so far differ from their predecessors at the Ambigu-Comique, that they look upon the original story as a thing to follow, not as a thing to avoid. They, however, contrive to end the tale happily for Tom, since St. Clare lives to liberate all his slaves, instead of dying just as he is about to do a good action. Interest in the African race has even spread to the theatres of the banlieue, which have had a black drama of their own, Le bœuf le Nègre. So successful has this been, that it has wandered from the banlieue to the little Beaumarchais, situated on the boulevard of that name.

A VERY extensive collection, in eight folio volumes, of the published works of Mr. George Cruikshank — said to be complete, and containing upwards of 2,800 different designs, colored and uncolored — passed on Thursday last under the hammer of Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson, for the sum of 87l. We had an opportunity of examining this collection with the attention which it deserved — and were indeed surprised at the fertility of invention and variety of observation visible throughout. In early life this really original artist was an imitator of Gillray — and worked in that great caricaturist's style with a masterly pencil. He soon, however, found out his strength, and became original. His middle, and perhaps best, period, was some twenty years ago; when he illustrated Fielding and Smollett — and caught that skill which has made his illustrations of "Oliver Twist" perhaps the happiest creations of his pencil. The collection which has led to these remarks will, we hope, find its way to the British Museum. — Athenæum

THE DESERTED GARDEN.

I MIND me in the days departed,
How often underneath the sun,
With childish bounds I used to run
To a garden long deserted.

The beds and walks were vanished quite ;
And wheresoe'er had fallen the spade,
The greenest grasses Nature led,
To sanctify her right.

I called it my wilderness,
For no one entered there but I.
The sheep looked in, the grass t' espy,
And passed ne'ertheless.

The trees were interwoven wild,
And spread their boughs enough about
To keep both sheep and shepherd out.
But not a happy child.

Adventurous joy it was for me !
I crept beneath the boughs, and found
A circle smooth of mossy ground
Beneath a poplar tree.

Old garden rose-trees hedged it in—
Bedropt with roses waxen-white,
Well satisfied with dew and light,
And careless to be seen.

Long years ago it might befall,
When all the garden flowers were trim,
The grave old gardener prided him
On these the most of all ;

And lady, stately overmuch,
Who moved with a silken noise,
Blushed near them, dreaming of the voice
That likened her to such !

And these to make a diadem,
She may have often plucked and twined ;
Half smiling as it came to mind,
That few would look at them.

Oh ! little thought that lady proud,
A child would watch her fair white rose,
When buried lay her whiter brows,
And silk was changed for shroud !

Nor thought that gardener, full of scorn
For men unlearned and simple phrase,
A child would bring it all its praise,
By creeping through the thorns.

To me upon my low moss seat,
Though never a dream the roses sent
Of science or love's compliment,
I ween they smelt as sweet.

Nor ever a grief was mine, to see
The trace of human step departed —
Because the garden was deserted,
The blither place for me !

Friends, blame me not ! a narrow ken
Hath childhood 'twixt the sun and sward !
We draw the moral afterward —
We feel the gladness then !

And gladdest hours for me did glide
In silence at the rose-tree wall :
A thrush made gladness musical
Upon the other side.

Nor he nor I did e'er incline
To mar or pluck the blossoms white —
How should I know but that they might Lead lives as glad as mine ?

To make my hermit-home complete,
I brought clear water from the spring,
Praised in its own low murmuring —
And cresses glossy wet.

And so, I thought my likeness grew (Without the melancholy tale)
To gentle hermit of the dale,
And Angelina too !

For oft I read within my nook
Such minstrel stories ! till the breeze
Made sounds poetic in the trees —
And then I shut the book.

If I shut this wherein I write,
I hear no more the wind athwart
Those trees ! — nor feel that childish heart
Delighting in delight !

My childhood from my life is parted ;
My footstep from the moss which drew
Its fair circle round : anew
The garden is deserted !

Another thrush may there rehearse
The madrigals which sweetest are —
No more for me ! — myself afar
Do sing a sadder verse !

Ah me ! ah me ! when erst I lay
In that child's-nest so greenly wrought,
I laughed to myself and thought
" The time will pass away ! "

I laughed still, and did not fear
But that, whene'er was past away
The childish time, some happier play
My womanhood would cheer.

I knew time would pass away —
And yet beside the rose-tree wall,
Dear God ! — how seldom, if at all,
I looked up to pray !

The time is past — and now that grows
The cypress high among the trees,
And I behold white sepulchres
As well as the white rose —

When wiser, meeker, thoughts are given,
And I have learnt to lift my face,
Remembering earth's greenest place
The color draws from heaven —

It something saith for earthly pain,
But more for heavenly promise free,
That I who was, would shrink to be
That happy child again.

WHEN things are considered from the outside, the number Two is certainly the most apparent cipher of the world; and that owing to the very nature of existence. All things go flocking in pairs before hoary Proteus, that time-honored shepherd of the Dorian mythology, who continually drove his countless creatures over the fields of space, and was the symbol of the heaven-descended energy, or soul, of the visible universe. Every positive has its negative, every part its counterpart, every right its left, every surface its substance, every position its opposite, every yes its no. Each child of the Mighty Mother is united in marriage with another, and the two are one; but each is nothing without the other, or rather (not to state the point too curiously at present) each is quite another thing without the other. Sun and planet, earth and moon, night and day, cold and heat, plant and animal, animal and man, man and woman, soul and body, are so many instances of this duality. Yet the contemplation of these relations is unsatisfactory, so long as this external point of view is insisted upon. There must be some deeper law, underlying all this apparent duality; and so, indeed, there is; but it cannot be seen without looking at things from the inside, that is to say, not from the sensation of them (nor yet the judgment according to sense concerning them) but from the Idea; — for this is one of those weightier matters which yield their secret only to the eye of spiritual discernment.

Beheld from the ideal point of view, then, night is not night without day, nor day day without night. The thought of night implies that of day. Be it supposed that the earth did not turn on its axis, yet going round the sun once a year, so that one hemisphere should bask in continual light, and the other lie in boundless shade. The imaginable Adam of the darkling side could never have called the unchanging state of his dreary gardens by the name of night; nor the restless denizen of the unshadowed and excessive paradise have ever known that the sun was the Lord of Day. It is impossible to pronounce the conception of Day, in the mind, without speaking that of Night at the same time, and also without (likewise in the same moment of thought) the intellectual sense of the likeness in unlikeness of Day and Night. Think Day, and you also think both Night and the Relation between Day and Night. In truth then the idea (call it that of Day, or that of Night) is threefold, not twofold; — Day, Night, and their Relation. Day is the thesis, Night the antithesis, their Relation the mesothesis of the triad — for triad it is, and not a mere pair or duad, after all. It is the same with all the other couples cited above, and with all couples, for every idea is a trinitarian. Positive pole, negative one, and that middle term wherein they are made one; sun, planet, their relation; solar atom, planetary one, their conjunction; and so forth. The term of relation, betwixt the opposites in these ideal pairs, is sometimes called the Point of Indifference, the mesoteric Point, the Mid-point. This mid-point is to be seen standing betwixt its right and left fellow-elements in every dictionary; for example, Men, Man, Women; or adjectively, male, human, female. "So God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them."

Now this threefold constitution of ideas is universal. As all things seem to go in pairs to sense, and to the understanding, so all are seen in threes by reason. This law of antinomy is no limited, no planetary law, nor yet peculiarly human; it is cosmical, all-embracing, ideal, divine. Not only is it impossible for man to think Beauty without simultaneously thinking Deformity, and their Point of Indifference, Justice without Injustice and theirs, Unity without Multiplicity and theirs; but those several theses (Beauty, Justice, Unity, namely) cannot be thought without these their antitheses, and without the respective middle terms of the pairs. As the eye of common-sense cannot have an inside without an outside, nor a solar orb without a planetary orbicle (inasmuch as it ceases to be solar the instant it is stript of its planet), so the eye of reason cannot see an inside without seeing an outside and also their connection as the inside and the outside of one and the same thing, nor a sun without his planet and their synthesis in the solar system. In short, three-in-one is the law of all thought and of all things. Nothing has been created, nothing can be thought, except upon the principle of three-in-one. Three-in-one is the deepest-lying cipher of the universe.

It were irrelevant in the present connexion to enlarge on the significance of the number five, or rather of five-in-one — for such is the true formula of all those Pythagorean figures, which have so pleased and tantalized the mind of man in every age. It was on the fifth day of creation that the animal kingdom proper made its appearance; — but, of course, man is never to be included in that kingdom, seeing he is an animal and something more, that something more being his greater part. It were as philosophical, in fact, to class an animal with the vegetable world, merely because it is a plant and something more, as to call man an animal. He is in the kingdom, but not of it; he has a sphere all to himself, constituting and belonging to the fifth kingdom of terrestrial nature. Precisely as a mineral is a congeries of atoms and something more, as a plant is a mineral and something more, and as an animal is a vegetable and something more, is man (be it repeated aloud) an animal and something far more — the space between him and the highest of the brutes being immeasurably greater than what separates the ox from his pasture, or the heather from the rock to which it clings. It was therefore on the Fifth day that the animal world was made manifest in the beginning, according to the Scripture. Now, there are five kinds of sensible forms, five structures or tissues, in the general anatomy of the animal nature; there is the amorphous, exemplified by the earthy nature of the bones and the fatty matters of the cellular substance; there is the globular shown in the blood, "which is the life;" the cellular, particularly seen in the skinny parts, but shed through the whole frame, covering, protecting, and supporting; the fibrous, the specific tissue of the muscular system, and entering into all tubular structures; and, fifthly, there is the cerebral, the proper matter of the brain and nerves, which no man can yet describe or qualify. There are likewise five organic systems in the more exalted "moving creature that hath life;" the stomach and its assistant chyle-elaborating organs; the quickening and circulating system, namely, the heart, the lungs, and the vessels; the muscular and bony, or the locomotive apparatus; the reproductive one; and, fifthly, the nervous system — "the be-all and the end-all here." Then the higher animal trunk (even such as occurs in the cetaceous sea-brutes, or great whales of the fifth day), itself containing five well-marked compartments, sends out five limbs, two hind-legs, two fore legs or arms or wings, and one neck; — for the innocent reader must understand that these new anatomists consider the animal head as nothing more than the last vertebra, or end-bone of the neck, developed to extravagance, as if it had been made of obstinate glass (like that in the well-known tale) and slowly expanded by some patient blow-pipe; and as for the tail, it is just the other end of the neck, and it can be done without, witness Man himself. Indeed, Man himself is the most perfect type, by way of inclusion always, of the animal form; just as a lion is really a more finished plant than any rooted palm in his jungle. It is therefore not out of place to take notice of his five senses, the five parts of which each of his legs and arms is composed, the five fingers of his hand, the five toes of his foot, and the five teeth in each of his four infantile jaws (those legs and arms of the face, the nose being the facial fifth or neck), not to mention any more of these fantastical, but obtrusive and innumerable fives. In short, the prevalence of this number Five in the animal domain has impressed the more recent mind of Europe with its image, just as it seized the imagination of the men of old; and an eminent continental naturalist founds his classification on the fact, taking Five as the cipher of animated nature.

To carry these cursory remarks about this number, and the fifth note of the weekly octave, a little farther (by way of curiosity, if not for much edification) it should be mentioned that an interesting and important proposition has been advanced and argued by Dr. Samuel Lee, the learned and authoritative Hebraist of Cambridge, which will be found to affect the present question in a touching manner.* That proposition is to the threefold effect; first, that the primitive Sabbath of those patriarchal epochs, which went before the Exodus of the rising Hebrew people from Egypt, was in reality put back a day by Moses, after and in commemoration of that outcome; secondly, that this was intended to be a temporary and purely Jewish change, or a mere deciduous graft, foreordained to fall off when the fulness of the time should come for making the whole world kin by and in Jesus Christ; and, thirdly, that the Sunday of Christendom is actually the Sabbath-day of Abraham. The professor pleads for this view with much erudition, and with a great show of reason; and he cites names no less redoubtable than Capellus, Ussher, and Gale in favor of the point, in whose researches the same result had come out. Now there is certainly no doubt, but that the all-conceiving editorial We are competent to the criticism of any and everything under the sun; but I, the present organ of that singular Plurality, know nothing of the Hebrew tongue and antiquities, and therefore refrain from venturing an opinion on the truth of this most ingenious and fruitful speculation.* But suppose it to be proved (and the extra-judicial mind will perhaps find it difficult to resist) then it follows that the Saviour arose, not on the first day of any but the Jewish, temporary, and purposely misdated week, but on the old, new, and sempiternal Sabbath of the world, as our divine observes.

To come down from those more solemn altitudes, and take up the numerical thread again: It might be charming, especially to such as are never afraid to inquire too curiously, to find out why Five follows Three with so much pertinacity everywhere; why it lays hold on us every time we shake hands; why it answers our eye from so many high places; what its ideal significance is; what it means; — in one word, what its rational ground can be; but Terminus forbids. It was both desirable and in keeping to bring out the secret of the tri-unity of all things and all thoughts, at the beginning of this criticism, and that because of its symbolical relation to the Divine Trinity; but these notes and queries about the natural and ideal Pentad or quincunx (to steal an illustration from the landscape-gardener) are intended partly to deepen the sense of numerical periodicity in the affairs of the constitution of man, and partly to serve as a bridge from the cosmical Triad to that peculiarly human cipher, number Seven, which is the proper object of Christian and civilized solicitude in this the nineteenth century.

According to the popular thought, finding its voice in poetry, the life of Man has seven ages. It is certain that his average æon, or proper period, is now threescore years and ten, being ten times seven years; and the climacteric periods of his length of days in any case, according to broad and general observation, are so many multiples of the same number. In the language of science, though not that of the nursery, the time of infancy lasts seven years. Then the first teeth have come laboriously out, during the six years; and had their little day of rest, in the seventh. Then the volume of the brain (not the head) is completed; at least, by the consent of the overwhelming majority of physiologists; and the fact, as it stands, has been heaved as a conclusive battering-ram against phrenology, by no less great a philosopher than Sir William Hamilton. Yet the proposition appears to be true only in a manner; and that a manner not incompatible with some actual or possible physiognomy of the head, which phrenology is or may well become. From the measurements of a more experienced and accurate craniometer than any predecessor, Mr. Straton, it comes out that, while the general figure and bulk of the brain is finished within the first seven years of life, yet, in a large porportion of men, the thing swells and fills up in a measurable enough degree, and in the few it actually grows and alters its shape, till the end of the forty-ninth annual revolution, a period of seven sevens, and the real completion of a man.* It is not only allowed, however, but strongly affirmed by this observer, that the expansion taking place (even in a Napoleon or, let it be supposed, a Shakspeare or a Newton) betwixt seven and forty-nine is small, in comparison with not only the growth from zero to seven, but even with what occurs between one end and the other of any of the first seven years. To continue; — the boy or girl ceases, and the man or woman begins to appear, upon the close of the fourteenth or second seventh year. Adolescence is done by the end of twenty-one, the third seventh; manhood and womanhood are brought to perfection (as such) by the twenty-eighth or fourth seventh year; and so forth: — but it is always to be understood that these periods and figures are deduced from a generalization taken, not only from all climates, but also from both sexes; for if woman is earlier, man is later, and the balance must be struck between them for undivided humanity. If the hand is analyzed, you have seven pieces — five fingers, metacarpus, and carpus; the foot — five toes, tarsus, and metatarsus: and when the arm is examined more curiously, than in that first glance which divides it into five, it yields you seven parts — the shoulder-blade and collar-bone (composing the shoulder), the humerus, the ulna or ell-long bone of the forearm, the fibula or brooch-pin bone of the same (and the reason these are counted two is obvious — the latter is planetary to the former, it revolves round it, it has a purpose of its own, it and its muscular system turn the wrist on the ell-bone, which alone is the true forearm), the carpal system or wrist, the metacarpal or palm, and, seventhly, the digital one or bunch of fingers. In short, just as the first look at man divides him into three, and the second into fives, he falls into sevens at the third analysis; and pages might be filled with its results, but it is better to refrain from anatomical detail. It has to be observed, however, that the pious mediæval transcendentalists were so pungently impressed by the sevenness of the microcosm, as they denominated man, that, having descried seven planets, they thought there could not possibly be any more, and therefore they made no more discoveries in that direction. They did the very same by their seven poor metals : and they associated these bright bodies, both in name and in the idea of mystical correspondence, with the days of the week and the planets, gold with Sunday and the Sun (for Sol was dethroned in the days of the Ptolemaic Astronomy, and degraded to the planetary estate), silver with Monday and the moon ; and so forth throughout the triple series. One can only say that the new Astronomy and Chemistry have exploded all this cunningly devised superstructure ; but the number of the planets is not yet determined, far less that of the metals, and therefore there is no saying what multiples of seven may come out in the long run. It is just possible, then, that the antique planetary and metallic Seven may turn out to be something more than fantastical jargon : — although it is certainly impossible not to laugh at the conceit of one of the latest ornaments of those old schools, who argued, against the earlier Copernicans, that it is beyond Omnipotence there should be more than seven planets, because there are only seven metals, and only seven holes in the head — two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, and one mouth !

The majority of our readers, and all our critics (since even critics and critics' critics have critics, like the dogs' man's man's man of my Lord Harkaway's kennel) will think this all moonshine ; yet your positive, sceptical, and contemptuous Modern Science is not, dares not, and cannot be ashamed of Seven ; for moonshine itself is a web of seven-twisted thread, and the moon (that Penelope, who weaves the ever-vanishing fabric) goes on her way, and does all her stints of work, to the music of the same homely number, whereby the very sea, "and the dead that are in it," are rocked in their great cradle to the self-same tune. No sooner is a pencil of light made to pass through a prism, than it blabs its secret, and shows itself seven-twined and beautiful. It is to no purpose that the more refining optician avers, that there are only three primary colors. Possibly, nay certainly, there are ; but there are seven colors of the rainbow, for all that. It is here as elsewhere, in fact ; for the first analysis gives three, the second five, and the third seven ; the first, third, and fifth constituting the natural chord of this painted scale. Ever since God did set his bow in the cloud, that robed on the mountains of Ararat, over against Noah and his household, on the occasion of that first family-worship after the flood, the children of Light have been saying, We too are Seven, with speechful look, if not with still small voice. But if the eye is silent, the ear is not deaf to the seven-toned rhythm of the universe, nor the mouth dumb to give it echo, nor yet the fingers without skill to fetch its antitype out of reeds and pipes and strings. Music, that catholic and published tongue, that speech of cherubim and seraphim, that poetry taken wing, that science passed into ecstasy, that transfiguration of the common state of man (whether in the body, or out of the body, one cannot tell) is also a system of sevens. Enough, in short, might be advanced to show that anatomy, physiology, optics, astronomy, and the science of music (which are surely not superstitious, nor mystical, nor transcendental, nor credulous of ancient authority) are all familiar with "the peculiarly human number Seven," as we have ventured to define it ; — and that not only because the body of man (that organization and summary of the known powers of nature) is figured all over, without and within, with Seven, but also because his thought has (sometimes instinctively, sometimes rationally, sometimes in superstition) embraced and sanctified it in all ages and lands, and likewise because it is the astronomical ratio of the sub-system to which his world belongs, namely, that of the earth-and-moon. It is a number which his spirit knows, which his soul loves, which his body like an illuminated missal shows forth ; and it is the very number of his house in the heavens ; an irresistible fact, which carries the mind right into the heart of the proper topic of this various, but not unproportioned, dissertation.

It is certain that the division of man's time into octaves, that is, into weeks of seven days each (the octave of one, being the first of the next week) is coextensive with history and tradition, and also coextensive with the world, except in those places where feeble races have gone prematurely down into dotage ; and such division has always been associated with the more or less serious consecration of one day, in the seven, as peculiar and supreme. Secular historians have never been slow to admit the fact ; the fathers of the church were forward to proclaim it ; and modern divines have not neglected to keep it forward. The day distinguished as festival, holiday, or high day of some sort, has invariably been that of the sun, the symbol of the creative energy of the invisible Godhead ; or at least the same day, with a corresponding name and significance. In truth, Dupuis, in his famous Origine de tous les Cultes (which presents an infamously shallow theory of human worship, however) insisted that the system of chronology, the mythologies of Egypt, India, old Greece, and even the mythology (as he considered it) of Christendom, have all sprung out of an elaborate scheme of Sun-worship and its Sundays ; and the book is so full of curious and important things, that the student of these matters might well study it with advantage, appropriate its treasures, and then laugh at its presumption in trying to explain a deeper phenomenon by means of one lying nearer the surface—as if a great brass handle could unlock the gates of St. Paul's in London city without a key! When the sevenfold analysis of Time began, history cannot tell, inductive science cannot find out, and no conjectural Dupuis or Volney of them all can divine. Not only as a writer in a Christian Review; nor yet as one who makes bold to “claim the honorable style of a Christian,” after the manner of Sir Thomas Browne in his preamble to his account of the Religion of a Physician; but also as the humblest of the disciples of an older philosophy, drawn from profounder sources than that of Helvetius and the Encyclopedia, I have not a doubt upon the point. I believe that man knew this, and many a far deeper secret, in Paradise, during the true pre-historic epoch of human story;* and that, after the fall from the intuitive and holy life of Eden, these things could not be forgotten in a day. Such is the idea set forth in the opening of the Book of Genesis; and since it is impossible to argue so great a proposition within these limits, it is better just to alight at once on the plain fact, be its interpretation what it may, that the oldest written record in the world not only claims a pre-historic and all-conceiving epoch or angelic infancy for the life of humanity, but at once announces the measure of earthly time by Seven, and that from the divine side of the thing. Before going a step farther then, let us look into this miraculous account of the creation. It is a strange story, and every well-bred child in Christendom knows it by heart; but few bearded men can agree about it, although no one is willing to give it up, it is so strange and true.

IN THE BEGINNING (how high and awful an archway into the scene!)—IN THE BEGINNING God (not found out by arguments of design, nor deduced from first principles, but known without a doubt, as the father is known to his children) CREATED THE HEAVEN AND THE EARTH. In the beginning (wherein was the Word) the city of God had been founded; the solar system and our world had been set in motion; but “the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep,” which covered it round. But “the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters” once more; and then began that preparation of the world for the inhabitation of man, which is commonly called the Creation; but, in reality, the earth had been made unknown sons before, even “in the beginning.”

I. For unknown sons the sun had been standing in the midst of his planets and their satellites, but no ray of light had yet reached the face of our deep, either because the sun had not yet grown luminous, or more likely because the vaporous darkness, that brooded over our waters, was still too thick. But at last it came, though not in sudden and full enough blaze to show the figures of either sun or moon; and a sunless gray morning arose upon the earth, to be followed by a moonless evening; for “God divided the light from the darkness;” and “the morning and the evening,” namely, the day and the night, “were the first day;” the day of the coming of light, therefore of necessity the first; the day of the first glad tidings of the sun; the Sunday of the awakening week of time.

* Truly pre-historic, because not progressive, being full. History wants struggle, development, rise, advancement, as its objects. A narrative of innocent days among the perfect is not History.

II. Under the impulse of this new-comer accession of muffled solar radiance, the waters divided; part arose, namely, the horrid mist, and fashioned itself into a spherul and unbroken cloud; part remained below, as it was, namely, the liquid element; and the atmospheric or skyey firmament stood between them. The day and night of this world-wide sublimation “were the second day.” One might well conjecture that the air was so far cleared in the course of the day-time of this day, that even the reflected light of the moon might penetrate, though still too faintly to reveal her form; and in that most impossible case, it has been appropriately invested with the name of Monday.

III. The next process was the standing out of the dry land or earth, and the gathering of the water into seas; followed by the springing of “tender grass,” or those seedless plants called acotyledons; of “the herb yielding seed,” or the monocotyledons; and of “the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth,” the crowning class or dicotyledons, capable of propagation by grafts and cuts, their seed being in themselves upon the earth. This was the third epoch; that of the coming forth of continents and islands, and their getting covered with the three kinds of plant, in their right order of succession; first, with stony lichens, muddy funguses, tender mosses, ferns, and the like; then, with reeds, grasses, palms, and all manner of herbs yielding seed, but whose seed is not in themselves; and, thirdly, with the completed vegetable, whose British type is the oak with its acorns. This is the Tuesday of our week; the day of the manifestation of vegetable organization and irritability, call it Life who will; sacred in that Scandinavian form of the old Pagan mythology, which cannot but be dear to the imagination of men who use the English tongue, to Tyr or Tuesco, the god of battle or conflict, the divine symbol of effort yet in process.

IV. While vegetation ran riot over the dripping earth (and that under a leaden sky, still unbroken by a streak of blue, or even traversed by a blood-red beamless orb) nature could not unfold her ulterior resources; but that vast exuberance of every kind of plant swiftly appropriated and solidified enormous volumes of the atmospheric moisture; and it is just possible that they also sucked in and assimilated opaque vapors or gases now not known so as to clear the way for the true arising of the sun on the morning of the fourth day, to be duly followed in the evening by the apparition of the moon and stars; the irradiations of the solar heat, as well as other obvious powers, having meanwhile been working towards the same magnificent result. Such was the splendid work of the paleontological Wednesday: now symbolized and known to us as the day of Woden, the Valorous Person of the multipersonal godhead of our Norse forefathers, corresponding with the Hercules of the Egyptian-Greek theosophy. Hercules, going through his twelve labors, was the sun, going through the signs of the Zodiac; so that our familiar name is a good one for this the day of the sun, moon, and stars.

V. The Thursday or fifth of this marvellous octave was made memorable by a new and strange display of creative power, more than worthy of our ancestral conception of Thor the Thunderer, or god of sheer might. It was then that animal life began to appear. The waters brought forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life or soul, and that up to the level of the great whales of those pre-adamic seas: while every winged fowl, also, was let fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven. The cetacea or water-mammals (quadruple-hearted, lungsed, red-blooded, viviparous, breasted creatures) were the highest manifestations of this amazing period; and they belong to the noblest class of all, even that in which the animal body of Man himself is included. It is a touching thing, in the Mosaic narrative, that God is not represented as having even "seen that it was good," when he had said, "Let there be light, and there was light;" nor yet on the consummation of the purely separative work of second causes, which occurred during the second day: but when the Earth burst into unrestrainable vegetation, during the progress of the Tuesday or third age, "God saw that it was good;" and likewise, when the Sun had flashed for the first time upon the forest-green and ocean-blue of the world, and the moon had reëchoed the Memnon-tone of his ray in the evening, and the stars had joined the chorus at night, again "God saw that it was good." But now living things sported in the waters and in the open firmament; happy creatures, akin to Man, and therefore nearer to the Creator himself: and so, it is written in the Scripture for us to read, "God blessed them."

VI. Next came the grand day of work. In the morning, the animal kingdom was carried to completion; the unapparent Maker seeing it to be good. But all those fish of the sea, and fowl of the air, and cattle upon the dry ground, and even all the creeping things that creep upon the earth, were unfinished till the coming of a greater than they. No order of things is complete till it have passed into union with a higher, any more than the seventh sound of an octave is complete till the eighth or first of a higher scale have struck. The atomic order is incomplete until embodied in the mineral, the mineral till taken up into the vegetable, the vegetable till lifted into the animal; and therefore all those goodly figures that rested in the coverts, and leaped upon the plains and mountain-sides of the fore-world, were but an uncrowned rabble (not even definable as the animal kingdom) until their nature should have passed into incorporation and unity with a nobler, that is to say, until the coming of their Lord. "So God created man in his own image: in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them: and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; And God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day." It is almost frivolous, after so sublime a quotation as this, to remark that the prime feature of the day, in so far as man and woman are concerned, is the divine command to be fruitful, or the extension of the law of animal propagation to man, notwithstanding that he is infinitely more than an animal (precisely as an animal is much more than a plant), having been made in the image of God. It is doubtless on that account that the day of our week, corresponding with this creative sixth, is dedicated to Frigga or Freya, the Scandinavian Venus, or goddess of love and generation. Be that as it may, certainly every Friday of the year, but Good Friday above all, must be dear to the Christian who is not overmuch afraid of the formalism of days and years, when he bethinks himself of the Crucifixion of his God manifest in Flesh, and of the mother who stood near the cross:—

*Stabat mater dolorosa
Juxta crucem lacrymosa,
Dum pendebat filius.*

VII. On the seventh day God ended his work which he had made: not that the almighty will ever cease from working, since the sustaining of the universe is a standing and perpetual miracle; but that this particular series of operations, namely, what geologists call the palæontology of the world, or the preparation of its surface for the appearing of Man in the image of God, was done. That which the penman of this wondrous scroll set himself to describe was finished. The house was thoroughly furnished unto every good and perfect work, the man and his mate had come, and it now behoved their life to begin. "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it; because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made." How daring a poetic license, yet what a touch of nature, to speak of our never-weary God resting, when the morning of the seventh terrestrial æon had arisen on the darling, for whom his Fatherhood had been creating and making during the six week-days of the world! What a sweet and altogether human, yet godlike thought, to bless the day as though it were a living thing—for no blessing was pronounced by the Word upon the dayspring from on high, nor on the dividing waters, nor on the seas and the earth with its leafy cover, nor yet on the sun and moon, but only upon the animal kingdom and its King! "And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it."

Such is the genesis of the present order of things in the world; told from the divine side of the phenomenon;—for it was the manner of patriarchal thought, not to look into nature for the godhead, but to behold both nature and man in God. Such was the Mosaic Cosmogony, or Moses' express idea of how this planet was got in readiness, and brought to the condition in which it now continues for a time. Next to its surpassing beauty is its philosophical accuracy, and next to that is its geological truth for our especial wonder; its sublimity being a thing apart, and yet arising out of all those particulars of its literary character. Yet it was not written as a poem to delight the world; it was not elaborated as a speculation on the ideal triad; and still less was it raised on the basis of observation among stratum and igneous rocks. On the one hand, it was not a logical deduction; on the other, not a geological, botanical, zoological induction of multitudinous instances. Above all, the day of the victorious observation of nature had not even dawned. Roger and Francis Bacon were yet afar off, the predestined sons of a new dispensation, which was not to begin till that of Moses and the prophets should be ended; Hutton and Werner were invisible in the distance, athwart a long and dreary Middle Age of Christian time; our geologists could not possibly have existed in any other age than this, for the growings of science are according to law, and the preliminary sciences were not ready for the success of their labors till the approach of the current century. Yet the narrative in Genesis, though making many exquisite distinctions, does not violate the ideas of causation, of classification, and of geological series, brought out by the very latest science, in a single instance. That narrative must, therefore, have been written down from the traditions of the unfallen, all-naming state of man or its reminiscences; or else from direct insight, that is, from immediate beholding of the idea and the law; and that is, in either case, from inspiration, mediate or else undiminished by the traditinary medium, Adamic or Mosaic.

It must already be evident, from some of the phrases used above, that we follow those new and doubly protestant divines who confess themselves compelled, by the great results of geology, to acknowledge the days of this miraculous writing to be the symbolical representatives of mighty ages; and it therefore appears to us that we are now in the morning of the seventh day, the Sabaoth of the Lord, the day of the life of man, but not determined or constituted a day (philosophically speaking) until the sounding of its octave, that is to say, till the arising of an eighth morning, the first of a second week and higher scale of things; wherefore we do and must look for a new heavens and a new earth. These things we hold, without the discomfort of a doubt, but likewise with perfect respect for those who cherish the old opinion. It is not necessary to go with us in this, in order to accompany us with cordiality in our further argument. It is only desirable to admit that it is a questionable point, which faith and science may settle betwixt them some other day; and surely, when one considers the laboriousness and the rigor of geology, the thing deserves the compliment of an honest pause. Let the mere English reader of the Bible also remember that he is reading a translation from an antique, oriental tongue, into a modern, western, and quite unrelated language.

But aside from all this there still remains a fact of immense importance in favor of our view; and that fact consists in the difference between the spiritual and intellectual attitudes of the writer and intended first readers of Genesis, on one hand, and of us peeping literal quidnuncs, English and Scottish, in the last three centuries of Christianity after a thousand years of popish corruption. The difference between the psychological attitudes of Moses and the like of Liebig or Murchison, to speak the truth, is almost as great as if the former had stood on his feet like a man, with his eye heavenward, and the latter had learned to stand and run about on his hands, with vast agility and the advantage of finding out a thousand terrestrial secrets, counterbalanced by the costly damage of only remembering, if not forgetting, instead of ever anew beholding things celestial. The patriarchal and prophetic spirit not only saw everything in God, as has already been remarked, the pious modern soul (even Shakspeare himself) rather striving to see God in everything; but its vision, when philosophical, was all for things in the idea, not in the concrete instance, the very reverse being the protestant English turn of mind. They were imaginative and poetic; we are the lovers of matter-of-fact, and the conquerors of common nature. Their spirit of inquiry took the way towards philosophy; ours has cut itself a road into inductive science. They were born-idealists; we are sensationists born and bred, the seekers and the finders of whole treasures of natural fact. Above all, it was their way to be continually putting the idea into some suitable symbol; it is ours to consider everything as the symbol of some idea or law, and to be forever hunting it up. Their whole manner of speech was symbolical and round; ours is literal, and deals in strait lines. Noticing, then, their characteristic, and following the bent of our own, the very first question it becomes us to ask in the present instance is, What is the idea put by that true Seer into this symbol of these seven days, and what was a cosmical day to him! Thus interrogated, Science, the seeker of ideas and the discoverer of laws, answers with modest decision, One of our geological Epochs; adding with astonishment, In other particulars the Scripture is a marvel, for we have found it all out again in our own way!

In conclusion of this short discussion of a long question, it must not be forgotten that those to whom the book of Genesis was and is addressed (exceptions going for nothing in history) could not have understood, and cannot understand, a discourse on geology. A geogenetic era would have been, to the Jews a stumbling-block, to the Greeks foolishness; and, in brief, it would have been a senseless sound in all Hebrew and Christian ears, until these present days; nay, to the overwhelming majority even now, and for many a long age to come. The Bible was not written for us otherwise and ridiculously few exceptions, but for the whole world, bond and free; and even more especially for the poor and otherwise unlettered. And as for the knowing and critical favorites of science, in the mean time, we have endeavored (though only by a hint) to show them how easily their geology may be taken in, assimilated, and glorified by their faith; and, if the time ever come when sanitary amelioration, social reform, improved policy, ecclesiastical reformation, theology made free by obedience, secular and religious education, and whatsoever other good spirit is in the world, shall have not only brought out the life of God in the soul of every son of man upon the earth, but also made all men familiar with the rich results of science—why, then, the whole world shall easily comprehend how a genetic Day is only the Mosaic symbol for a geognostic Time.

Then it is simply impossible that a nobler or a homelier, (nay, or another!) symbolical expression for the idea intended could have been found or invented. The sevenness of the luminous or of the musical octave,* for example, is of another species; and, in fact, the only Seven in man's common world of sense, which has to do with time, is that of the division of the lunar month by two, as measured by the waxing and the waning of the moon, and then by two again, giving her quarters. This is the only symbol in the world for the idea; for a symbol must partake of the very nature of what is symbolized, as the etymology of the word plainly bears upon it yet. In truth, it is the characteristic of the greater Scripture symbols that they are the very symbols wanted, and the only symbols to be found. They are not arbitrary, not fanciful, not capricious; they are according to law. Hence the significance of the days of the succeeding weeks of the moon, and the sanctity of the seventh, to Moses and his people, and to all such as have drunk into their spirit, Jew or Gentile; and, what is far more astonishing, hence their sacredness in the eye of almost every Pagan mythology! No wonder, then, that we find so many indications that the Patriarchs, rich with the remainders of the lore of Paradise, ended and rested from the work which they had done during the six creating and working days of their week, and blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it—or set it weekly apart. But it was on Moses that the idea of this symbolical (if not literal) seventh, considered as a day of cessation from creating and making, seized with such divine force as eventually to move the greater part of the whole world to the thought. By him at length the blessed law of the Sabbath was formally announced, cut into stone, and published to the hosts of Israel at the foot of Mount Sinai; and thence it has already spread over Christendom, and all Moslem too; being sure to reach the uttermost parts of the earth in the long run. REMEMBER THE SABBATH-DAY, TO KEEP IT HOLY.

Jesus of Nazareth, that greater than Moses, did not come to destroy the law, but to fulfil it. He never abolished this patriarchal and Mosaic institution. On the contrary, the Church of Christ, though not founded on this rock, has been built, not in a little proportion, with stones fetched from no other quarry. It never appears that the early Jewish Christians (whether at Jerusalem, about the towns and country-sides of Judea, or in foreign parts) forgot the Sabbath-day of their countrymen, while they did not forsake the assembling of themselves together on the Sunday or first day of the succeeding week, as the day of their Lord and Master's arising. The example of fidelity to the old ways, of loyalty to Moses and the prophets, of the tenderest patriotism in unison with charities so wide as to overflow the earth, shown by Jesus himself, might almost make one sure that they did not. Certainly the tenor of Paul's epistle to the Hebrews, and indeed of all the Pauline writings, was against any such self-assertion and insolence, if not impiety, as so divisive a course would have thrust upon the angry eye of those who did not believe their report; — and assuredly they would not be the worse of a true and whole Day of Rest and Old-Testament reading, followed by ever so partial and broken a day of New-Testament exercises. At the same time, the apostle of the other nations of the world always sternly insisted on the Jewish tests not being forced upon them; and a noble piece of charity and wisdom it was. They were to remain free, not only of all other particulars of the Mosaic ceremonial, but also of the particular day appointed by that authoritative lawgiver as the Seventh; — and the particularity of the days elected, it must be evident, was the only thing that was purely ceremonial in the Fourth Commandment. It was therefore among those foreign converts, first called Christians at Antioch, that the consecration of the Christian, not Sabaoth or rest, but Sabbath-day arose. Like all the disciples, Jew as well as Gentile, they came together on their Lord's day (not having rested the day before, however, like their Hebrew brethren); but that very day was the Sunday of their heathen neighbors and respective countrymen, and patriotism gladly united with expediency in making it at once their Lord's day and their Sabbath. Wherever Christianity appeared and triumphed and grew strong, accordingly, there the Day of the Sun became transformed, yea, transfigured into the Christian Sabbath-day; and, if our Cambridge Hebraist and his divines be right in their computation, that the Sabbath of the patriarchal dispensation was on one and the same day with the wild Solar holiday of all pagan times (the latter having, in reality, descended and degenerated from the former) then the restoration of the heaven-descended resting-day of Paradise, of Enoch, and of Abraham, was as beautiful as it was natural and easy. On the other hand, if this speculation be but a chapel in the air, and if the authority of the Church is to be ignored altogether by Protestants, there is no matter; because opportunity and common expediency are surely argument enough for so ceremonial a change as the mere day of the week for the observance of the rest and holy convocation of the Jewish Sabbath. That primitive church, in fact, was shut up to the adoption of the Sunday — until it became established and supreme, when it was too late to make another alteration; and it was no irreverent nor undelightful thing to adopt it, inasmuch as the first day of the week was their own high-day at any rate; so that their compliance and civility were rewarded by the redoubled sanctity of their quiet festival. Perhaps the Patriarchal and Hebrew Sabbath needed this added charm to draw all the manifold nationalities, idiosyncrasies of race, and climatic temperaments of the vast and various heathen-world, to the love and obedience of it; and certainly the time-honored Sunday of our own forefathers is as good a Sabbath, just as it is as good a Seventh, as any other. Nor is it an easy thing to choose exclusively betwixt the two venerable names; for, while SABBATH is laden with the sweetest ideas of peace and repose and antiquity older than antiquity, SUNDAY is doubly glorious, inasmuch as it speaks of the arising of the Sun of Righteousness as well as of the Sun of common Light. Both these arisings were the beginnings of new divine epochs; both the openings of new creations; and they were both veiled, though effective, and hasting duly to be altogether revealed on the fourth days of Time. The latter was natural and symbolical; the former is spiritual and real; but the imagination marries and makes them one, and the new name of their union is Sunday; as dear to the conquering heart of England, as is its Sabbath-day to Scottish constancy and awe.

* An exposition of the part that Number Seven plays in Music has unfortunately to be suppressed for sheer want of space. The musical reader will be able to supply the want perhaps.

Thus, then, we stand before the patent and unavoidable, and really most curious fact, that at least all Christendom has for hundreds of years ended its work on the seventh day, and rested on the seventh day from its work, and blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it! Come it whence and how it may, that is the fact; and this were the proper place to inquire whether anything can be said concerning the rational ground, on which this institution of an ever-recurring day of rest has been erected, before going into the actual position of the institution, and state of the Sabbath-question, in our own age and country. If this question were to be answered in full, the reasonableness of the Biblical day of rest would be expounded as threefold. Its natural or scientific, its ideal or philosophical, its spiritual or religious reasonableness, in the strongest sense of that term, would be discussed in succession and together; but it would be ridiculous to try the reaping of so broad and thick (and also so white) a harvest within the time of a Quarterly reviewer. As to the last of these heads, indeed, it is better to keep away from it altogether, than not to express one's whole mind in a roomy and leisurely manner; the religious part of the subject having been sorely vexed, almost ever since the Reformation. The Roman Catholics find this element in the authority of the Church: The Grecians and the majority of Protestants, in the authority of Moses in the moral law; and a large minority of Protestants, in the authority of Christian expediency and experience:—not to divide divided Christendom too much at present. For ourselves we cannot but think that the Fourth Commandment as standing in the moral law of an inspired lawgiver like Moses, the lifelong practice of the Church, and that Church's experimental knowledge of the benefits of compliance with the Mosaic idea and of keeping up the old day, make a threefold cord, to gird the week withal, which shall never be easily broken; but we also profess it our opinion, that all the three strands are necessary to its integrity, and that on account of the change from Saturday to Sunday. Such, in brief, is pretty nearly our notion of the Christian-religious reasonableness of this service; and it is obvious that the natural-religious reason of its fitness, from the nature of the case, must spring out of the stem of philosophy and science, tree and bark, like a fruit:—else it is non-existent altogether. The ideal, philosophical, or truly rational ground of the necessity of every seventh day being given to waking rest, in addition to the nightly sleep of every whole day, has never been opened up and demonstrated; and our own demonstration is too little elaborated, and therefore too long, for insertion here. The topic is merely mentioned in this connexion, partly to stimulate this high kind of investigation by the hint of deep-lying treasures, and partly to sound a note of defiance against all should-be philosophical sneerers at our hebdomadal pause.

The natural or scientific argument (for argument it is, and nothing more) is greatly more accessible; and it has very often been drawn upon, though by no means exhausted at any of its streams. Like the argument of design, and all purely scientific arguments, it goes up from the facts to the conclusion of the case, not down from principles to details. Like those arguments it is cumulative and a thing of increasing probability, not direct and matter of demonstration. The greater the numerical and qualitative strength of the probability, the nearer to the nature of certainty; until the amount of probability becomes so large as to be tantamount to demonstration. The Copernican astronomy, even as it stands now, is raised on an immeasurable mountainous foundation of mere probability; not on logical demonstration, but only on so huge a sum of probability as is, what Kant denominates, an analogon of demonstration; and therefore we refuse to deal with a person who will not acknowledge it, as being an unreasonable fellow. Such precisely is the kind of service which science may one day be able to render to the cause of the weekly Sabbath, and that in full measure, heaped and running over; yet hitherto this great power has contributed only a few half-hewn and unplaced stones to the work. Unlike the religious and philosophical processes, this of science is a cumulative task, now fairly begun, necessarily slow, always to be going on; and every passing laborer may do his share of it, as he passes;—until some master-builder and his workmen take it all upon themselves, as in other departments. Revelation is like a coming of light; philosophical demonstration at least goes in a straight line; but the path of science, with its observations and inductions, is devious and very slow; and we have nothing better than a handful of uncut pebbles, fetched from no foreign brook, for our present offering.

I. The multifarious seven-someness that is so striking in the bodily life of man and in his immediate world, as has been shown above, should come in here as the van of the argument a posteriori; but it is needless to repeat the illustrations. Nor must too much weight be laid upon them. Taken altogether, and increased by as many more instances as science may know, they do no more than furnish a broad and reiterated hint, to the effect that the periodicity of seven is deeply natural to the movements of the human being. This pointed indication is only a preliminary business, though a thing that may well mean more than meets the eye; but it has no scientific (that is, intelligible) connection with the last or first day of the hebdomadal seven being spent in rest. All that science has yet done in this direction is probably summed up in the evidence of physiology and physicians, averring that the powers of the body need repose; that the bow of vitality must be unbent every now and then, if it is to keep its spring; that in these days of overextension during the six days the rest of the seventh has grown indispensable, in addition to the successive nights; and so forth. Now all this is undeniable, and the materialist will perhaps be the foremost to urge it home in his own way; but it is general, and cannot possibly condescend upon the proportion of time necessary or desirable for the kind of Sabbath it inculcates. When coupled with the Christian reason for the weekly rest, indeed, it is of much value; and it has been put before a parliamentary committee in that connexion. But when this general opinion of science, regarding the want of a daytime of rest now and then, is ingenuously viewed with the medium of the unflinching tendency to periodicity in the Constitution of man, the presumption is strong that such daytime should recur at regular intervals; and then that particular seven-ness in human affairs, which has just been animadverted on, puts in its claim for the hebdomadal period as being at least peculiarly human, if not the best for the purpose. At all events, the combination of these three scientific considerations must be held to constitute a powerful moving barrier against all would-be rational encroachments on our sacred institute, not easily resistible when aggressive and not to be broken down when honorably assailed.

II. It has already been suggested that, when anything has to be said by science concerning man, it is man in the genus, or rather kingdom, not in the individual, the city, the nation, or the race: a broad average must be struck of the ways of man in all times, climes, and other circumstances. This cannot be done to perfection by the limited survey of fallen, and still growing and therefore boy-like, humanity as it now is; but a nearer approximation must be always being aimed at in researches of this sort. It is accordingly impossible to tell with accuracy, by induction, how many of the twenty-four hours should be spent in the state of rest by the normal or ideal man; nor yet how many have been and are passed in rest by the average or actual men of history. We say Rest advisedly, for this period needs not be altogether spent in sleep or the completed trance of animal repose, any more than the waking period ever is passed in absolute wakefulness and erection of the whole being: neither any more, nor any less; and this observation is important in the sequel. But it has here to be observed that the all-pervading law of dualism, which has been explained already, at once insinuates the hint that twelve hours are for work and twelve for rest, say rather, twelve for activity and the same for repose, for, of course, many modes of activity are neither creating nor making. Action and reaction are equal, except when free-will disturbs the balance. It is only in man and by him, that the law of equilibrium is broken. He is the sole sad occasion of either scale ever kicking the beam. Now, that in the present age, with his over-late and over-early hours; his coffees, teas, tobaccos, hops, alcohols, and opiums; his riotous eating of flesh on one side, and living on husks on the other; his frivolities and his toils; his unresting competitions, of the field, the workshop, the market, the theatre, the college, the forum, the church, the state, and even the drawing-room; his ambitions and fears; his grandiose anxieties and lowlived cares: in one word, that now, with his legion of follies and sins, not unaccompanied by noble though exaggerated aims, man does not (or cannot) allow himself daily rest enough, is what nobody doubts; and it does not appear that the historical world was ever better, either here or anywhere else. Yet there is a natural indolence in him too, whereby he saves one part of himself to overstrain another; and the lazy trick preserves him from head-long ruin: the boxer does not use his brain, the student leaves his muscular system untaxed; and so things are kept as near the straight line as such an awkward squad can keep. Taking this variegated and extravagant creature all in all, however, considering eight hours as the average time he spends in sleep, and allowing him two for his meals and little unbent occasions, the poor fellow gets only ten hours of retributive quiet instead of twelve. In fact, fourteen hours of activity in the twenty-four is on all hands, in Parliament and out of it, counted a just average distribution of the daily life of man, at least in Great Britain and Ireland. It is true and sad, indeed, that multitudes do not and cannot secure more than eight of rest; but doubtless there are just as many who take their whole twelve, and unprofitable servants they are: and if not a few of us scarcely make out our six, there are not a few who deftly manage to suck up eighteen, not knowing what to do! But even human legislation, to say nothing of divine lawgiving, bethinks itself of nations, colonies, and planted continents of men and women; and the true average there is only ten hours of repose instead of twelve. Now the defect of two hours a day for six days of labor is exactly made up, to the comprehension of an infant-girl lisping her first Sunday-hymn, by the twelve of a weekly Sabbath day-time. It is, of course, understood that the whole twelve hours of the seventh night time are also sacred to rest; and this is the strong point of those Sabbatarians, who have been pleading with their countrymen, besieging corporations, and praying the legislature, for no canonical holiday, but for an undiminished rest and festival of the soul. In the meantime, however, it is but too clear, take it how one will, that in this overwakeful century, the stimulants and overaction have it all their own way; and hence—what do we see? Men not living half their days; men not reaching their legitimate fulness of development, in body or in being; men too fragmentary, too feverous, too one-sided, too busy and little-minded, excited but not strong, lively but not long-lived: and if men, then nations. Surely the sweet and solemn Sabbath-rest of yore were a true cordial, and the beginning of many subsidiary calmatives, for this chronic and outwearing fever of the world.

III. But is the Sabbath then, it will perhaps be retorted here, to be a day of sheer animal repose? Is it set apart for sluggish quiet? Must great Christendom imitate the frugality of the maid of all work, and spend her weekly holiday in sleep? By no means. In the first place, excessive as is the activity of some one or more parts of the nature of almost all men during the week, the whole nature of almost none is ever awake an hour on end, from the beginning to the close of life. We are sleepy and conservative, as well as wild and wasteful, though not wisely. What is wanted, then, in a physiologically conceived Sabbath is the going to sleep of the weekday propensities, sentiments, and faculties; and the awaking, rather, of such as are too latent from busy day to day: and hence a natural right of each individual to the choice of his Sabbath occupations and enjoyments, always within proper social or sacred limits. Yet are there two principal things, common to nearly the whole race: firstly, the poor body, in one part of its organism or another, is overworked; and secondly, it is with secular things and forms of thought that men are overbusied during the week. Thence the two plain indications of bodily rest, on one hand, and the conversation of the mind with the higher order of ideas within the reach of man's apprehension, on the other, as the natural avocations of the seventh day of the week. It is change of occupation that is true rest. For the laborious artisan, for example, what a restful alternation to be sweetly attired, to sit at home, to open the family-classic leisurely morning and evening, to sing the immortal songs of King David and the other inspired psalmists with all his neighbors in church or chapel, to send his aspirations to heaven winged by his brethren's prayers, to caress and teach his Sunday-dressed children, to pray down the blessed Spirit of God into his lowly home, and, this low life almost forgotten, to take the sleep of the beloved in an unwearied bed this one dear night of the week! The student, too, possessed by the one thought of his work day after day, chased by it through his fitful day-sleep, pursued by it all the night, never without its image before him or ready and eager to come forward in a trice, his brain and nerves thrilling all over with it, rules of health given to the winds, many natural movements of the heart bidden away, a rush into society of an evening, his one unwilling and rarely pleasing change, were surely a whole world the better of the pause, the altered circumstance, the sociality, the homeliness, the common joys, the blessed associations, the church thoughts and feelings, the pure air, the moony evening peace, the less turbid sleep, the swift low-voiced parenthesis, of his and all men's predestined Sabbath-day. Or could the great minister of state forget his greatness, and his burdens, and his dread responsibilities, and his cares almost too heavy for a man to endure and live, commending them heartily to God for a day, as remembering that the beneficent elevation to which he is raised above his fellows does not absolve him from the unescapable necessity, imposed on every man of woman born, of living two lives, an outer and an inner, a lower and a higher (or else a lower still) — it is never to be doubted but that the sight and companionship of wife and children, the soft extension of his allowable couch, the quiet, unattended meal, the high bible-reading, the serenity and depth of the public service, the canticle sung at home to the music of Handel, and the early hours of a Mosaic day of rest, might well be more than half the battle on the side of God and the Right; and England, with all her lands, would rise up and call him blessed.

Such is the sort of change or rest, not only prescribed by the commandment, and practised during at least two dispensations in the church, but deducible from the latest conceptions of physiological science; — not, indeed, that science would by this time have discovered the natural necessity of a seventh day of such rest, and drawn out its formula as a rule of life, but that the thing being almost as old as time, science comes into the world and sees that it is good, and can honestly plead for its conservation and extension. At the same time, we are disposed to go further than some of our Sabbatarian friends in behalf of the first element of the world-old Sabbath, namely, bodily rest, intending that of brain and nerve, as well as that of bone and muscle; and this is the element with which the state has to do, intent upon refreshed and healthy citizens against the day of need. The body has far less to do with the manifestation of humanity than the phrenologist supposes, but far more than anybody else suspects. It is mentioned with lyrical emphasis that, when Israel went forth of Egypt, "there was not one feeble person among their tribes."* The wild Sunday of the great Pagan nations of antiquity was no Sabbath, and they are gone; the Jews were always disobedient, idolatrous, and Sabbath-breaking, though singularly persistent too, being a living contradiction, and they are scattered; the gay and turbulent Sabbath of continental Christendom is liker the Pagan Sunday than the quiet feast of Christian people, and they are the prey of despotism, that many-headed vulture. In short and urgent fact, the nations want a genuine day of rest, else they perish; and we Britons need it more now than ever, being the advance-guard of humanity in Europe; and that almost alone now, needing all our self-possession and well-rested strength. The whole physiology of the country craves repose; and that man is no faithful keeper of the Sabbath-day, who expends it in an excess of even bible-studies, passionate communings in the closet, church-services and sermons, prayer-meetings, Sunday-school labors, domestic solitude and unsociality, and untimely vigils. Such a day was never drawn from the Old Testament, and nobody ever pretended to draw it from the New. To listen to the re-reading of the well-known law, to tell the oft-told tale of Egypt and the wilderness, were quieting and easy exercises, alike to priest and people, to parents and children. By all means, let the Sabbath be maintained as "a day of holy convocation," as it certainly was from the very commencement of the Mosaic era; but let it also be remembered and kept holy as a day of much passivity and real repose, for such was its other, and, indeed, its primary use from the beginning.

—But we must stop midway in this a posteriori or afterhand discussion of the claims of the Christian Sunday on the attention and observance of the world. The adverse reader must understand, however, as the friendly one knows full well, that this is not a hundredth part of what has to be said; and the purpose of this article will be abundantly subverted, if it drive the former to the more secret and legitimate study of so national and momentous a subject. Even the little that has been advanced on the present occasion, has been put forth in a peculiar style, of set purpose; the commoner strain of argument has been avoided, or only alluded to; and there has rather been presented the individual view of a particular mind, living much aloof from others, than anything like the generic plea of ever so catholic a party. It is the humble contribution of a private student to the common cause. Such as it is, it is a distant and unfinished approximation to the adequate expression of one mode of thought concerning this patriarchal, Mosaic, and right Christian institute of the Sabbath-day:—an institute thoroughly paganized and vilified in the territories of the Greek and Roman churches already, and grievously imperilled in our own land at last. Last century there arose amongst doubters and unbelievers, this century there has actually arisen among professing Christians and well-wishers, a spirit of indifference and hostility to our most patriotic and politic, as well as world-old and sanctioned day of rest. Excitement cannot stop, pleasure cannot be stayed, cupidity will not withhold from gain, public and popular tyranny must and will have unrested slaves; the senses grudge the soul a day. Yet this reverted and fateful current of apathy, frivolity, and dissipation has by no means been suffered to run unstemmed. True-hearted men of every class of our composite society have lifted up their voices, and put forth their hands. Bishops and divines, noblemen and gentlemen, clergymen and scholars, physicians and men of science, preachers and teachers, book-reading and book-writing artisans and peasants, even humble maids with workaday fingers round their pens, and thousands of dumb, but prayerful dwellers in palaces and in huts "where poor men lie," have come forward with their strong protest against the rapid and insidious changing of the old English and Scottish Sabbath into a Pagan Sunday, no better than the Roman Merry-Andrew's holiday of giddy France, or of wicked Austria and her cruel allies in belated Italy. Most prominent by parliamentary position, equal to any in the depth of the principle that quickened him, foremost in persistent constancy, and the favorite butt of popular as of polished scorn, stood and fell, in the thick of this unprosperous cause, the late Sir Andrew Agnew, the principled and steadfast member for Wigtonshire, during seven sessions of Parliament. Conceiving that his nature has been much misunderstood, and in order to come a little nearer the actual Sunday-question as it stands in the everyday world of London and Edinburgh, it may be an act of justice to inquire, in these pages, devoted by a North British Review to this urgent social and scientific, as well as religious, subject of Sunday in the nineteenth century, what manner of man the arch-sabbatarian of this century of Sabbath-loving Christianity really was. For a full-sized image of the man, the well-written and hearty biography by McCreie must be referred to by the more curious student;—a work already in its second edition, and too well known and approved for a regular review at this time of day.

The scion of a long-ascending line of baronets, constables, knights, untitled Scottish barons, and Norman soldiers of fortune in England and Ireland, a race remarkable for keeping to the purpose of their heart even in Scotland, the land of pertinacity, this obstinate and unflinching Sabbatarian was born at Kingsale in Ireland, just sixty years ago, the only child of a poor young father who died before the birth of this genuine Agnew. From the showing of his congenial biographer, one might well suppose that the old and aboriginal Agneaus must have been so-called (like Kirke's Lambs) on the principle of contraries. Yet combative, aggressive, and self-providing soldiers and constables as it behoved them to be (in order to suit the times, we fancy), they seem to have early displayed a religious turn of mind; and that quite compatible spirit could not fail to show itself indomitable, valiant, dogmatic, and ready alike for coercion or martyrdom, in such a race. Taken all in all, this ancient family of the Agnews seem to have approved themselves as soldierlike, loyal, steadfast, kindly, and prudent a house as any in the land; at once proud and homely, brave yet wary, pious, but by no means suffering their proper goods to be spoiled, more capable of deep conviction than of wide toleration, and much more tenacious than ready to render a reason.

On the other hand the De Courcys, those old Earls of Ulster, with the head of whom the first authentically recorded Agneau planted himself in Ireland (whence a descendant eventually crossed in the reign of David II. to Wigton, and acquired Lochnaw, formerly a royal castle), probably underwent the softening, light-hearted, sprightlier, and less earnest influences of the Green Isle. Be this as it may, it is curious to find these long-parted lineages coming together again near the close of last century, in the marriage of Lieutenant Agnew to the Honorable Martha de Courcy, eldest daughter of John, twenty-sixth Lord Kingsale, premier baron of Ireland; a loving, sensitive, and most excellent woman, who would assuredly have been frightened out of her wits among the old Scottish Agnews. Their son Andrew and his sweet mother resided chiefly at Kingsale, under the guardianship of the maternal grandfather, until the death of Sir Stair in 1809, when he was summoned to take possession at Lochnaw. Then he was handed over to Edinburgh, Oxford, Cheltenham, and glorious London, for a season. A young baronet, of an uncommonly high and delicate spirit, elegant, accomplished (for that he was—especially in heraldry), and as amiable as his mother, though as stanch as old Sir Stair, this must have been a perilous time for the future friend of the workman;—and, certes, that gay youth was actually getting ready to be the workman-like friend of all who toil, us of the horny hand, and us also of the knitted brow! Well-principled and, what is equally to the purpose, well-natured, he escaped the dangers of youth and fashion. Nay, the steadfast and self-preserving blood of the Agnews moved easily and at once in his heart to the music of ideas more remote and fascinating than those of prudence and honor. The accents of antique gospel-lore fell on his ear like no foreign tongue. Such glowing oracles as Gerard Noel, M'Crie the historian, and Chalmers, had only to speak, that so prepared a spirit might hear and understand the sign; and in an Agnew to understand was to obey, when the subject-matter of intelligence was the saving of one's soul alive. In short, Sir Andrew solidified with the advance of manhood into an Evangelical Protestant, with a natural preference for episcopacy and the Church of England, derived from habit and early associations, but sturdily Scottish and Presbyterian at the core; and, in fact, he eventually identified himself heart and hand with what is called the Free Church of Scotland.

In 1830 Sir Andrew was sent to Parliament by the county of Wigton, and after some reluctance he went with the Reform Bill. But another sort of task, and a deeper Reformation was getting in readiness to try his mettle. Parliament was besieged in 1831 with petitions about the Sabbath. The out-of-doors leaders of the movement eventually fixed on him as their parliamentary chief; and a stout and obstinate battle he fought of it, in the house and on the platform, before both open and exclusive meetings, in season and out of it, till he died in the cause. The man became possessed by the idea of our blessed Sabbath; and that to such a pitch of inspiration that, if the age had not been at once averse to repose and incredulous of good, or even (with such fearful odds against him) if he had been as logical, imperious, and eloquent as he was otherwise able and heroic, he must have won the day. Yet this gallant and unyielding soldier of the Law and the Testimony wanted no laurels. It was his rare distinction to be indifferent to popular applause and not afraid of popular obloquy. Here, said he, is the last new ballad just sung under my windows: send it down to the North. When the Zanies were mocking Copernicus on the public stage, he said the same:—Let them have their fun: the things I know give no pleasure to the people, and I do not know the things that give them pleasure. For more than twenty years Sir Andrew waged a thankless and unpromising and (sooth to say) a little successful warfare, never fearing the face of clay, nor covetous of admiration and sweet voices, but trusting his convictions, and true to his secret God. We question whether any public character of recent times has done his stroke of work from such a depth of conviction, so unsustained by adventitious circumstances, even Clarkson, and certainly Wilberforce, not excepted. In the last result, this is his proper glory—to have been capable of doing without commensurate success and without applause! Yet Sir Andrew had respect unto the recompense of reward: he would scarcely have been a true Agnew if he had not. But he neared the goal before he died. "It is dangerous," he said in that great hour, "to speak of what we have done." "The instrument is nothing: God is all in all." It is what they all say, the good men and true, in one dialect or in another:—Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us!

Such is a faint image of the great Scottish Sabbatarian. The cause is left with us who remain, now that he has joined the majority at last; but we want a chief. In the meanwhile, this were a proper time and place to review the past procedure of the case in the spirit of searching and inexorable criticism, to see if it were not defeated or deferred by the errors of its friends; and also to discuss the broader and more politic principles on which the standard should be advanced anew. But these practical questions must be deferred till another opportunity. The lawyers have decided that the People's Palace, as it is fondly called by the Proprietors, cannot be opened of a Sunday; and the recent ministerial and parliamentary changes render it unlikely that a special bill will be soon presented. After all, moreover, the true beginning of a National Reformation were the radical self-reform of the friendly. Above everything, let the professing Sabbatarian, whether Jew or Gentile, whether Popish or Protestant, Evangelical or Formularian, cease from mere opinion and denunciation, and begin to be a Sabbatarian in right earnest. That is to say, let him see that he really work like an honest man during the six days of the week; for no soft and sighing do-nothing, no minion of ease and pietistic self-enjoyment, no idle busybody whose soul has lost its original sense of the comeliness of industry, is obedient to the First Part of that most noble Fourth Commandment, or can even try to obey the Second. He must then make sure that, supposing him to have been faithful to the primeval pledge of honest labor, he really and truly rest on the Seventh Day, and all his household, nay, and all the world in so far as he is concerned. He must be no party to the overtasking of ministers and teachers, any more than to the mulcting of household or street servants of ever so small a part of their one day of rest, and freedom, and Christianlike self-disposal. In short, he must irremissibly determine that not only himself, but also every other man of woman born however humble (to the extent, that is, that he can help or withhold from hindering) shall actually be a gentleman of the grand old type of the Garden of Eden, at least for fifty-two days, or seven weeks and a half, of the Christian year. What an altered world it were, even in a secular point of view, if such a consummation could only be brought about! Then in very deed might the gentle poor man, a far nobler being than the poor gentleman of "the ignorant present time," look down without reserve into the welcoming eye of his loftiest brother man, were it a burdened prophet, a laurelled poet, a crowned discoverer, or a king sitting on his serviceable throne.

M'CULLOCH'S WRITINGS ON POLITICAL ECONOMY.*

THIS volume consists of treatises, essays, and biographical notices on men or matters connected with political economy; a few being original, but the majority revised and corrected reprints. The direct treatises embrace some of the most important questions with which political economy is concerned—money, exchange, the letting and occupation of land, interest and usury laws, with the celebrated paradox on Irish absenteeism. The essays at once historical and economical treat of the commerce of the ancient world and the middle ages; the rise, progress, and decline of the trade of Holland; the causes which created the Hanseatic League and subsequently destroyed its power; the origin of the compass, the progress of maritime law, and the colonial systems of the ancients. The notices are biographical sketches of Quesnay, Adam Smith, and Ricardo. A goodly variety of subjects, involving various knowledge and various accomplishments, and furnishing the means of considering the character of their author as a political economist.

* Treatises and Essays on Subjects connected with Economical Policy; with Biographical Sketches of Quesnay, Adam Smith, and Ricardo. By J. R. M'Culloch, Esq., Member of the Institute of France. Published by A. and C. Black, Edinburgh.

Natural qualities of mind may be stimulated by circumstances or improved by culture, but can never be supplied by art or effort. The sound common sense, the penetrating sagacity, and the wide sympathy, though rather perhaps of the understanding than of the feelings, which distinguished the great founder of political economy, were the gift of nature. Adam Smith's education at Oxford, his employment at Edinburgh as a lecturer on Rhetoric and the Belles Lettres, his engagement at Glasgow, however brief, as Professor of Logic, and his subsequent elevation to the chair of Moral Philosophy, which originated the theory of Moral Sentiments, gave him that close and extensive knowledge of history, of man, and of man's feelings and doings, without which he never could have produced the Wealth of Nations. That unerring sagacity which never failed him when he had sufficient data in the form of facts to deduce his conclusions—the power of analysis, at once keen and profound, which enabled him not merely to lay down the laws conducing to the wealth of nations, but to present his reader with the essential principles of the defence of nations, of public expenditure, and other subjects of government—the wisdom applied alike to the history of society and to the most trivial individual expenditure—would all have been comparatively useless but for his vast and varied learning, and the attention he bestowed upon pursuits which his age avowed to be, and this age without avowing considers to be—vulgar.

Of the many successors of Adam Smith, M'Culloch comes the nearest to him in his variety of knowledge and his various sympathies; for although Mill had as varied knowledge, and perhaps deeper learning, his rigid logic and dryness of mind disordered from a subject everything which did not mathematically belong to it. The sympathy of M'Culloch, however, is even more decidedly of the head than that of the great master, and might perhaps more properly be called interest. He has none of the pervading pleasantness which animates the style of Smith, and brings the minds of the philosopher and the pupil into fellowship; but M'Culloch's style is plain and forcible — the latter quality, notwithstanding his hammerlike blow, being somewhat too uniform. His knowledge of what others have advanced on political economy is very great, not only extending to modern economists, but to old and obscure writers. He is greater as an expounder than as an original inquirer. In fact, from some deficiency of inventive logic, conjoined with a want of (to speak phrenologically) the "organ of cautiousness," his own opinions are often questionable, if not heretical. Such we consider are his theories on Irish absenteeism, the impossibility of gluts, and on there being no such thing as unproductive expenditure in the economical sense. The same want of cautiousness which induces him to push originality into paradox also induces him to state a paradox in the broadest and extremest manner. It is said that Queen Elizabeth insisted on having no shadow in her portrait; in like manner, Mr. M'Culloch will allow of no hesitation or question about his views, either to himself or others. What he sees he sees with wonderful distinctness; but he cannot, or he will not, see much at once, and he is too apt to require everybody else not only to see as he sees, but not to see anything else, either more or less. The endless shades and neutral tints which are found in nature are overlooked in the presentations of our limner; everything there is not only distinct but "stark staring." Neither is he very tolerant of those who differ from him even on difficult or abstruse subjects. Indeed, it is perhaps his manner of urging paradoxes, as much as the actual paradoxes, that raised up so many opponents, and for some years brought discredit on political economy itself. Even when he cannot resist an argument, he is apt to deny its importance or extent, on his mere ipse dixit.

As an expounder or enforcer of established truth, Mr. M'Culloch is very eminent. His peculiarity of genius renders him less certain as an applier of economical science — as witness some of his late propositions for the management of our fiscal system. His leading pursuit, his varied knowledge, and in a certain sense his catholic range of mind, together with his literary acquirements, render him eminent as an economical historian; for he combines, and in a high degree, that special knowledge which is not always found in the historical inquirer, with the various reading in which the mere economist is very often deficient. Hence, we think that the summary reviews of commerce, from its origin with (so far as we know) the Phœnicians, till about the close of the last century, is not only the most attractive but really the best portion of this volume.

On the subject of the relations of the free press to the new French Empire, we put on record the first spirited answer that we have seen from any foreign power to the demand impudently made for a general literary proscription in Europe — all the more willingly as this rebuke comes from an inferior power in the immediate vicinity of France. In his zeal to prevent Europe from reading the passionate denunciation of M. Victor Hugo, "Napoléon le Petit," the new Emperor, has caused his minister to complain of the multiplication of copies "by the clandestine presses" of Berne, and to demand the suppression of these presses and the prosecution of the printers. The Department of Justice and Police of the canton reply with great spirit — that "according to the existing laws, neither a patent nor an authorization of the police is required to establish a printing-office in the canton of Berne; from which it follows that the expression, 'clandestine printing-office,' has no meaning in law. It must, besides, be mentioned," they add, as putting the case beyond the jurisdiction of the court, "that, according to the existing laws, the cantonal authorities cannot officially prosecute a publication offensive to a foreign government when sold or even printed in the canton." — Athenæum.

CURIOUS MARRIAGE LEASE. — An assault case came before the Birmingham magistrates last week, which, like the majority of matrimonial squabbles, would have been simply interesting in the eyes of those immediately concerned, but for a legal curiosity which was brought to light in the course of the hearing. A young fellow named William Charles Capas was charged with assaulting his wife. In giving her evidence, Mrs. Capas mentioned that her husband was not living with her, but was "leased" to a young woman named Hickson. This being a species of contract unknown to the magistrates, further inquiry into the matter was made, when it was elicited that a regular legal document had been drawn up, by which Capas and Hickson bound, or, as they termed it, "leased" themselves to each other for the term of their natural lives. The "lease" was produced in court and read. The girl Hickson was present at the time of the alleged assault. On being asked about the "lease," she admitted that she signed it, and stated that it was drawn up by Mr. Campbell, the lawyer, who told her at the time she signed it that if Capas' wife gave her any annoyance he would put in that paper as evidence. She, moreover, said that the paper was signed at his office, and that she believed Mr. Campbell charged 1*l.* 15*s.* for drawing it up. The magistrates fined Capas 2*s.* 6*d.* for the assault, and commented in very strong terms on the document which had that day been brought before them. — Stamford Mercury.

From the Gentleman's Magazine.

THE BARONESS D'OBERKIRCH AND CITIZEN MERCIER.

If it were possible that the vexed spirit of the above-named illustrious lady could be conscious that her very noble name could have been mingled with that of a common bourgeois her indignation would be most intense. Had she ever reflected that her keeping a diary would have made of her a member of the republic of letters, she would have died rather than have belonged to such a commonwealth. The baroness was one of a class whose numbers were great and whose influence was unbounded. Their sympathies were given only to aristocratic sufferers; royalty they adored; the democracy they despised; and the very fine ladies of the class in question would, generally speaking, have preferred a faux pas with a prince to contracting honest marriage with an inferior.

The Baroness D'Oberkirch is a type rather of the follies than of the vices of the class, for having made her a member of which she prettily offered her best compliments to Heaven. She was the daughter of a poor Alsatian baron, whose shield had more quarterings than it is worth while to remember. Early in life she married a noble gentleman, old enough to be her father, and her best years were consumed in performing the functions of lady-in-waiting at the court of the Duke of Wurtemberg at Montbeliard, in visiting the more attractive court at Versailles, and in chronicling what she saw, and registering what she thought.

The diary which she kept, and subsequently enlarged, has been recently submitted to the public. It introduces us to the court and capital of France during the closing years of the reign of Louis XVI. It is interesting, as showing us both how the court acted and how the capital thereon commented; how the lady profoundly admired all the former did, and as profoundly despised all the thought devoted thereto by the canaille, who had no claim to stand upon red-heeled shoes, or to sit down on a tabouret in the face of royalty.

Now while this illustrious lady was taking notes, which her grandson has printed, a citizen was similarly occupied; and, had the Countess been aware of the circumstance, the impertinence of the commoner would have been soundly rated by the lady-in-waiting. The notes of the bourgeois were committed to the press three quarters of a century ago; those of the "Baroness-Countess" have only just seen the light.* The evidence of two such opposite witnesses is worth comparing; but the book of the lady will be ten fathom deep in Lethe when men will be still addressing themselves with pleasure to the pages of Citizen Mercier.

Louis Sebastian Mercier was a Parisian, born in the year 1740. He had not yet attained his majority when he opened his literary career by poetical compositions in the style of Pope's "Heloise to Abelard." Upon poets, however, he soon looked as he subsequently did upon kings, and speedily addressed himself exclusively to works in prose. Racine and Boileau, according to him, had ruined the harmony of French verse, and he henceforward considered that if such harmony were to be found at all, it was in his own prose. He became Professor of Rhetoric in the college at Bordeaux, and was rather a prolific than a successful dramatic author. He threw the blame alike on the vitiated taste of actors and public, and, shaking the dust off his sandals against theatres and capital, he hastened to Rheims, with the intention of practising the law, in order to be better enabled to apply its rigors against the stage managers who had deprived him of his "free-admissions." In 1771 he printed his "L'An 2440, ou Rêve s'il en fut jamais," a rather clever piece of extravagance, which was imitated in England, half a century later, by the author of "The Mummy." In 1781 he published anonymously the first two volumes of his famous Tableau de Paris. He was disappointed that his labor was not deemed worthy of notice by the police authorities, and he retired, somewhat in disgust, to Switzerland, where he completed a work which has been far more highly esteemed abroad than in France, and which even there enjoyed a greater reputation in the provinces than in Paris. In it he showed himself a better sketcher of what lay before him than a discerner of what was beneath the surface; and he spoke of the impossibility of a revolution in France only a year before that revolution broke out. When the storm burst in fury he claimed the honors due to a magician who had provoked the tempest. He wrote vigorously on the popular side, but — and to his lasting honor be it spoken — he broke with the Jacobins, when he found that they hoped to walk to liberty through a pathway of blood. He voted in the Convention for saving the life of Louis XVI., and this and other offences against the sons of freedom, whose abiding-place was the Mountain, caused him to be arrested, and would have led to his execution but that his enemies were carried thither before him. At a later period he was a member of the Council of Five Hundred, and made himself remarkable by opposing the claims set up for Descartes for admission into the French Pantheon; and he also gained the approbation of all rightly-thinking men for taking the same adverse course against

* The Baroness d'Oberkirch's Memoirs. London, 1852. 3 vols. 8vo.

Voltaire, of whom he truly said that he (Voltaire) only attempted to overthrow superstition by undermining morality. His invectives were so bitter against philosophy and education that he acquired the surname of "the Ape of Jean Jacques!" He was a denouncer of the immoral system of lotteries until he was offered the lucrative place of "controller-general" of that gambling department. "All men," said he, by way of apology for his inconsistency, "all men are authorized to live at the expense of the enemy;" a maxim unsound in itself, and here altogether misapplied. Towards the end of the century he was appointed to the professorship of history in the central school of Paris, from the labors of which post he found relaxation in various literary works, among others in ridiculing Condillac and Locke, in laughing at Newton as a plagiarist, in denouncing science generally, and in maintaining that there was nothing new under the sun, and that all novel inventions were in truth but ancient discoveries. As a member of the Institute he put the assembly into a condition of profound somnolency by reading his ponderous paper on Cato of Utica, and he had a violent quarrel with the few who had remained awake, and who wished the angry author to put an end to his wearisome discourse. He liked the empire as little as he had loved royalty, and used to say in his pleasant way in the café wherein he reigned supreme, and where he was highly popular and ever welcome, that he should like to see how it would all end, and that he only desired to live from a motive of simple curiosity. He did live just long enough to witness the first Restoration of 1814, having then reached the age of 74 years.

Of all the works of this voluminous author we have now only to do with his famous "Tableau de Paris." In this, as in the Memoirs of the Baroness d'Oberkirch, we have a picture of what France was in the lifetime of many who are yet living—a picture so different from any that could represent present deeds, their actors, or the very stage on which they play out their little drama of intrigue and life, that, though to many it represents contemporary history, it reads like romance, the scene of which is in a far-off land, and the incidents too improbable to even require belief.

Wide apart as were the conditions, opposite as were the sympathies, and also the antipathies, of the baroness and the bourgeois, their respective testimony conduces to but one conclusion—that, when they wrote, the entire social state of France was rotten to the very core. The nobles were loyal only because they found their interests concerned in so being; the commons were rebellious of spirit, and careless of judgment to direct it.

Both were equally debased. All were partisans, none were patriots. The very priesthood was as corrupt in the mass as the multitude of the people generally, and God was dethroned in France long before the Goddess of Reason had been raised on the desecrated altars, by men not perhaps so much more wicked than their predecessors as more bold in their wickedness.

In the childhood of some yet living Paris paid to the king's purse one hundred million francs yearly in duties. The citizens grumbled, and when the murmur reached Versailles the powdered beaux were wont to say that "the frogs were croaking." It was alleged in return against those very beaux that they consumed more flour in hair powder than would feed many scores of the famished families of the capital. Into that capital the king never entered but a rise occurred in the price of provisions, and the fifty thousand barbers of the city fanned into flame the indignation of their customers while they shaved their beards and combed their perukes. Let what would occur, however, the court was ever gay. Madame d'Oberkirch speaks of the expectations of triumph held out by the Count d'Artois when he proceeded to the siege of Gibraltar. His failure was visited with a shower of witty epigrams. "Comment va le siège de Gibraltar? Assez bien il se lève," is one recorded by Mercier. Madame d'Oberkirch tells us of another made by the deceased count himself. A courtier was flattering him on the way he managed his batteries at the fatal rock—"My kitchen battery, particularly!" was the comment of the gastronomic prince, who at home had four servants to present him with one cup of chocolate, and to save whose ears, in common with those of the king and royal family, the church bells at Versailles never rang a peal during the residence of those great ones of the earth within the walls of the palace. But Eliza Bonaparte showed even greater sensitiveness than this. When in Italy she pulled down a church adjoining her palace, on the plea that the smell of the incense made her sick, and that the noise of the organ made her head ache.

The bourgeois of Versailles were probably less democratic than those of the capital, for tradesmen of repute vied with each other in purchasing the dishes that came untasted from the royal table. Commoner people bought as eagerly, but for superstitious purposes, the fat of the dead from the executioner, who was paid eighteen thousand francs yearly for performing his terrible duties. The executioner, in consequence, was himself something of an aristocrat. He was a potentate and was well paid. He kept less flaming fires on his hearth perhaps, and wore less fine linen, than the grave-diggers—

a class who found their fuel in coffins and who wore no shirts but such as they could steal out of aristocratic graves. It was a time when honesty consisted solely in being well-dressed. Clerks at forty pounds a year, says Mercier, walk abroad in velvet coats and lace frills — hence the proverb, "Gold-laced coat and belly of bran." As long as appearance was maintained, little else was cared for; but even the twenty thousand in the capital who professionally existed as "diners-out," might have taken exception to the custom of placing carved fruits and wooden joints upon otherwise scantily furnished tables. The wooden pears of Australia were not then known — they would have been the fashionable fruit at a Parisian dessert in the year 1780. There was another fashion of the day that was wittily inveighed against by the priests; that of ladies wearing on what was called their "necks," a cross held by the dove, typical of faith by the Holy Ghost. "Why suspend such symbols on your bosoms?" asked the ungallant churchmen, "do you not know that the cross is the sign of mortification, and the Holy Spirit that of virtuous thoughts?" The ladies smiled, and retained the insignia till all-powerful fashion motioned to a change. And then female coteries were absorbed in the merits of the respective shades of color implied by "dos de puce," or "ventre" of the same. Our ladies have more nicely retained the name of the animal in the catalogue of colors, without venturing to translate it; but their less susceptible sisters across the channel could, under the old monarchy, and even under the empire, unblushingly talk of their satins, using names for their colors which would have called up a blush even on the brow of the importurbable Dean Swift. If small delicacy prevailed, the luxury was astounding. A fermier general was served by twenty-four valets in livery, and never less than six "women" assisted at the toilet of "my lady." Two dozen cooks daily excited the palate of that self-denying priest the Cardinal de Rohan, while his eminence's very footmen looked doubly grand by appearing like "Tiddy Bob, with a watch in each fob." Gentlemen then dined in their swords, eat rapidly, and hastened from table when it suited them, without any formal leave-taking. This was felt more acutely by the cooks than by the ladies—in compliment to whom the cavaliers finally dropped their swords and assumed canes. The latter came in when the ladies wore such high-heeled shoes that without the support of a cane it was almost impossible to walk. The gentlemen, with "clouded heads" to their canes, tottered, or sauntered, along in company, while fans were furred and snuff-boxes carried, according to the instructions of masters, who thundered through Paris in gilded chariots, bespattering the philosophers, mathematicians, and linguists that plodded basely by them on foot. "La Robe dine, Finance soupe," is a saying that also illustrates a fashion of the day. Of fashion at court, Madame d'Oberkirch tells us that at presentations the king was obliged to kiss duchesses and the cousins of kings, but not less noble persons. Louis XVI. was timid in the presence of ladies. Marie-Antoinette was ever self-possessed, whatever might be the occasion. It was etiquette to kiss the edge of her robe. The following is highly characteristic of the stilted fashion of the times.

I had an adventure this evening that at first embarrassed me a little, but from which I had the good fortune to come off, with honor. I wore on my arm a very handsome bracelet that had been given me by the Countess du Nord (wife of the Grand Duke Paul of Russia, then travelling under the title of Count du Nord), and the value of which was greatly enhanced to me by having her portrait in its centre. The queen noticed it, and asked me to show it her. I immediately opened my fan, to present the bracelet on it to her majesty, according to etiquette. This is the only occasion on which a lady can open her fan before the queen. My fan, which was of ivory, and wrought like the most delicate lace, was not able to bear the weight of the bracelet, which sank through it to the ground. I was in a very awkward position. The queen's hand was held out, and I felt that every eye was on me; but I think that I got out of the dilemma very well — I stooped, which was very painful with my stiff petticoat, and, picking up the bracelet, immediately presented it to her majesty, saying, "Will the queen have the goodness to forget me, and think only of the grand duchess?" The queen smiled and bowed; and everybody admired my presence of mind.

When we read of such delicate homage as this paid to the divinity that hedged the queen, we can more fully sympathize with her in her fall when she, who had been so daintily worshipped, was unceasingly watched in her dungeon by the coarsest of men, and who was dragged to execution with no other sign than human love yet inclined to her than that afforded by the infant child of a poisoner, who, raised on her mother's shoulders to view the spectacle of a queen passing on her way to death, put her little fingers to her lips, and wafted a kiss to the meek pilgrim as she passed.

Madame d'Oberkirch, speaking of the Chevalier de Morney, notices his strong method of expression as one "which, except in the society of her husband, would be too broad for the ears of a modest woman" — a singular exception! But our fair diarist does not appear to be herself over particular. She is the warm apologist of the Duchess de Bourbon, the unworthy mother of the heroic Duc d'Enghien. She, however, tells the following, "with great hesitation," as a sign of the depravity of the times—it is certainly rather piquant.

The Duchess of — had one day received a visit from her lover, M. Archambault de Talleyrand Perigord, when, the husband unexpectedly returning, the gallant was obliged to make his escape by the window. Some persons seeing him descend, made him prisoner, thinking he was a robber; but, having explained who he was, he was allowed to go, without being brought before the injured husband. The story soon became generally known, and the king reproved the lovely duchess for her coquetry; "You intend to imitate your mother, I perceive, madame," said he, in a very severe tone. The tale at last reached the ears of the duke, who complained to the mother-in-law of the conduct of his wife; but she coolly said to him, "You make a great noise about a trifle; your father was much more polite!"

This lady was of the quality of Madame de Matignon, who gave twenty-four thousand livres to Baillard, on condition that he would send her every morning a new head-dress. The people were at this period suffering from famine and high prices. Selfishness and other vices survived the period, however;—witness Madame Tronchin, who, in the Revolution, was daily losing her relatives by the guillotine, but who sympathizingly remarked to a friend, that if it were not for her darling little cup of café à la crème, she really did not know how she should survive such misfortunes! Such was the fine lady who wore a "Cadogan" and looked like a man, while the gallants took to English great-coats, with buttons on them larger than crown-pieces, and on every button the portrait of a mistress.

A curious and revolting custom prevailed at this same period. During Passion Week all theatres were closed; but more infamous places remained open; the royal family cut vegetables curiously arranged to represent fish and other food, and court chaplains enjoyed on Holy Thursday the privilege of unlimited liberty of speech in presence of the king. It was on a Holy Thursday that a court chaplain ventured to say from the pulpit, in the royal hearing of Louis XIV., that "we are all mortal," and when the monarch, who could not bear the sight of the towers of the cathedral of St. Denis, sternly looked up at the preacher, the latter, trembling for his chance of a bishopric, amended his phrase and its doctrine by adding, "Yes, sire; almost all of us!" The custom to which I have alluded at the beginning of this paragraph is narrated by Mercier, and is substantially to this effect. On the night between Holy Thursday and Good Friday a relic of the true cross was exposed for public adoration in the "Sainte Chapelle." Epileptic beggars, under the name of possessed maniacs, flocked thither in crowds. They flung themselves before the relic in wild contortions; they grimaced, howled, swore, blasphemed, and struggled fiercely with the half-dozen men who seemed unable to restrain them. The better all this was acted the more money was showered on the actors. Mercier declares that all the imprecations that had ever been uttered against Christ and the Virgin could not amount to the mass of inexpressible infamy which he heard uttered by one particular blasphemer.

It was for me (he says) and for all the assembly, a novel and strange thing to hear a human being in a voice of thunder publicly cast defiance at the God of the very temple, insult His worship, provoke His wrath, and belch forth the most atrocious invectives—all of which were laid to the account, not of the energetic blasphemer, but of the Devil. The people present tremblingly made the sign of the cross, and prostrated themselves with their faces to the ground, muttering the while, "It is the Demon who speaks!" After eight men had with difficulty dragged him three times to the shrine which held the relic of the cross, his blasphemies became so outrageously filthy that he was cast out at the door of the church as one surrendered forever to the dominion of Satan, and unworthy of being cured by the miraculous cross. Imagine that a detachment of soldiers publicly mounted guard that night over this inconceivable farce—and that in an age like the present!

Such acts were not so much in advance of the age. Four years later the inquisitors of Seville publicly burned at the stake a girl charged with holding criminal intercourse with Satan. She was a very beautiful young creature, and, that her beauty might not excite too much sympathy for her fate, her nose was cut off previous to her being led to execution! Mercier relates this on the authority of an eye-witness. It occurred barely more than seventy years ago, and Dr. Cabill, of gloomy memory, may rejoice therefore to think that the executive hand of his Church can hardly yet be out of practice.

"An age like the present!" wrote Mercier, in the days only of our fathers. In that age it was deemed impossible to carry the shrines of St. Marcel and Genevieve at the same time through one street. Whenever the respective bearers ventured on such a feat they invariably beheld a miracle, exemplifying the attraction of cohesion. The two shrines were drawn to each other, in spite of all opposing human effort, and remained inseparable for the whole space of three days!

At this period Protestant marriages were accounted as concubinage by the law, while Jewish marriages were held legal. A Jew who purchased the estate of Pepuigny bought with it the undisputed right to nominate the curés and canons of the church. It is worth recording also, as midnight masses have just been reestablished in Paris, that they were suppressed in that capital three quarters of a century ago, in consequence of the irreligious scenes which occurred in the churches. Mercier pertinently remarks on the singularity of the fact that Roman Catholics who believed in the ever real presence of Christ in their temples, behaved before that presence like unclean heathens, while Protestants, who denied the presence, behaved with decorum. The great attraction for many years at many of these masses was the organ-playing of the great Daquin. His imitation of the song of the nightingale used to elicit a whirlwind of applause from the so-called worshippers.

This mixture of delight and devotion was after all but natural in the people. The cleverest abbés of the day composed not only musical masses but operas.

Yet the Church and the Stage were ever in antagonism in France. Mercier tells a pleasant story, which recounts how the famous actress Clairon wrote a plea in claim of funeral rites being allowed to the bodies of deceased stage-players. With some difficulty she found an avocat bold enough to present and read this plea to the "parliament." The latter august body struck the lawyer off the rolls. Mlle. Clairon, out of gratitude, instructed him in elocution, and he adopted the stage as his future profession. On his first appearance, however, he proved himself so indifferent an actor that he was summarily condemned, amid an avalanche of hisses. He so took the failure to heart that he died — and, being an actor in the eye of the church, was pronounced excommunicate and was buried like Ophelia, with "maimed rites."

Mercier tells us that there were not less than five thousand special masses daily celebrated in Paris at the charge of sevenpence-halfpenny each! The Irish priests in the capital, he says, were not too scrupulous to celebrate two in one day, thus obtaining a second sevenpence-halfpenny by what their French confrères considered rank impiety. Among the poorer brotherhood was chosen the "Porte-Dieu." Such was the rather startling popular name for the penniless priest hired to sit up o' nights, and carry the "holy sacrament" to the sick or dying. In rainy weather "la bon Dieu" was conveyed by the reverend porter in a hackney coach, on which occasions the coachman always drove with his hat reverently under his arm. When the "Porte-Dieu" entered an apartment the inmates hurriedly covered the looking-glasses, in order that the "holy sacrament" might not be multiplied therein. There was a superstitious idea that it was impious.

I have stated above that Protestant marriages were not valid when Madame d'Oberkirch and M. Mercier were engaged on their respective works — placed before the world at such wide intervals. That much-wished-for consummation was, however, supposed to be then "looming in the future!"

This day (says the lady) I heard a piece of news which gave me great pleasure. It was that the king had registered in the parliament an ordonnance by which all curés were enjoined to record the declarations of all persons who presented their children, without questioning them in any way. This was to prevent certain curés from trying to cast a doubt on the legitimacy of Protestant children. It did not recognize the validity of Protestant marriages, but it gave us hope for a better future.

But it is time to draw these rapid notices to a close. Those who will take the trouble to peruse the works which have suggested them will find their reward therein. The three volumes of Madame d'Oberkirch might indeed have been judiciously condensed into one. There is a superabundance in them of "what squires call potter and what men call prose," but there is much besides that is of interest. The writer is by far a more correct prophet of the future than Mercier. She saw that the society in which she gloried was falling into ruins. Mercier depicted its vices, but so little could he foresee the consequences of them, that he patriotically exulted that Paris was so secured by its police from such enormities as the Gordon riots, which had disgraced London, as to render revolution impossible. The opinions of the writers apart, their respective records are well worth reading. That of Mercier has been well-nigh forgotten, but its graphic power, its wit, and variety ill-deserved such oblivion. That of the baroness, prolix and ill-translated as it is, has also its certain value. Both are real mirrors of the times, and all that passed before their polished surface is represented thereon with a fidelity that sometimes terrifies as much as it amuses.

The following, from Mercier, may come under the first head; but it is far from being the worst case that might be cited. As an instance of the results of common hospital practice, it contrasts startlingly with what now occurs in the same locality.

The corpses daily vomited forth by the hospital of the Hôtel Dieu are carried to Clamart, a vast cemetery whose gulf is ever open. These bodies are uncoffined; they are simply sewed up in a winding sheet. They are hurriedly dragged from the beds, and more than one patient pronounced dead has awoke to life under the eager hand that was sewing him up in his shroud. Others have shrieked out that they were living, in the very cart that was conveying them to burial. The cart is drawn by twelve men; a dirty and bemired priest, a bell, and a crucifix — such is the sum of the honors paid to the poor. This gloomy cart starts every morning from the Hôtel Dieu at four o'clock, and journeys amid a silence as of night. The bell which precedes it awakes some who slept; but you must meet this cart on the highway to correctly appreciate the effect produced on the mind both by its sight and sound. In sick seasons it has been seen performing the same journey four times in the twenty-four hours. It can contain fifty bodies. The corpses of children are squeezed in between the legs of adults. The whole freight is tossed into a deep and open pit, quick-lime is liberally poured in, and the horror-stricken eye of the observer plunges into an abyss yet spacious enough to hold all the living inhabitants of the capital. There is holiday here on All Souls' day. The populace contemplate the spot wherein so many of them are destined to lie; and kneeling and praying only precede the universal drinking and debauchery.

Let us turn, by way of conclusion, from burials to weddings. In the account given by Madame d'Oberkirch of the marriage of the Prince de Nassau Saarbruck with Mlle. de Montbarrey we recognize not only what the fair authoress calls "a very grand affair," but an infinitely amusing one to boot. We spare our readers the execrable poetry, by "a drawing-room poet," which was read with great avidity during the bridal festivities. It is necessary, however, to allude to the effusion, as will be seen from what follows:—

These verses are very stupid, but I quote them because they amused us exceedingly when we considered that this husband, "possessor of your charms," and who "to love's enchanting bliss shall wake," was a child of twelve years of age, who wept from morning to night, frantic at being made an object of universal curiosity, flying from his wife, and even repulsing her with the rudeness of an ill-bred child, and having no desire to claim a title whose signification he did not understand. . . . During the ball, the bridegroom could on no account consent to dance with the bride. He was at length threatened with a whipping in case of further refusal, and promised a deluge of sugar-plums and all sorts of amusements if he complied. Whereupon he consented to lead her through a minuet. Though he showed so great an aversion to her who had a legal claim upon his attentions, he manifested a great sympathy for little Louisa de Dietrich, a child of his own age, and returned to sit beside her as soon as he could free himself from the ennuyeuse ceremony of attending on his bride. This was the husband whose "rapt embrace" awaited the young princess. My brother undertook to console him, and was showing him some prints in a large book. Amongst them there happened to be one which represented a marriage procession, which, as soon as the child saw, he shut the book, exclaiming, "Take it away, sir, take it away! What have I to do with that? it is shocking— and hold," continued he, pointing out a tall figure in the group, "there is one that is like Mademoiselle de Montbarrey."

These last extracts will serve to show the different staple of which are composed the respective works of the Baroness and the Bourgeois. That of the former will be read merely to amuse the passing hour, but in the sketches of Mercier there will always be found something worthy of the attention, not only of the general reader, but of the statesman, the moralist, and the philosopher.

J. DORAN.

A TAME BUTTERFLY.—One cold, bleak November morning, when the sky, the air, and all nature wore that sullen and desponding look so peculiar to our climate at this season, a lady, who for the first time had risen from a bed of sickness, went into an adjoining apartment, where she perceived a gay and beautiful butterfly in the window. Astonished at finding this creature of flowers and sunshine in so uncongenial a situation, she watched its movements and operations. As the sun came out for a bright, brief space, it fluttered joyously about the window, and imparted to the sick-room an air of cheerfulness and hope. Towards evening, however, the tiny creature drooped its wings; the lady then placed it in a glass tumbler on the mantel-piece. During the night, hard frost came on, and the room was in consequence very cold. In the morning, the butterfly lay in the bottom of the tumbler apparently dead. The invalid, grieved that her gentle companion of the previous day should so soon perish, made some effort to restore its fragile existence. She put it on her own warm hand, and breathing upon it, perceived it give signs of returning animation; she then once more placed it in its glass-house on the rug before the fire. Soon the elegant little insect spread out its many-colored wings, and flew to the window, where the sun was shining brightly. By and by, the sun retired, and the window-panes getting cold, the creature sank down on the carpet again, apparently lifeless. The same means were used to restore animation, and with the same success. This alternation of life and death went on for many days, till at last the grateful little thing became quite tame, and seemed to be acquainted with its benefactress. When she went to the window, and held out her finger, it would, of its own accord, hop upon it; sometimes it would settle for an hour at a time upon her hand or neck, when she was reading or writing. Its food consisted of honey; a drop of which the lady would put upon her hand, when the butterfly would uncurl its sucker, and gradually sip it up; then it usually sipped up a drop of water in the same way. The feeding took place only once in three or four days. In this manner its existence was prolonged through the whole winter, and part of the following spring. As it approached the end of its career, its wings became quite transparent, and its spirits apparently dejected. It would rest quietly in its "crystal palace" even when the sun was wooing it to come out, and at last, one morning in April, it was found dead—quite dead.—Chambers' Journal.

From Household Words.

THE GAUGER'S POCKET.

POOR old Tristram Pentire! How he comes up before me as I pronounce his name! That light, active, half-stooping form; bent as though he had a brace of legs upon his shoulders still; those thin, gray, rusty locks that fell upon a forehead seamed with the wrinkles of threescore years and five; the cunning glance that questioned in his eye, and that nose carried always at half-cock, with a red blaze along its ridge, scorched by the departing footstep of the fierce fiend Alcohol, when he fled before the reinforcements of the Coast Guard.

He was the last of the smugglers; and when I took possession of my glebe, I hired him as my servant of all work, or rather no work, about the house, and there he rollicked away the last few years of his careless existence, in all the pomp and idleness of "The parson's man." He had taken a bold part in every landing on the coast, man and boy, full forty years; throughout which time, all kinds of men had largely trusted him with their brandy and their lives, and true and faithful had he been to them as sheath to steel.

Gradually he grew attached to me, and I could not but take an interest in him. I endeavored to work some softening change in him, and to awaken a certain sense of the errors of his former life. Sometimes, as a sort of condescension on his part, he brought himself to concede and to acknowledge in his own quaint rambling way:—

"Well, sir, I do think when I come to look back, and to consider what lives we used to live—drunk all night, and idle abed all day, cursing, swearing, fighting, gambling, lying, and always prepared for to shet (shoot) the gauger—I do really believe, sir, we surely was in sin!"

But, whatever contrite admissions to this extent were extorted from old Tristram by misty glimpses of a moral sense and by his desire to gratify his master, there were two points on which he was inexorably firm. The one was, that it was a very guilty practice in the authorities to demand taxes for what he called run goods; and the other settled dogma of his creed was, that it never could be a sin to make away with an exciseman. Battles between Tristram and myself on these themes were frequent and fierce; but I am bound to confess that he always managed, somehow or other, to remain master of the field. Indeed, what Chancellor of the Exchequer could be prepared to encounter the triumphant demand with which Tristram smashed to atoms my suggestions of morality, political economy, and finance! He would listen with apparent patience to all my solemn and secular pleas for the revenue, and then down he came upon me with the unanswerable argument—

"But why should the king tax good liquor! If they must have taxes, why can't they tax something else?"

My efforts, moreover, to soften and remove his doctrinal prejudice as to the unimportance, in a moral point of view, of putting the officers of his Majesty's revenue to death, were equally unavailing. Indeed, to my infinite chagrin, I found that I had lowered myself exceedingly in his estimation by what he called standing up for the exciseman.

"There had been divers parsons," he assured me, "in his time in the parish, and very larned clargy they were; and some very strict; and some would preach one doctrine, and some another; and there was one that had very mean notions about running goods, and said 't was a wrong thing to do; but even he, and the rest, never took no part with the gauger—never! And besides," said old Trim, with another demolishing appeal, "Was n't the exciseman always ready to put us to death when he could?"

With such a theory it was not very astonishing—although it startled me at the time—that I was once suddenly assailed, in a pause of his spade, with the puzzling inquiry,— "Can you tell me the reason, sir, that no grass will ever grow upon the grave of a man that's hanged unjustly?"

"No, indeed, Tristram, I never heard of the fact before."

"Well, I thought every man know'd that from the Scripture; why, you can see it, sir, every Sabbath day. That grave on the right hand of the path as you go down to the porch-door, that heap of arth with no growth, not one blade of grass on it—that's Will Pooly's grave that was hanged unjustly."

"Indeed! but how came such a shocking deed to be done?"

"Why, you see, sir, they got poor Will down to Bodmin, all among strangers, and there was bribery, and false swearing; and an unjust judge came down—and the jury, all bad rascals, tin-and-copper-men—and so they all agreed together, and they hanged poor Will. But his friends begged the body and brought the corpse home here to his own parish; and they turfed the grave, and they sowed the grass twenty times over, but 't was all no use; nothing would ever grow—he was hanged unjustly."

"Well, but Tristram, you have not told me all this while what this man Pooly was accused of—what had he done?"

"Done, sir! Done! Nothing whatsoever but killed the exciseman!"

The glee, the chuckle, the cunning glance were inimitably characteristic of the hardened old smuggler; and then down went the spade with a plunge of defiance, and, as I turned away, a snatch of his favorite song came carolling after me like the ballad of a victory.

On, through the ground-sea, shove !
Light on the larboard bow !
There 's a nine-knot breeze above,
And a sucking tide below !

Hush ! for the beacon fails ;
The skulking gauger 's by.
Down with your studding sails,
Let jib and fore-sail fly !

Hurrah, for the light, once more !
Point her for Shark's Nose Head,
Our friends can keep the shore,
Or the skulking gauger 's dead.

On, through the ground-sea, shove !
Light on the larboard bow !
There 's a nine-knot breeze above,
And a sucking tide below !

Among the "King's men," whose achievements haunted the old man's memory with a sense of mingled terror and dislike, a certain Parminter and his dog occupied a principal place. This officer appeared to have been a kind of Frank Kennedy in his way, and to have chosen for his watchword the old Irish signal "Dare !"

"Sir," said old Tristram one day, with a burst of indignant wrath, "Sir, that villain Parminter and his dog murdered with their shetting-irons no less than seven of our people at divers times, and they peacefully at work in their calling all the while !"

I found on further inquiry that this man Parminter was a bold and determined officer, whom no threats could deter and no money bribe. He always went armed to the teeth, and was followed by a large, fierce, and dauntless dog, which he had thought fit to call Satan. This animal he had trained to carry in his mouth a carbine or a loaded club, which, at a signal from his master, Satan brought to the rescue. "Ay, they was bold audacious rascals—that Parminter and his dog—but he went rather too far one day, as I suppose," was old Tristram's chuckling remark as he leaned upon his spade, and I stood by.

"Did he, Trim ; in what way ?"

"Why, sir, the case was this. Our people had a landing down at Mellnach, in Johnnie Mathoy's hole ; and Parminter and his dog found it out. So they got into the cave at ebb tide, and laid in wait, and when the first boat-load came ashore, just as the keel took the ground, down storms Parminter, shouting for Satan to follow. But the dog knew better, and held back, they said, for the first time in all his life ; so in leaps Parminter smack into the boat, alone, with his cutlass drawn ; but" (with a kind of inward ecstasy), "he didn't do much harm to the boat's crew—"

"Because," as I interposed, "they took him off to their ship."

"No, not they ; not a bit of it. Their blood was up, poor fellows, so they just pulled Parminter down in the boat, and chopped off his head on the gunwale !"

The exclamation of horror with which I received this recital, elicited no kind of sympathy from Tristram. He went on quietly with his work, merely moralizing thus—"Ay, better Parminter and his dog had gone now and then to the gauger's pocket at Tidnacombe Cross, and held their peace, better far."

The term, "The Gauger's Pocket," in old Tristram's phraseology, had no kind of reference to any place of deposit in the apparel of the exciseman ; but to a certain large gray rock, which stands upon a neighboring moorland, not far from the cliffs which overhang the sea. It bears to this day, among the parish people, the name of the Witan-Stone, that is to say, in the language of our forefathers, the Rock of Wisdom ; because it was one of the places of usual assemblage for the Gray Eldermen of British or of Saxon times—a sort of speaker's chair or woolsock in the local Parliaments. It was, moreover, there is no doubt, one of the natural altars of the old religion ; and, as such, it is greeted with a fond and legendary reverence still. Hither Trim guided me one day to show, as he told me, "the great rock set up by the giants, so they said ; long, long ago, before there was any bad laws such as they make now." It was indeed a wild, strange, striking scene ; and one to lift and fill, and, moreover, to subdue, the thoughtful mind. Around me was the wild, half-cultured moor ; yonder, within reach of sight and ear, that boundless, breathing sea, with that shout of the waters, which came up ever and anon to recall the strong metre of the Greek, and there, before me, stood the tall, vast, solemn stone, gray and awful with the myriad memoirs of ancient ages, when the white fathers bowed around the rocks and worshipped.

"And now, sir," clashed in a shrill, sharp voice, "let me show you the wonderfulest thing in all the place, and that is, the Gauger's Pocket."

Accordingly, I followed my guide, for it seems, "I had a dream which was not all a dream," as he led the way to the back of the Witan-Stone ; and there, grown over with moss and lichen, with a movable slice of rock to conceal its mouth, old Tristram pointed out, triumphantly, a dry and secret crevice about an arm's length deep. "There sir," said he, with a joyous twinkle in his eye,

"there have I dropped a little bag of gold, many and many a time, when our people wanted to have the shore quiet, and to keep the exciseman out of the way of trouble; and there he would go, if so be he was a reasonable officer; and the byword used to be, when 't was all right, one of us would go and meet him, and then say, 'Sir, your pocket is unbuttoned;' and he would smile and answer, 'Ay! ay! but never mind, my man, my money's safe enough;' and thereby we knew that he was a just man, and satisfied, and that the boats could take the roller in peace; and that was the very way, sir, it came to pass that this crack in the stone was called for evermore 'The Gauger's Pocket.'"

From Chambers' Journal.

A NIGHT IN CUNNEMARA.

THE evening of an autumn day in 1829 brought two young men, who had been engaged for several hours in shooting over the wilds of Cunnemara, to the vicinity of the lodgings of a priest, with whom one of them was on terms of intimate friendship. The day had been one of cheerless, unintermitting rain; the two sportsmen were drenched with wet; and one of them, a stranger in the district, and not accustomed to its rude exercises, was spent with fatigue. It was after a slow and toilsome march through a bog of various degrees of solidity, and being more than once soused almost to the shoulders in the black moreen or bog-water which lay at the bottoms of the hollows cut in it by the winter floods, that the young men reached the vicinity of the priest's mansion. A shot fired at this moment by Blake, the individual of the party to whom Cunnemara was native ground, caused the almost instant appearance, at the door of his hovel, of the good-humored face of Father Dennis, who no sooner distinguished his friend, than he issued forth, and gave him and his companion a hearty welcome.

"Father Dennis, Captain Clinton, of the —th. Clinton, Father Dennis Connelly," was the brief introduction by which Blake put the priest and his friend upon a footing of friendship. There was no need to inquire into the condition of the two sportsmen, and as little need to hint to the priest the line of conduct he ought to pursue towards them.

"Cold, wet, hungry and fatigued, I see you are," said he, taking a pinch of snuff, and snapping his fingers after it. But there's none of you more so than I am myself. Up and out I've been from peep of day this morning; not a morsel inside my lips since the bit of breakfast I swallowed at six o'clock; and never sat down a minute, no, nor stood still either, only just while I stepped in where I got calls, to buckle a pair in one place, and christen a couple of pausteens in another."

"What was it kept you so busy, Dennis!" said Blake.

"Pattthern day,* don't you know! And didn't you hear how the Heffernans and Conrys were killing aich other last year! Oh, then, if I hadn't enough to do with them this day, my name's not Dennis Connelly. God knows a heart-scald they are to any one that wants to keep paice and quiet among them. If you knew the pain I have in my shouldher this minute with leathering the scoundrels, and the tired legs I have pelting afther them; for as fast as I'd disperse them in one place, they'd gather in another." And Father Dennis, with grimaces expressive of extreme suffering, rubbed the ailing shoulder with his left hand, and the ailing legs with both.

"What! do you beat your parishioners!" cried the Englishman, in utter astonishment.

"To be sure I do—bate them while baiting's good for them, and that's long enough," replied the priest. "The poor ignorant cratures! sure, they're like wild Indians! It's the only way to get any good of them."

"And are none of them ever tempted to make a return in kind!"

"Sthrike me! is it! Ah, captain, you English have quare notions in your heads—no, but down on their knees to beg my pardon, and wouldn't think they'd have luck or grace if they didn't get it. When one dashes into the thick of a fight, then, to be sure, one may get an odd blow, but not on purpose; they'd think the hand would rot off them if they riz it on their clargy."

"In such a very wild district, all this may probably be necessary," said Clinton, making a polite effort.

"It is, my dear sir, quite necessary," cried the priest, taking Clinton's remark in perfect good faith; "only look at this delicate little switch I took from a fellow to-day. There can't be less than a pound's weight of lead in the ferral. A crack of that now would smash an ox's skull, let alone a Christian's; and the blackguard had it up, just ready to let fly at one that was n't thinking of him at all—(you know him, Isidore—Davy Gavan, from Rusvela, a quiet, poor man as ever lived.) I got a houl of the stick, but the fellow held it tight; he dar n't sthrike me, and he did n't like to let it go; so there we were at it, pully hauly, till I twisted it out of his grip, in spite of him. I had a great mind to give him a good clip then, but I did n't like to do it with such a walloper, so I makes a kick at him; and what do you think!—the impudent scoundrel caught my foot in his hand. I felt I could not help going; but just as I was tumbling back, I tilts up the other foot with a spang, hit him just here under the butt of the ear, and knocked him over and over—you never seen a fellow take such a roll. Between ourselves," added the stalwart champion of good order, with a meaning compression of the lips, and a corresponding wink and nod, "he did n't get up quite so quick as I did."

The young men were by this time seated in the priest's parlor, where no time was lost in purveying for them, and for the priest himself, the solacements demanded by their worn-out condition. An hour must be supposed to have passed since their meal was concluded. They are seated round a blazing turf fire, and the corner of a large square table is drawn in between them, the more conveniently to bring within general reach the materials for compounding the smoking and smoky beverage that stands before each. The general appearance of the apartment is rather more decent than might be expected in a district so uncivilized. It is ceiled and whitewashed, and the earthen floor is covered with a "cautiugh," or carpet of rush matting. It moreover boasts a couple of little sashed windows, a painted wooden chimney-piece (no grate, however), and for ornament, a whole series of highly-colored prints of saints, angels and devils, varied by a coffee-colored whole-length of Napoleon Bonaparte, a view of the Bay of Naples, and a political caricature or two of some fifty years' standing. The priest's bed, it is true, as it stands against the wall, is rather a conspicuous object. But with its gay chintz curtains (quite new) and its patchwork quilt, it cannot well be deemed an eyesore, especially considering that the room is not otherwise very rich in furniture. Indeed, unless a great chest and a trunk or two may be counted as such, the inventory must be limited to a few chairs and an immense wooden press painted red (mahogany color intended), to which the woman of the house is paying constant visits, the upper compartments being her pantry, and the lower her repository for house linen, &c.

The trio at the fire sat for a time silent and unoccupied; the countenances and attitudes of each richly, though in different styles, expressive of the quiet, indolent satisfaction of rest after fatigue. At length, arousing himself, Father Dennis exclaimed:—"Come, another tumbler, gentlemen! A wet day in the hills calls for two, at any rate, to the one you'd take at any other time."

"Ay, that's the rule, Clinton; so fill, fill, my boy," cried Blake. "Do you know, I think you are getting reconciled to the poteen!"

"You are not far from the truth," returned Clinton, smiling. "I am truly grateful to the put—put—heen, or what do you call it! and with good reason, too, for I never swallowed a potion half so grateful as that tumbler you forced down my throat by way of a preparative to drying myself. Henceforward I shall ever account it as the very best of cordials, where cordials are needed."

"There's many a true word said in jest, captain," said Father Dennis, nodding, as he filled his own glass brimful, and with an air of practised dexterity, turned it into his tumbler.

"You fancy I'm jesting, Mr. Connelly, do you! Upon my honor you are wrong if you do. I literally think what I say of it."

"Then, upon my honor, and my conscience too, you're not far out in that anyway. And it's in such a place as this it is needed. Oh, the hardships I have to go through here in the winter saison, they're beyond belief! One can't even have a horse to help one out, for there's no riding. Look at my two elegant pair of boots that I brought with me, hanging up there against the wall, till they'd puzzle the rats themselves to make any use of them. And the foot work through the wet bogs is the sore work, though nothing at all to the boat work! Think, now, what it is to be out tossing on this contrary coast in all weathers—often with every tack about you as dripping wet as if you were keel-hauled, and knowing all the time that you have a great deal better chance of the bottom than of any other end to your voyage. How would you like that, captain?"

"Not at all, I confess. But I hardly think the perils of the sea can be much greater than the perils of the land in this quarter."

"Ah, the mooreen!" cried the priest. "Well, captain, I agree with you. As bad to be choked that way as with salt water."

"Ay, Dennis; but 'tis n't either of them you or I'd choose, if we were to be choked at all," said Blake, laughing; "water like this would be more to our taste. Come, will you tell the story of the cock and the tumbler to Clinton! Do, now—that's a good fellow."

"Oh, that ould story!—'t would be no pleasure to him."

"I beg your pardon, it would be a very great pleasure to me to hear a story of yours, if you will so far favor me," said the young officer politely.

"You're very kind to say so, captain, I'm sure. And if it was anything worth your hearing—"

Here both the young men broke in upon his disqualifying speech, with assurances that at length seemed to conquer his modesty. "Oh, if you ra'ally have a fancy for it, gentlemen, 'tis no throuble to me to tell it, to be sure. I don't know, Captain Clinton, whether you have any idea of the sort of life a poor man lades, that's coadjuthor (what you'd call curate, you know), to a snug, dacent, worthy, gentale parish priest that loves his aiso. I'll tell you then. It's just the life of a pack-horse — no better. A sort of hand-ball he is, knocked about here and there, and up and down, and to and fro, wherever his shuparior places to think he's wanted. Then, afther slaving this way all day, routed out of his bed, maybe, half-a-dozen times in the coorse of the one night, to trot to the far ends of the parish at the bidding of every ould collioch that takes it into her crazy head she's booked for the other world, and she as tough all the time, maybe, as an old raven."

"I beg pardon for the interruption, Mr. Connelly," said Clinton, laughing heartily at the list of grievances, or rather at the manner in which they were set forth, tones and grimaces, inclusive; "but you must make allowance for my utter ignorance. Tell me, how is this very hard case different from yours at present, as a parish priest? You are liable to be called about in the same way, if I don't misunderstand you."

"True for you, my dear sir. I have most of the hardships as it is, sure enough. But then there's two little circumstances in the case that make a matarial difference. The poor coadjuthor, you see, does all the work, and gets only half, maybe only the third of the dues. Then, again, afther one of them unlucky calls, when he jogs back tired and disappointed, all the comfort there's for him is black looks, if it is n't hard words itself, from one that would n't wag a finger to save him a journey to Jericho and back again."

"All very true," cried Blake. "But where has the story slipped to, Dennis?"

"Patience, Isidore, I'm coming to it, all in good time, if you'll only let me. Well, you are to know, Captain Clinton, there was once upon a time a poor priest — as it might be myself — and he, afther a hard day's work, was just going to sit down to his little supper, of a Saturday night, of all nights in the week, when there comes a tantararara to his door, enough to waken up the dead; and before he had time to bless himself, he was packed off to ride seven miles up the mountain, through the rain and sleet and wind — (pitch dark it was too, into the bargain) — to anoint a crature that was n't expected.* Well, captain, I need n't tell you what a time he and his poor baste had of it, getting through the bogs such a night; but he did get through them at last. The man of the house was in bed, but he got up, and brought out a little cruiskeen of poteen; and another man that had come across from Joyce Country, he got up too, and they all three settled themselves down by the fire, vory cosey and comfortable. The priest had just mixed his tumbler, when he sees the cock that was roosting upon the rafters above, lifting up the wings of him, this way" (acting the motion), "getting ready for the crow; a sign, mark you, that twelve o'clock was coming. Now, a priest can't touch bit or sup, you know, from twelve o'clock on Saturday night, till twelve o'clock next day — that's till afther last mass. So when he sees the lad preparing, he ups with the tumbler" (still acting,) "and down clean he had it, before the screech came. 'There now,' says he, ir Irish, as he set it down with a whack, 'was n't that well done? I took it off between the clapping and the crowing.'"

The lungs of the young Englishman did "crow like chanticleer" at this narrative; nor was he behindhand in the clapping.

"Ah, but it's better far in the Irish," resumed Father Dennis. "Edir sgihan sehgub, you know, Isidore, between the wing and the beak. By far more expressive."

Another hearty fit of laughter signalized the conclusion of the story. But, Clinton having for some time given tokens of a disposition to sleep, his friend now proposed that they should bid their kind host good-night. Dennis, though willing to prolong the entertainment, was too polite to resist their wishes; and he accordingly rose, and led the way across the kitchen to an apartment, which was certainly no favorable contrast to the one they had just quitted. The earthen floor, in its undisguised ruggedness — the unhinged door merely resting against its door-frame — the partition wall wanting at least two feet of reaching the loft of hurdles that formed the sole ceiling overhead — and the small dismantled window, one pane alone, out of its four, in proper order for excluding air and admitting light, displayed no inconsiderable sum total of discomfort. Nor was there much to balance the account, except a tolerably clear fire on the hearth, and the clean and good articles of bedding that furnished forth a wooden-roofed bedstead, sociably destined for the accommodation of the pair of wearied sportsmen. Clinton's glance did not fail to take in all these details. But the idea of a bivouac being uppermost in his mind, he was able, with a good grace, to make light of the subject-matter of the lamentations with which the parting compliments of the hospitable priest were rather profusely seasoned.

Scarcely an hour had elapsed, and the two youths were not half that time asleep, when Blake was awakened by Father Dennis' house-keeper, with the information that a marriage party had arrived, afther having followed the priest all day, and that, if he and his friend would rise, they might see the whole fun from the top of the partition wall, without being themselves seen. "It's Tom Conry's widdy, sir," she said, "Mary Duane, and the bridegroom is a boy from Lettermullin, Patsheen Halloran by name—a big mullet-headed somnochawn, the very moral of the first husband, just as soft-looking, as fat, and as foolish. Och, if your honor seen the pair, you would laugh if there was a laugh in you!"

* Not expected to live.

Blake instantly rose, and roused his companion, who, though at first more disposed to lie still than to enjoy the finest fun in the world, was at last persuaded to get up. When both had dressed, they ascended by a ladder to the place which the housekeeper had pointed out as a place of observation for the survey of the next apartment, and there, sure enough, a very amusing scene met their eyes. The bridal party, easily distinguishable from the people of the house by their dripping garments, were (with one exception) clustered round the fire, which a half-dressed girl, evidently roused from her sleep for the occasion, had just replenished. This damsel was now squatted down before her handy-work, blowing it up with might and main by the alternate aid of her scanty red petticoat and her redder lips, and from time to time intermitting her occupation, to invite the approach of the straggler—a gentle dame—who, however, stoutly resisted all persuasives, whether verbal or manual, to move her from the spot near the door, where she had thought fit to establish herself. But the object that most immediately caught Clinton's observation, was a huge settle-bed near the fire, from which more than one head appeared, projecting like birds from the nest, to take observation of the company who had broken up their rest.

"Now I must be your Asmodeus, I suppose, Clinton," said Blake. "To begin, I must point out the bride to you."

"Needless, quite needless, my good friend," rejoined the other. "There is no mistaking that fair personification of bridal bashfulness, leaning against the wall there, aloof from the rest of the bevy."

"Truly, I believe you are right. The shrinking attitude, and the half-averted visage, and the hood of the blue cloak held so modestly close under the chin, for fear a glimpse at all could be had of her! 'tis capitally well got up altogether! There now is the beauty of practice to make perfect. Not one raw maiden in ten could top her part with the widow."

"Well, as you would say, joy be to her! But you are forgetting your office, Signor Diable; which is the happy man?"

"Why, to say truth, he is a stranger to me. But from Nelly's account, I opine, by the great red head, and red gills, and clumsy build, and sheepish look, we may identify him in the person of the worthy beyond there, so busy with the toe of his brogue settling straws in crosses. Symbolical and ominous that, I am afraid! But hush! here comes Father Dennis. Not a whisper above your breath now, or he'll look up at us, for he knows my peephole of old."

There was a general movement among the groups below, as the priest made his appearance; but we may fairly confine our notice (as Blake did) to the bride and bridegroom. The former shrunk yet closer to the wall, while the gallant groom came forward, fumbling in his pockets, and looking to the right and the left, as if for escape or assistance. At length he lugged forth the foot of a stocking, and one by one extracted its contents, some eight-and-twenty lily-white shillings, of which he formed a goodly pile on the table, that had meanwhile been placed before the ecclesiastic. Father Dennis seemed to look on during this operation with much unconcern; and when it was completed, and the money pushed over to him, he measured its height with his thumb, and coolly pushed it back. "This won't do, my lady," cried he, addressing the bashful fair one, whose ogling of the wall became only the closer; "pay me the ten shillings you owe me for giving the rites of the church to your last husband, and then I'll marry you to another, and welcome—but the devil a bit of it till then."

Not a word issued from the blue hood; but the bridegroom's voice, with a chorus of three others, opened at once in Irish. The priest replied in the same language; they rejoined with interest (one little sharp-looking old woman being particularly vociferous), and the exchange of fire became every moment more close and continuous.

"Blake, all this is only dumb show to me; pray, pray favor me with an interpretation," whispered Clinton to his companion, who was almost convulsed with suppressed laughter.

"Oh, such a whimsical debate on the subject of the ten shillings! but I hardly know how to render it for you. That little bitter old woman there, is the first husband's mother; she is all but drowning poor Dennis' enumeration of his expenses of purse and person in coming by boat to her son, in a most plentiful torrent of abuse. Then there's the bride's mother, whining and trying to mollify; and the bride's brother, making out a long account of losses sustained, and a blank one of the balance-sheet; and the happy man himself, disputing his liability, and professing his inability, to answer the debts of his predecessor. Now, now, again Father Dennis strikes in—'A folly to talk! one score must be cleared off before another is begun.'"

"And his firmness caused a lull," said Clinton.

"Ay, and sends the bridegroom's hand into his pocket again, though he almost swore himself black in the face just now that he had not another shilling in the world. Out comes the silver. Ah, the sleeve of a fellow, see how he keeps the hand over it! I'd lay anything now he'll want to get off for part!"

"Heydey! what has raised the storm again!" exclaimed the Englishman, as the clamor commenced as spiritedly as ever.

"As I guessed. He has put down six shillings, and wants time for the other four. Time for a month—for a fortnight. Och! prayers and entreaties! Well, then, really Dennis is very tough—may be the poor fellow actually hasn't it."

"So it is your fashion in this country to marry without a shilling in the world, is it?" said Clinton.

"Too much so, I confess. But, in the present case, a man might have stock, cows, sheep, pigs, and goats, and still not silver for a present occasion. I have more than half a mind to discover myself and lend. Och! no need of it! he has found out a pocket he didn't know he had about him—two shillings. You may coin the other two, my tight lad, before I think again of helping you. Now he is trying to persuade Nelly's husband to go bail for him. A civil refusal—Father Dennis would n't take his bail. By my honor and credit, but this is too good! Another little pocket he has discovered, and out come the last two shillings! My blessing on—Hallo! mercy on us! is the woman electrified!"

This vehement exclamation was not uncalled for; since, the very moment the modest, shrinking bride saw the last coin deposited, she flung back her hood, and, bursting through the circle, stood before the priest with eyes flashing, cheeks glowing, and tongue ready to ring an alarm peal. "Since you've got my money, give me the worth of it!" cried she. "Say me a mass fur the sowl o' my poor man, that's gone! God knows it's chape arnin' fur ye!"

"Whisht, woman, whisht—stop your clatter—don't you know there's gentlemen in the house! Do you want to rouse them up?"

"Who cares for your gentlefolks!" cried she, screaming still louder, and stamping with passion. "Let me have something fur my money, I say—it's little you ever give, but let me have something!"

"Hut tut—sure it's none of your money I touched, maureen! Halloran did the thing handsome, afther all—ped me for himself and yourself, and poor Tom into the bargain. I've nothing at all to do with you ashore."

"You have something to do with me, and plenty to do with me. 'Twas my money he ped you down. Faith, I'd think twice afore I'd marry widout the marriage money in my fist—to lave a man the right to sell me whin he'd got tired o' me!"

At this moment the virago started and paused in turn, the long-suppressed laughter from above breaking forth in an uncontrollable peal. Father Dennis' eye instantly sought the aperture. "Bother you, you scamp, is it there you are?" cried he, shaking his fist good-humoredly at his young friend; "and you've brought the English captain to spy at me too! By this and that, Isidore, I'll be even with you for this yet."

"Faith, you are even with me as it is, for I am more than half-choked with laughing," gasped Blake. "Oh, these sides of mine! they ought to be iron to stand it!"

"And the wall ought to be iron, to stand your wriggling; you'll have it a-top of us, I think," cried the priest. "Come down out of that, and don't be making a fool of yourself, and aggravating me! Come down, I tell you, both o' ye, and look on at the wedding like Christians."

"Here I am at your elbow," cried Blake, making a leap from the top of the partition wall, while his companion effected a more orderly entrance by the door. "Here we both are! And now let me settle the debate between you and Mary Duane. Mary will forgive your making her pay her old debts (and you know yourself, that is the greatest offence that can be given in this country), and you'll promise to say the mass for poor Tom Conry. You ought to do what you can for him, I'm sure, if it was only for old acquaintance sake. Many's the good drop of potheen of his making has helped to wet the whistle for you before now. And right good it was always—was n't it! It's the least you can do to give him a cast of your office, when he so often gave you one of his, before the puff was out of him."

"Well, well, sure I'll do it! No more words about it now," cried the priest; and the women hailed the promise in a torrent of thanks and blessings on "Misther Isidore."

When these were silenced, the ceremony proceeded. Bottles of the national cordial were then produced from the pockets of the men, and from under the cloaks of the women, supplying means for a deep pledge to the health and happiness of bride and bridegroom; which last important branch of the rites roused up even the tenants of the settled, who had fallen fast asleep during the lull.

The departure of the bridal company of course followed; but the priest and his two young guests continued chatting and laughing by the kitchen fire for some time after the dispersion.

"Well, Clinton," said Blake, "you have now seen a good specimen of an Irish wedding. Do you think it was worth getting out of bed for?"

"I would not have missed it for anything," was the reply. "It was a most original scene — comic beyond what I could have conceived, even of a Cunnemara wedding. The comic effect was admirable. The bridegroom, with his inimitable cruise of discovery through forgotten pockets, and the bashful bride, transformed by a magic touch into an amazon. Why, it would make no bad groundwork for a pantomime. By the bye, though, the lady dropped something that puzzled me. What was that she said about her husband's having a right to sell her!"

"How! — a right to sell her! Did she say that? Oh, I know now what you mean — that's if she did not pay the marriage money. A queer notion the people have here, that if the man pays the marriage fees, he in fact buys his wife, and may sell her again for the same, if he can find a purchaser. I have known it actually done in one instance — though I suppose Dennis would snap my nose off for mentioning it, as I own I cannot back it by a second. But so far as talk goes, all that priest or layman can say won't beat it out of their heads but that it is lawful. There's another item for your commonplace book, if you keep one. I think a good long list of Cunnemara characteristics have fallen under your eye in this ramble of ours."

"Yes; I have certainly been fortunate in that respect," said the young officer. "Whatever may be my future adventures, I am pretty sure they will never efface the memory of this 'Night in Cunnemara.'"

THE SPANISH LADY'S LOVE.

BEING THE OLD BALLAD ALTERED TO SUIT THE TIMES.

Would you hear a Spanish lady
How an emperor she won?
Very marked attentions paid he,
But she was not to be done.
The belle of all the Tuileries' balls was she,
And had a gross of titles and a mile of pedigree.

To be mistress of the Master
Of the Frenche she was too high;
Cupid's bonds did hold him faster
All the more that she fought shy:
In her charming company was all his joy,
But to favor him in anything he found her coy.

Till at last he gave commandment
At Compiègne a hunt should be;
To chase the deer was his intention —
But not the one spelt double e.
Then said the lady milde, "His game I see,
But mine is not a heart that's caught so easilie."

"Gentle ladye, show some pitie:
I'm an Emperor — no lease!"
But the ladye was too wittie
To be caughte with chaffe, I guesse;

"There's one way from my chains yourself to free,
My gallant Emperor — that is to marry me."

"Aught I'll swear, so thou but love me;

See, on marrow-bones I goe!"

"Sire, fair words no parsnips butter,
Swearing don't coste much, you knowe.

Some people I have known swear over nighte,
Who all their oaths next morning have forgoten quite.

"The Assemblée saw no reason
'Gainst your treading Gallic ground;
Then all traitors and all treason
How you swore, Sire, to confounde!
But now the Assemblée you have overthrowne,
And in their place you sit, as Emperor, alone."

"Hold your tongue, free-spoken ladye,
Hold your tongue, you are a bore:
Of fair ladies there are plentie,
France doth yield a wondrous store;
Spaniards to their own fortunes may be blinde,
But the French ladies to my prayer will be more kinde.

"Yet forgive me, lovely Spaniard,
You alone possess my heart;
And with thee, if so it must be,
My Imperial crowne I'll part.
With all the Royal houses to wedde I've done my best,
But all decline the honor — Coburgs 'mong the rest."

"I have neither golde nor silver,
To maintain me in such a place;
To be Empress is great charges,
As you know, in any case."
"My cash and jewels every one shall be thy owne,
The sums I've made by dabbling in the Funds are quite unknowne."

"On French thrones are many changes
Quick they fall who quickly rise;
Then the way you've been behaving —
Prisoning, shooting, telling lies!"
"A better man henceforth I mean to be,
And all the credit of the change they will set down to thee!"

"Then your friends, Sire, of both sexes,
Have a reputation sad;
Louis Quinze and his Dubarrys,
Other Louis are as bad."
"I'll set them all a packing, whate'er age, sex,
or claims,
Till your Court's dull and decorous as that of sour St. James."

"Well, Sire, upon these conditions
I to share your throne consent;
Spanish ladies are no greenhorns,
With bare love to be content;
But Empress — though of such an Emperor — to be,
Is a chance I can't resist, though a true blue-blood grandee."

White, Red, Black: Sketches of American Society. By FRANCIS and THERESA PULSZKY. In Two Vols. 12mo. pp. 331, 342. Redfield.

WE are always glad to listen to the opinions of intelligent foreigners in regard to this country. If they often wound our self-love, they also furnish many wholesome lessons. We are enabled to know ourselves better, as mirrored in the reports of frank travellers. For our part, we have seldom met with any, even the grossest, caricatures of American manners that had not some foundation in truth. Even when the facts are distorted in the most grotesque manner, they at least show us what impressions we may give unconsciously. The general tone of society is usually described with more fidelity than the details of political or domestic life. This is the character of the present volumes. Frequent minute errors may be detected by readers familiar with the topic discussed; but, as a whole, they seize the most salient features of American society, and comment upon them with spirit and good faith. They are written with kindly feelings, but with no attempt at fulsome adulation. The authors, as they intimate in the preface, enjoyed some peculiar opportunities for becoming acquainted with the characteristics of the New World. They accompanied Kossuth in his extensive tour through the United States. They shared with him the enthusiasm or the prejudice which his advent called forth, according to the locality which he visited. They became acquainted with a great number of the leading men of the country. American communicativeness no doubt made them frequent victims to long-winded narratives, though they abstain from hinting at any such infictions. They were brought into intimate relations with various classes of people, who were ready to pour into their ears floods of gossip and anecdote, which were old stories to their familiar acquaintance. But their connection with Kossuth had also an unfavorable side, as regards obtaining correct impressions. They saw the people under the excitement of a holiday occasion, rather than in the ordinary routine of habitual life. It was a morbid, feverish aspect of society which was presented to their observation; not the normal expression of health. The Americans are quite a different generation when under the influence of one of the periodical enthusiasms to which the country is subject, from the cautious, plodding, care-worn race that ply their business in taciturn gravity on ordinary occasions. It was under the inspiration of Kossuth's presence that the Pulszkys saw our population. Their volumes must be read with this allowance.

Mrs. Pulszky kept a regular journal during their American tour, of which the greater part has been incorporated with this work. The political statements and speculations, with which it abounds, we presume are from her husband's pen. They, of course, will not be expected to give universal satisfaction. But they cannot be accused of partiality or prejudice. They bear the impress of honest intentions and practical sagacity. Still, most readers will find more to interest them in the descriptive sketches by Mrs. Pulszky, which are uniformly lively and agreeable, and often set off with piquant reflections, showing an acute intellect, as well as a habit of nice observation.

Here is her account of the reception of Kossuth and the Hungarian party in New York. The provoking annoyances of the occasion are well shown up, and also the impression produced on their minds by the first sight of an American city.

RECEPTION IN NEW YORK.

December 6th.

The sun shone this morning as splendidly as yesterday, but to-day I was so fortunate as not to see it rising, for our sleep was not disturbed by cannonades in our honor. When I approached the window I was fascinated with the view on the wonderful bay, peopled by the steamboats which carry commerce and life to and from its islands and cities. But soon voices were heard below, and I was summoned to breakfast. I found the parlor occupied by militia and navy officers, the former belonging to the Richmond County Guards, the same corps that received and attended La Fayette at his visit in the United States, the latter were of the Mississippi steam frigate which carried Kossuth and his family from Ghemlik to Gibraltar; the deputations of the reception committee from New York, and numbers of other visitors were likewise present, and introductions and speeches succeeded one another.

Most of the inhabitants of Staten Island, and many other gentlemen, among whom we were delighted to greet Mr. Stiles, late United States Minister at Vienna, accompanied us to the boat which was ready to convey us to New York. The presence of Mr. Stiles, and our conversation with him on by-gone times, when Hungary sought his mediation before the entry of Windischgratz in Pesth, strongly brought before my mind our struggles and sufferings, and when I heard now the hurrahing shouts of joy, bursting from the masses, and reechoed by roars of cannon and peals of music, I could not help feeling very sad, and when I looked at Kossuth and his wife, close to whom I chanced to stand, I saw that their impression was similar to my own.

We were pushed hard before we could get through the crowd on board the Vanderbilt—a most elegant steamer, ornamented by the star-spangled banner, unfolding above the Hungarian tricolor, and the Turkish crescent. But we had little leisure to admire the sumptuous decorations, gildings, mirrors and tapestries of the boat which carried us; we were too much interested in the panorama along the shores, as we steamed about the bay, and in succession got the views of Jersey City, Brooklyn, Williamsburgh and New York, which proudly adorn the estuary of the Hudson, and are connected by the ever-running ferry-boats into one colossal city. As we moved on and passed the Navy Yard, with its stately men-of-war, we recognized among them the Mississippi. All the masts and all the yards were peopled with seamen and mariners, who shouted and hurrahsed uninterruptedly while our steamer came up; and the ferry-boats blew their whistles, and the flags of America and Hungary greeted us on every masthead and from many a sail. The animated groups of vessels incessantly roared with cannonades, which our ship returned, mingling this thundering bass to the loud music of the band on board. When we turned from Jersey City towards Castle Garden and the Battery, our eyes were caught by hundreds and hundreds of glittering swords and regimentals, and the masses of people seemed to swell all along the shore. A chaotic noise of vociferation received our steamer when it halted at some yards from the Castle Garden. In fact, the waters were shallow, and anxiety to be the first to step ashore kept so large a mass of passengers to one side, that it became impossible to land for a considerable time. At last many of the party got out in small boats, and about noon we debarked at the Battery, on Manhattan Island. The military formed an avenue through which we were to pass to the hall of Castle Garden, where the people assembled to hear Kossuth. But though our gentlemen, and several officers of the navy and the aldermen who accompanied us, did their very best to shield us, it proved all in vain. The military flourished their swords about to protect us; but the crowd pushed them so vigorously, that there was real danger that we should be hurt by that gallant defence. Nothing could resist the pressure from without; even Lieutenant Nelson, endowed not only with a commanding Kentuckian frame, but likewise with the hardy spirit of his country, could not prevent Madame Kossuth from being repeatedly torn from his arm. At last we emerged on a platform, to which we were raised by invisible agencies. Before us stood Kossuth and the Mayor and several other gentlemen of the Committee; under us numberless heads moved to and fro, and above, people seemed intent to break down the rows of galleries which surrounded the hall, for they thronged and pressed forward, and then there seemed below and above and from all sides a rush towards Kossuth, so spontaneous as if an electric shock pushed every one ahead. The mayor attempted to speak, but his accents were drowned in thundering hurrahs; the aldermen gestured, and some of the marshals raised their sticks adorned with Hungarian rosettes; but all without effect; the rush continued and the cheers swelled to tumultuous uproar. "What do they want?" inquired I, from one of the gentlemen. "They are all so very anxious to hear the great Patriot," was the reply. "Then they do not apply the most direct means of getting what they want; how is any man to make himself heard in such turmoil?" This was my remark in a moment when the flood of excitement seemed to give way. But I had no leisure to hear or see what ensued, because one of the marshals said to us, "Now, ladies, you had better get out to the carriages; you will not be able to break through afterward." And as we had no inclination to "break through" again, we at once followed the advice, and by a back door safely got to the carriage, which we occupied with Mr. Pulzsky and Lieutenant Nelson. We had now time to survey all the decorations, and the spectators that assembled on the spot from whence the procession was to start.

A long row of carriages extended from the corner of the Battery, near Bowling Green, to the triumphal arch erected at the beginning of Broadway. The arch was decorated with the colors of Hungary, intermixed with the star-spangled banner and the Turkish crescent, which floated above the arms of New York, bequeathed to this city by its embryo, New Amsterdam. The Dutch sails of a windmill, two whiskey barrels, and the beaver skin—those emblems of the original Dutch settlement, and of the means by which the fur trade was carried on, and the extermination of the Indians was achieved—remain still the arms of the "Empire City." At our right the cavalry galloped to and fro along the alleys of Castle Garden, and the infantry drew up in long lines. The windows of all the houses before us were filled with people; the bricks of the roofs, and the twigs of the trees seemed to have all become alive; on every branch perched scores of children. Great masses of gentlemen in black coats, others in workmen's attire, covered the whole extent of Battery-place, and crowded about the Garden, while the police and the marshals were incessantly shouting, "Room for carriages, gentlemen! Gentlemen, if you please, room for carriages!" Several ladies and gentlemen, and workmen, came up to our carriage, and almost every one of them addressed to us the question, "How do you like America? Is it not a great country?" To which we of course answered, that "what we see is very fine indeed, but that we landed only yesterday on American soil." But this conclusive answer seemed not to give satisfaction, because the by-standers repeatedly put the same question. One man came up to us and said that he likewise was a refugee, a German, driven to America in 1848; that he now kept a shop, and liked it very well, and should be glad to receive us at his shop, and to tell us all about New York; and he was anxious to know what we thought about it, and how we had borne the passage, and so on. We could not get rid of him till the alderman requested, with some authority, that he should leave us alone, and I thought, certainly, not only the Americans born are inquisitive! Either the emigrants at once become Americans, or there is in the very air across the ocean some influence that stimulates curiosity.

An alderman, who in the mean time was introduced to us, now pointed to the military forming into line, and joining the procession before us. I was struck by the soldier-like appearance of the militia; they certainly looked as if the regimentals were their daily garb; nothing stiff in their bearing, nothing awkward in their movements, they appeared fully disciplined. And when I glanced around on the vigorous, sturdy countenances of the young men, I noticed that every one of them looked quite as soldier-like as the militia; and therefore, when the alderman asked me whether I found the aspect of the masses different from that of the English, I replied, "Yes, this people look as if they were more generally pervaded by a military spirit." "And yet we are as fond of peace as the English," he said. "Well," answered I, "of that I cannot judge, but it is nothing to do with a military spirit; that is not necessarily aggressive, but is self-confident; and, therefore, people pervaded by it, look conscious that they can themselves defend their own rights, and need no large and expensive standing army." "England, likewise, has but a small standing army," remarked the alderman. "Yes," said I; "but she trusts, it appears to me, more to the acknowledged power of her fleet to prevent any attack, than to the military spirit of her people, who look like citizens conscious of their commanding wealth and civilization, but quite convinced that they are not likely to be ever called upon to defend their hearths." "Have you been long in England? you speak English with great ease," again asked the alderman. "I was in England about two years." "And you?" he continued, turning to Mr. Pulzsky; who replied that he had resided there yet longer, and consequently was familiar with the language. "And do you also speak our language?" continued the inquisitive alderman, addressing Lieutenant Nelson. "I calculate I do," was the answer. "Certainly, you appear to talk with perfect facility; is it long since you have learnt it? and where have you been taught so well?" "In my father's house, about twenty-six years ago," retorted the officer. The alderman looked quite perplexed at the young man, and exclaimed, "How so! is English taught to infants in Hungary?" "This I don't know," replied Lieutenant Nelson, "but I learnt it in Kentucky;" and, pointing to his coat, said, "Don't you know your own navy?"

We laughed that our Kentuckian friend had, by his language, been mistaken for a Hungarian, and found that the alderman had certainly much flattered us for our knowledge of foreign tongues.

"Where is he! which is the governor?" was now shouted from all sides, and all eyes turned towards the alley from which Kossuth issued on horseback, accompanied by General Sandford and his staff, after their inspection of the troops. The whole procession preceded us, and therefore I could learn nothing more of it than the description given in the newspapers. But even had they not recorded its pompous length, I should have been fully aware of it by the time it lasted, before our carriage began to move, and then it only advanced a few paces, to stop and wait again. Yet, during the slow progress, we had enough to see; flags, with the most varied inscriptions of welcome and sympathy, waved from every roof and every window, and others were suspended across the way; evergreens, and red and white roses encircled the door-arches, while hundreds of stores were adorned with Hungarian colors, and the portraits of Kossuth, Washington and La Fayette. The American Eagle spread its wings over the numerous decorations in which the names of Washington and Kossuth were coupled. The Sultan, backed by the British Lion, was likewise triumphantly represented as the noble champion of liberty; and the Russian Bear, and the rescuing Mississippi, and the hospitable Humboldt, every one held a place in this public acknowledgment of universal interest in the fate of the great patriot.

The finest view of the city we got that day.

was, when we reached the American Museum. The open space of the Park then relieved the eye from the rows of high buildings through which we had passed. Before us extended the straight line of Broadway, second in length only to Oxford Street, but surpassing it in regularity of buildings, and especially in the magnificence of the hotels. The large square, called the Park, which extends before the City Hall, appeared as the centre of the crowd, which overflowed all the places and streets of New York.

On the steps of the City Hall was a tricolor canopy, to which Kossuth was led. Hardly had he stepped from the carriage, when such thronging and such tumultuous uproar began that I felt quite bewildered, and expected every moment to see our carriage, and all those which preceded us, swept away by the multitude. I hardly know what ensued, for the confusion and noise grew every moment, and the crowd obstructed our view in all directions. After a stormy hour we at last began to move again, and slowly passed along the line formed by the brilliant militia, offering a most striking variety of nationalities and regimentals. The American rifles, who never miss their aim, and never retreat before fire; English hussars on fine horses, and again, hussars with helmets and epaulets; Irish volunteers, with their animated countenances and dark hair, finely relieved by their green coats; the Washington guards, in the old style, with blue and buff coats, high boots, and powdered wigs and tails, recalling vividly bygone times, that we well might fancy they were relics of the revolutionary war; the German grenadiers, and stern black rifles, formed altogether a most impressive and varied picture.

It grew almost dark before we had achieved the whole circuit up Broadway and down Bowery. We reached the Irving House by a back door, for the front entrance was obstructed by the crowd. Yet the stairs and passages of this large hotel were likewise beset by gazers; it seemed as if gazing had become the business of the occasion, for everybody was everywhere on the look-out, even where I could not detect anything worth glancing at, and therefore I was much pleased to retire to the dining-room, where the mayor, as president of our meal, expected us.

Her first Sunday in New York affords her a glimpse of the look of the population.

December 9.

When on Sunday we drove to St. Bartholomew's Church, the fine streets of New York looked quiet and sober in comparison with what they had appeared on the previous day. The houses, before so gaudily and gayly apparelled, stood in silent uniformity, their long lines now unbroken by decorations. Compared with London, but few squares and terraces refresh the eye, and no magnificent park breathes health around. It is very remarkable, that while the American cities generally command plenty of room, and therefore their houses could easily have been so disposed as to leave ample space for pleasure-grounds, they seem to be avoided as superfluous. And yet the trees along the avenues, and the creepers clustering up the walls of the most elegant houses, show that the Anglo-Saxon race is not less partial to green spots and fresh blossoms across the ocean, than their ancestors were in once merry old England.

The sermon in the Episcopal Church, which we attended, was dogmatical, and therefore appealing exclusively to the reasoning faculties, and neither calming the mind nor bedewing the feeling. Such sermons are very different from those we were accustomed to hear in Hungary, where they generally preach on moral topics addressed to the heart and imagination, thus leading to contemplation, instead of arousing ideas of controversy. After service was over, I had leisure to see the congregation, which was so numerous that people could get out but slowly. No characteristic costumes mark here the different grades of society, which, in Eastern Europe, impress the foreigner at once with the varied occupations and habits of the old country. There is the peasant girl with the gaudy ribbons interlaced in her long tresses, her bright corset and her richly-folded petticoat; there the Hungarian peasant with his white linen shirt, and his stately sheepskin; the Slovak in the closely-fitting jacket and the bright yellow buttons; the farmer with his high boots, and the Hungarian coat; old women with the black lace cap in the ancient national style, and none but the young ladies apparelled in French bonnets and modern dresses. But here all have submitted to the rule of Paris fashion, despotically swaying over Western Europe and across the Atlantic; they all wear the uniforms prescribed by English tailors and French milliners. One gentleman passes after the other, every one of them clad so exactly alike, that they seem cast in one and the same mould, and the ladies wear the same bonnets, the same silk dresses and furs, only varied in color, but equal in cut, equal in adornment. There is no individual turn of mind impressed on the outward appearance, and therefore such an assembly bears a manufactured, thoroughly unartistic stamp, in singular contrast to the poetical beauty of the ladies. In Europe, I always had understood that American women were very pretty up to twenty, but that their bloom was soon gone. Here, on the contrary, I beheld a whole congregation of attractive countenances, and though certainly many of them had passed the prime of youth, the charm of beauty had by no means departed from their faces.

On arriving at Washington, the Hungarians received a cordial welcome from Gov. Seward, whose estimable character is at once appreciated, as will be seen in the following sketch. Some other senatorial celebrities are introduced into the same picture.

When, on the 30th of December, we reached Washington, the fog was as dense and as yellow as if it had been freshly imported from London. The first man who greeted us at the railway terminus was Mr. Seward, late Governor of New York, now senator for that state — one of the three gentlemen appointed by Congress to receive Kossuth. He made a most agreeable impression on me. His appearance is distinguished; — a noble forehead, light gray hair, penetrating eyes, pointed New England features, in which shrewdness and benevolence are blended; his elegant dress and easy manners convey at once the idea that he is at home in the drawing-room as well as in the Senate. His conversation is fluent and instructive, fascinating even to his political opponents. I had repeated opportunity of seeing that this gentleman, the heir of John Quincy Adams' principles and views, did in fact reconcile, by his personal amiability, all those southerners who came in personal contact with him. Senator Seward, though, by the unceasing denunciations of The New York Herald, he is the bugbear of the south, is yet highly respected by southern statesmen, and has never become an object of those violent parliamentary attacks with which John Quincy Adams, in spite of his eminent services as ambassador, secretary of state and president, was assailed, when, towards the close of his remarkable career, he again entered Congress as a member of the House.

Senator Seward is the most influential of the whig leaders. He has the instinct of the future, and never shrinks from taking up measures because they are unpopular, if he foresees that in time they will get the majority. When we arrived in America, his popularity was at an ebb, for he was known as unfriendly to the Fugitive Slave Law; but before we left the United States, he had won back the majority among the whigs, and commanded the esteem of the democrats.

We had hardly entered the drawing-room of Brown's Hotel, when the Secretary of State was announced. The countenance of Mr. Webster is well known in England. The vast bald forehead, the broad, thick, black eyebrows over the stern, large, dark eyes, the reserved countenance, the emphatic, deep voice, the measured gait, impart a gravity to his demeanor, extended to every one of his movements, even to the cool hand-shaking with which he greets you. He was evidently surprised at Kossuth's mild, melancholy, dignified manner. The unmovable countenance of the silencing Secretary of State was lighted up for a moment, when he first beheld the oriental solemnity of the great Hungarian; he remembered, perhaps, the sunny time of his own manhood, when he was the warm advocate of struggling Greece. The cold statesman, the logical expounder of the interests of the United States, was ever open to noble impulses; but his calculating mind controlled the impressions of his heart. He had perhaps expected to meet in Kossuth a visionary agitator, a theoretical revolutionist; but a short interview obviously satisfied him of Kossuth's superiority. A few days later he was asked how he liked the "nation's guest." "He has the manners of a king; his is a royal nature," was the answer.

General Cass and General Shields, the members of the reception-committee of the Senate, were our next visitors.

The old explorer of the head-waters of the Mississippi, the celebrated ambassador at the Court of Louis Philippe, the most popular of the democratic leaders, has one resemblance in his fortunes with the whig Secretary of State — he has not been able to attain the highest position in his country, though inferior men have attained it.

It is indeed remarkable, that, for a series of years, the most prominent political men of both parties, Henry Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Cass, Buchanan, were not elected presidents. They were all ministers; but a prominent parliamentary career, and a high rank among the statesmen, is in America conducive to renown and respect, not to popularity. Military chiefs and statesmen of second order have more chances at the presidential elections. The masses require instinctively a stout heart and sound common sense in their chief, and they wish to see him surrounded by the men of first-rate talent, as his advisers, at the head of the departments. Democracy never did, and never does, think it safe to entrust the supreme power to men of genius, though it requires their exertions for the public weal.

General Cass, tall and stout, full of vivacity, and French politeness to the ladies, strikes by the frankness and cordiality of his manners.

General James Shields, the democratic senator of Illinois, is a "self-made" man. An Irish emigrant, he became a lawyer of influence in the West, and took a prominent part in the Mexican war, at the head of a regiment of volunteers. Bold and gallant, as his countrymen used to be, he distinguished himself in different battles, and when severely wounded, he attracted the general interest of his adopted country; so prominent and attractive had been his gallantry. His physiognomy is very pleasant. Dark hair, dark brown eyes, dark complexion, lively demeanor and conversation, elegant manners and eloquence, recall his origin; acuteness and precision in expression, comprehensive, liberal views, unprejudiced research, were developed in his character on the free soil of America. Let those who revile the Irish as Celts, go to America for a different reply!

Mrs. Pulzsky gives her impressions of Boston society without the slightest reserve, — making the freest possible use of the names of her acquaintance in that city.

We had scarcely arrived at the elegant Revere House, where the Massachusetts Legislature had provided us with sumptuous apartments, when Dr. and Mrs. Howe, our excellent friend, whom we had known for many years, came to greet us. The doctor had, in his younger years, taken part in the Greek struggle of independence as a zealous Philhellen; he afterward became renowned as the philanthropic teacher of the blind, and has founded by his exertions the magnificent institution for them, which still occupies his time. His education of Laura Bridgeman, who is deaf, dumb, and blind, is a proof how genius can invent, not only machines for saving labor, but also means for instruction, even for those hapless beings to whom nature has blocked up nearly all the ways of external impression. Laura Bridgeman could neither hear, nor see, nor speak; it was by the sense of touch only that she was put into communication with the external world, that she learned to think, to understand, to read and to write. Doctor Howe now bestows his care on idiots, likewise to rouse in them the divine spark, buried in their defective physical constitution; and his efforts are, in this instance, too, attended with success. Though he is a man of eminent talent and keen observation, it is yet not to his abilities alone that we can trace the blessed results of his labors. Skill, experience, knowledge, suffice for brilliant success, but the earnest faith in the divine origin of human nature, and the deepest sympathy with human misery, can alone impart that devotedness to the exhausting task which characterizes Dr. Howe and truly makes him the regenerator of many a child which, without him, would not only be lost for the world without, but would likewise remain blind to the light within, which brightens its dreary pilgrimage on this earth, and sheds brilliancy over the path which opens into a better world.

Mrs. Howe, the lovely wife of this distinguished man, combines the genuine simplicity of an original mind with striking social qualities, with deep thought, and sparkling imagination, elegance of manners, and warmth of feeling. Their house at the extremity of Boston, on the sea-shore, with a choice library, some good Italian paintings, a few model marble busts, and some pieces of ancient carved oak furniture, has a marked individuality. It is not set up to look stylish, the pictures are not bought by the yard to fill the walls, nor the books to fill the shelves. During our stay in Boston, we spent here the most delightful hours. Here, too, we made the acquaintance of Mr. and Mrs. Longfellow.

The great German poet, Schiller, says:—

In der Dichtkunst allein macht das Gefass den Gehalt;

(in poetry alone the form gives the value.) This view may be incomplete, but it is that which characterizes the works of Longfellow. They are finished and refined in every detail; harmony surrounds them; they are the expression of classical taste, to which everything misshaped is repulsive; and if Buffon's words, "The style is the man," can be applied justly to any author, it is to the minstrel of Evangeline and the Golden Legend. His conversation and his manners bear the same stamp, as his whole appearance, that of natural nobility. With his wife, a lady of Junonian beauty and the kindest heart, he lives close to Boston, in Cambridge, in the spacious house which was once the head-quarters of General Washington. It is now embellished by all the comfort which wealth and elegance can bestow.

Not far from hence lives Mr. Agassiz, the celebrated geologist, of world-wide reputation, who has left Europe, with all the attractions which the Old World offers to renowned scholars, in order to carry to the New World the love of Natural History, and to transplant the science which he illustrates to a virgin soil. We observed to him that it must be painful for a man, who in Europe was surrounded by all the facilities for observation, and who could there work and combine the results of the investigations of many others occupied in the same line, to be in some way excluded from the benefits of cooperation — as not even all the scientific publications find their way across the ocean. But the discoverer of the theory of glaciers told us that he is most satisfied with his position; he might have acquired greater renown in Europe, but he certainly is more useful in America — for, though he loses precious time in details, which in Europe others would work out for him, he originates here a school of naturalists who will not fail to advance the science. He is now engaged in microscopic researches on the Infusoria, and in observations on the metamorphoses of animal life. The tadpole and the caterpillar are not the only instances of those transformations; and one of the last discoveries of Mr. Agassiz shows that several species of the Infusoria are nothing else than the embryos of molluscs. Embryolizing has become by this discovery a chief object of his attention. But whether he speaks on the recent coral formation of Florida and of the fossil corals which were heaved up in the Jura range, or whether it is the transformation of the crabs and molluscs, he always gives to science that lively interest and practical bearing which are sure to captivate the hearer. By his energetic activity he finds time also for the general interest of humanity, and especially for the important question of education in regard to University reform.

Professor Felton, who brings the sublime beauty of Greek and Roman poetry, by his popular lectures, within the reach of the public at large, Dr. Gray the botanist, and Jared Sparks, the learned biographer of Franklin and Washington, and President of Harvard College, through the close vicinity of Cambridge to the society of Boston, belong to that rare circle of intellectual notabilities, in which we meet Mr. Ticknor, the accomplished historian of Spanish literature; Prescott, of the Conquests of Mexico and Peru; Everett, the well known Ambassador at London, who has lately become Secretary of State; Dr. Warren, the celebrated physician, and proprietor of a remarkable collection of fossils; and others, whose personal acquaintance we have not made.

In London or in Paris many more celebrated men of science may be found; but these capitals are of such immense extent, and so many different interests divide and split people into sets and coteries, that the literary and scientific element is entirely diluted; whilst in Boston it forms one of the principal features of society. Love of science is inherent in New England; the whig principle that knowledge is the best safeguard of freedom, more so than standing armies; that therefore every citizen — whether childless, or blessed with many children — must contribute to public education; that the common schools must be free to every child, and that the state must afford the greatest facility for higher education, prevails here generally, even among the democrats. In other states they favor rather the voluntary principle of education; establishing the schools by public money, but endeavoring to make them self-supporting by the fees of the students. They take the education of the children to be the duty of the parents, not of the citizens at large. It is through schools and instructions that Massachusetts strives against crime and oppression; and, in the regular expenditure of this state, public education has the prominent place, which in Europe is given to the army and navy estimate. The result of this spirit is visible everywhere. New England, and especially Massachusetts, furnishes teachers to nearly three fourths of all the schools of the United States. The general instruction diffused through the people gives to the Yankees this peculiar aptitude for everything. They are, in turn, farmers and mechanics, shopkeepers and lecturers, engineers and clergymen, merchants and statesmen. Alphonse Karr, the French essayist and novel-writer, has attacked democratic institutions, on the plea that if talent alone gets a place in society and in government, no one will remain in the humbler situation of a mechanic, and all inventive genius will rush to the political career, much to the detriment of politics and industry. He feared that expansive views would no longer be formed among statesmen, and that stagnation would prevail in all mechanic pursuits. Poor Alphonse Karr thought, really, that it is only the aristocratic spirit of England which prevents Messrs. Moses & Son from becoming chancellors of the exchequer! He should come here to Boston; he would find that a shopkeeper has become Governor; a cobbler President of the Senate, and a cotton-boy Speaker of the House; yet he would find with them, not only the same good manners which he thinks the exclusive inheritance of aristocracy, but at the same time an elevation of mind and nobility of sentiment, straightforward honesty and devotion to the cause of humanity, which he does not find now either in the Chaussée de Antin or the Faubourg St. Germain. And yet, the grocery shops lack no man of business. Massachusetts supplies shoes to all the South, and in Lowell the mills have never been stopped for want of workers. The Frenchman would likewise find talent combined with the most different occupations, and intellectual accomplishment with the most various pursuits; and not only with men, but likewise with ladies, whom manifold duties do not prevent from not only adorning society by their charms, but aiding and enriching it also by their acquirements.

We spent three weeks in Boston, amid a society so varied in attractions that I found more time to enjoy than to record our enjoyments. In the first days of our stay we had an evening party at Mr. and Mrs. Loring's, where we became acquainted with the numerous circle of their relatives, the Putnams, Lowells, Grays, Peabodys, Jacksons — all names of literary reputation. The venerable Mr. Quincy was also here, the posthumous son of the great Josiah Quincy, the patriot whose writings and personal influence directed the minds of his countrymen to political independence. The present Josiah Quincy is the inheritor of the spirit of his father. His age — he was born in 1774 — has not broken his faculties nor cooled his enthusiasm. He was the second Mayor of Boston, and, like his predecessor, Mr. Phillips, he administered the new form of city government with a prudence and vigor which reconciled the population with the representative city government, introduced by the Legislature, instead of the primary meetings. In the Quincy Market, established through his energies, and through the direction he gave to the enterprise of the city, he has connected his memory with one of the most splendid improvements of Boston. For a long series of years he had been the President of Harvard College, and is now honored in Boston as the patriarch of the city.

Several of our days were wholly occupied by calls we received. Everybody seemed interested in our cause and in our lot. Of the New England coldness and reserve, so often mentioned in the South, we found here no trace; yet in one respect society differs much from that of trans-Chesapeake States—the prejudice which regards duelling as a mode of reestablishing a questioned reputation, does not exist here. One of the greatest statesmen of Massachusetts, when a chivalrous Southerner, who deemed himself insulted by some expression on slavery, challenged him to fight a duel as a gentleman, is said to have replied coolly, that his adversary was mistaken in supposing him to be a gentleman; this title, coupled with the duty of duelling, belonged to monarchies, not to democratic republics.

Of our new acquaintances none proved more affectionate, and actively kind to us, than Mrs. Hillard. She met us not as strangers, but as friends, whose fortunes she had long watched with anxious sympathy. One of those thoroughly benevolent natures, void of all selfishness, who ever seem to please themselves only when they confer benefits on others; with the modest timidity of one who claims neither attentions nor thanks, she unites the energy which rarely fails to carry its ends. The deep affections of her disposition, not being concentrated by maternal cares (for she is childless), expand in sunny kindness on every one whom she can assist or oblige. She enjoys the happiness of her friends as warmly as she sympathizes with their sorrows; and every one is to her eminently a friend, who is oppressed, or who strives against injustice.

We spent a pleasant morning at Mr. R. Winthrop's, the descendant of the celebrated first Governor of Massachusetts. He is one of the chief leaders and most important statesmen of the whig party in this State, and is more English in his manners and turn of mind than most of the Bostonians; in his house we almost forgot that we had crossed the ocean. We spoke about the claims of the different nationalities in the United States, and Mr. Winthrop justly remarked that the Americans are eminently a mixed people, and that it is ridiculous here to make national distinctions in regard to the white population. He himself, for example, who surely must be taken for the type of a New Englander, is yet by his maternal ancestors also of French and of Irish descent.

We dined at Mr. Prescott's. Everything in his abode reminded me of his occupations. In the hall there is a portrait of Cortez; Spanish princes, queens and knights meet our eyes on the walls, and a rich, historical library, containing the works on Spain and her possessions in the sixteenth century, with a large collection of manuscripts of that period, fill his study. Mr. Prescott was, by the natural weakness of his eyes, and perhaps likewise by the amiable mildness of his temper, prevented from taking an active part in politics, or from becoming a regular business man. He devoted his time to literature; and parting from the Spanish conquest of Mexico and of Peru, his researches led him to the history of the splendid reigns of Ferdinand and Isabella. He is now occupied on that of Philip II. It is a gigantic task, for the history of Spain under that king is also a history of Protestantism in Germany, of independence in the Netherlands, of liberty in England, of the struggle between the power of the crown and the local institutions in France and in Spain; a drama of which we ourselves have not yet witnessed the last act. The author who will accomplish this task adequate to the grand subject, will really be "a prophet turned backward," as A. W. Schlegel has termed the true historian.

A family relic in the dining-room of Mr. Prescott had a peculiar interest for me, as an evidence of the impartial way in which Bostonians look upon their revolution. Two swords, crossing one another on the wall, and those of the grandfather of Mr. Prescott and of the grandfather of his wife, both officers in the battle of Bunker Hill—the one in the American, the other in the English ranks. Here, as well as in the house of Mr. Winthrop, we saw that democratic institutions do not interfere with a just family pride, which prizes the merits of the ancestors and stimulates the descendants to emulation.

We admired at Mr. Ticknor's his most extensive Spanish library, which even in Spain has scarcely an equal for completeness. It is worth notice, that long before any party in the United States dreamt of an invasion of Mexico, two of the most eminent scholars of Boston had devoted their attention to the history and literature of that realm, turning the attention of their countrymen toward those parts which now seem destined to become their virtual inheritance.

The largest private library in Boston is that of Mr. Everett, in whose house the Scientific Society holds its regular meetings. The door of the library is masked as in the Athenæum of London, with titles of unwritten or lost books, in a way which shows the feelings of Mr. Everett. We see here, for instance, the Art of Government, by Louis Bonaparte, in five volumes—viz.: Artillery, Infantry, Cavalry, Police, and Clergy.

Here we take our leave of these spirited volumes. Our extracts show, that while they are too personal and gossiping to suit a scrupulous taste, they are marked by a charming naïveté and a genial spirit which will place them among the most readable books of the season.

From the Evening Post.

AMERICAN WRITERS FOR ENGLISH REVIEWS.

THE last Westminster Review, just republished by Scott & Co., contains an article on Webster, from the pen of Mr. Whipple, of Boston, as is said. The editor, however, appears to have taken some liberties with the MS., as we judge from the following paragraph in the Express of this morning, which appears to have been written by authority.

In the last number of the Westminster Review, we are assured that the elaborate article on Daniel Webster is from an American, and a Bostonian. It is an able review of the whole of the public life and opinions of Daniel Webster; but the article, we are told, is so interpolated with the views of the British editor, as in some measure to destroy the intent and meaning of the American writer.

Thus most all that was offensively said by Theodore Parker, in his sermon or address on Mr. Webster, is added to the main review of Mr. Webster's character and opinions. The British editor seemed to think that it was necessary to add something by way of drawback, to the good opinions of the gentleman selected by himself in Boston to write a proper review of Mr. Everett's volumes on Daniel Webster's life and character. Thus we are told in Mr. Parker's words, that—"His learning was narrow in its range, and not very nice in its accuracy. His reach in history and literature was very small for a great man seventy years of age, always associating with able men. To science he seems to have paid scarce any attention at all. It is a short radius that measures the arc of his historic realm. A few Latin authors whom he loved to quote, made up his meagre classic store. He was not a scholar, and it is idle to claim great scholarship for him."

Happily, scholars, like doctors, differ in opinion as to what is really the true understanding. We think that the published works of Mr. Webster answer the opinions of Mr. Parker, who can see nothing above, or below, or around his own dark spectacles, and who seems to think there is no heaven or earth, but that which comes within the orbit of his own narrow vision.

We trust that American writers, who may hereafter be called upon to write for English Reviews, will not suffer their manuscripts or opinions to be emasculated by the editors. It is selling labor and liberty too cheap to allow the infusion of so much poison into what would, without such ingredients, be regarded a just criticism or a perfect work.

This is certainly a very narrow and absurd appeal to the national prejudices of our literary men, and one quite unworthy of the literary profession. The Westminster Review asks Mr. Whipple, or any one else, to write them an article about Mr. Webster, of a prescribed length, and for a prescribed price per page. Mr. Whipple accepts the offer, writes the article, and pockets the fee.

He is not in any way responsible for the article when it is published, or for any part of it; his connection with it can never be known, with the consent of the editors, and is never likely to be revealed except by himself. He has no longer any property in the article; no more than the grocer has in the pound of tea which he has sold, or the tailor in the coat which he meets in the streets on the backs of his customers.

On the other hand, the Review is responsible for the article; its critical judgment is at stake; the consistency of its principles and the authority of its opinions are to be maintained; it asks no person to take any personal responsibility for what he writes for its columns, and it pays a high price for the exclusive privilege of using the labor of its contributors for its own advantage.

In the present instance the editors thought that Mr. Parker had presented some important phases of Mr. Webster's intellectual character which had been overlooked by Mr. Whipple, and they did what they had a perfect right to do—what every editor feels at liberty to do with a paid contribution; they altered it in a way to make it more adequately reflect their own opinions. It is not worth while to talk of American writers "selling their labor and liberty too cheap," when they are paid for their labor all they ask, and are at liberty to write what they please. It would be a sacrifice of liberty indeed, against which the Express would be the first to protest, if it were compelled to publish the communications of its paid contributors without the editorial privilege of making them correspond with and reflect its own opinions.

COWPER'S GRAVE.

It is a place where poets crowned
 May feel the heart's decaying —
 It is a place where happy saints
 May weep amid their praying —
 Yet let the grief and humbleness,
 As low as silence, languish ;
 Earth surely now may give her calm
 To whom she gave her anguish.

O poets ! from a maniac's tongue
 Was poured the deathless singing !
 O Christians ! at your cross of hope
 A hopeless hand was clinging !
 O men ! this man in brotherhood,
 Your weary paths beguiling,
 Groaned inly while he taught you peace,
 And died while ye were smiling !

And now, what time ye all may read
 Through dimming tears his story —
 How discord on the music fell,
 And darkness on the glory —
 And how, when one by one, sweet sounds
 And wandering lights departed,
 He wore no less a loving face,
 Because so broken-hearted —

He shall be strong to sanctify
 The poet's high vocation,
 And bowed the meekest Christian down
 In meeker adoration :
 Nor ever shall he be in praise,
 By wise or good forsaken ;
 Named softly, as the household name
 Of one whom God hath taken !

With sadness that is calm, not gloom,
 I learn to think upon him ;
 With meekness that is gratefulness,
 On God whose heaven hath won him —
 Who suffered once the madness-cloud,
 Toward His love to blind him ;
 But gently led the blind along
 Where breath and bird could find him ;

And wrought within his shattered brain,
 Such quick poetic senses,
 As hills have language for, and stars,
 Harmonious influences !
 The pulse of dew upon the grass,
 His own did oalmly number ;
 And silent shadow from the trees
 Fell o'er him like a slumber.

The very world, by God's constraint,
 From falsehood's chill removing,
 Its women and its men became Beside him, true and loving ! —
 And timid hares were drawn from woods
 To share his home caresses,
 Uplooking to his human eyes
 With sylvan tenderesses.

But while, in blindness he remained Unconscious of the guiding,
 And things provided came without
 The sweet sense of providing.
 He testified this solemn truth,
 Though frenzy desolated —
*Nor man, nor nature satisfy,
 When only God created !*

Like a sick child that knoweth not
 His mother while she blesses,
 And droppeth on his burning brow
 The coolness of her kisses ;
 That turns his fevered eyes around —
 " My mother ! where's my mother ?"
 And if such tender words and looks
 Could come from any other !

The fever gone, with leaps of heart
 He sees her bending o'er him ;
 Her face all pale from watchful love,
 The unwearied love she bore him !
 Thus, woke the poet from the dream
 His life's long fever gave him,
 Beneath these deep pathetic eyes
 Which closed in death, to save him !

Thus ! oh, not thus ! no type of earth
 Could image that awaking,
 Wherein he scarcely heard the chant
 Of seraphs, round him breaking —
 Or felt the new immortal throb
 Of soul from body parted ,
 But felt those eyes alone, and knew
 " My Saviour ! not deserted !"

Deserted ! who hath dreamt that when
 The cross in darkness rested,
 Upon the Victim's hidden face
 No love was manifested ?
 What frantic hands outstretched have e'er
 The atoning drops averted —
 What tears have washed them from the soul —
 That one should be deserted ?

Deserted ! God could separate
 From his own essence rather :
 And Adam's sins have swept between
 The righteous Son and Father —
 Yea ! once, Immanuel's orphaned cry,
 His universe hath shaken —
 It went up single, echoless,
 " My God, I am forsaken !"

It went up from the Holy's lips
 Amid his lost creation,
 That of the lost, no son should use
 Those words of desolation ;
 That earth's worst frenzies, marring hope,
 Should mar not hope's fruition ;
 And I, on Cowper's grave, should see
 His rapture, in a vision !

SONNET.

BY W. M. ANDERSON.

Oh, could we rest a little ! — On the cope
 Of present Time we stand but for a breath,
 While the dark backward fadeth far beneath.
 We summon up the Past : — ere we can hope
 To think old thoughts, we change ; and idly grope
 Among dim memories, stirring dust of death.
 — I see wild visions ; — now, a withered heath
 Where a strange plover cries ; and now, a slope,
 And a wan moon that silvers the dank reeds,
 And white sails like white faces on the sea,
 And a dull ebbing tide that waves the weeds ;
 While music of dead voices, dear to me,
 I hear forever ringing in mine ears :
 Dear God ! let me but weep, — for I am sick with tears.

From Miss Cook's Journal.

APSLEY HOUSE.

APSLEY HOUSE was built about 1785-6, by Henry Bathurst Baron Apsley, Earl Bathurst, and lord high chancellor, the son of Pope's friend:—

Who plants like Bathurst, or who builds like Boyle?

It was for some time the residence of the duke's elder brother, the late Marquis Wellesley, and was purchased by the great Duke in the year 1820. The house, originally of red brick, as Mr. Cunningham tells us in his Handbook, was faced with Bath stone in 1828, when the Piccadilly portico and the gallery to the west or Hyde Park side were added by the Messrs. Wyatt. Much of the house is, however, of Bathurst's building, and exhibits throughout tokens of want of skill and taste in the original builder, and the more modern tokens of alterations that have not very skillfully supplied or concealed the original defects. The portico is a portico to let—fit only for London sparrows. The site, however, is the finest in London—commanding the great west-end entrance into London, and the gates of the best known parks. A foreigner called it, happily enough, No. 1, London; and when the duke was alive and in Apsley House, many have been heard to regard him not only as constable of the Tower, but as constable of London, with his castle actually seated at its double gates. The house, indeed, stood at one time a kind of siege; and the iron blinds—bullet proof, it is said—were put up by the duke during the ferment of the Reform Bill, when his windows were broken by a London mob. What the great man saw—and what he lived to see! How far less universal would the feeling have been about him in 1832, had he died then instead of in 1852.

Within—we are speaking architecturally—the house has little to recommend it. The staircase, lighted by a dome filled with yellow glass, is unnecessarily dark. The light in the Piccadilly drawing-rooms is seriously lessened by the useless portico to which we have already referred. The great gallery, in which the annual Waterloo Banquet took place—though a fine room occupying the whole length of the Hyde Park side of the house, and the best room in the house—is lighted at present only from the top; the windows towards the park—its only side lights—being filled within by mirrors and without by iron blinds. Our previous impression of this room was materially lowered by our late visit. The present duke would, we think, do well to remove the temporary mirrors in the windows—for he would then restore the light, and enable his visitors to see the pictures in the gallery to some advantage. The far-famed Correggio—Christ on the Mount of Olives—is visible, but that is all. Such a gem should be seen close and with a good light. At present it is protected by a glass, placed at a distance by a barrier, and all but hidden by a bad light.

The visitor enters by one barricaded entrance in Piccadilly, passes through the whole to the great staircase; then through the whole of the rooms till he emerges from the late duke's modest bedroom (on the ground floor) into the little garden at the back of the house, and so once more into the courtyard in Piccadilly.

The house is left very much as we remember to have seen it in the duke's lifetime. We recollect, however, a very large and impressive collection of marble busts on the waiting-room table, grouped together without much order, but striking and tasteful notwithstanding, very few of which are now to be seen. There were two of the "Duke," one of "Pitt," and busts of "Gebrge III.," the "Duke of York," the "Emperor Alexander," and "Sir Walter Scott"—the Scott by Chantrey. Now the busts are fewer in number, and differently arranged. On one side of the door leading from this room to the principal staircase is Steele's bust of "the Duke," and on the other Chantrey's "Castlereagh." In a corner is Nollekens' characteristic bust of "Pitt," and in a place of honor is a reduced copy of Rauch's noble statue of "Blucher." Above, are views of Lisbon and other places in Portugal and in Spain, too high to be seen to advantage.

From the hall the visitor passes to the principal staircase, a circular one, lighted, as we have said, from above, and through yellow glass. Here, bathed in saffron color, stands Canova's colossal statue in marble of "Napoleon," holding a bronze figure of Victory in his right hand. This to our thinking is Canova's greatest work, for it is manly and antique-looking, not meretricious and modern—was presented to the duke by the allied sovereigns. It was executed, however, if we mistake not, for Napoleon himself. The staircase opens on the "Piccadilly Drawing-room:" a small, well-proportioned room, containing a few fine and interesting pictures ancient and modern. Among the former is a fine Caravaggio—The Card Players; half-lengths, fine in expression, and marvellous in point of color, and light and shade. Beneath it, but not too well seen on account of the barrier, is a small good Brouwer—A Smoking Party. Over the fireplace is a small full-length—perhaps by Vandermeulen—of the great Duke of Marlborough, on Horseback. The modern pictures are, Wilkie's Chelsea Pensioner—a commission to Wilkie from the duke; Burnet's Greenwich Pensioners, bought by the duke from the artist; and Lanser's

Van Amburgh in the Den with Lions and Tigers—a subject suggested to the painter by the duke himself.

From the "Piccadilly Drawing-room," the visitor passes to the "Drawing-room,"—a large apartment, deriving its chief light from Piccadilly. Here the eye is at first arrested chiefly by four large copies by Bonnemaïson, after Raphael; copies of more than average merit, but not of sufficient importance to detain the eye already in expectation of seeing an original Correggio. The ladies are detained here by two Sèvres vases presented to the duke by Louis XVIII.; country gentlemen by The Melton Hunt, by Mr. Grant, the Royal Academician; and historical students by a small full-length of Napoleon studying the map of Europe—by Hoppner's fine three-quarter portrait of Mr. Pitt (bought at Christie's some eighteen months ago by the duke)—by a clever head of Marshal Soult—and by a characteristic likeness of the duke's old favorite friend, the late Mr. Arbuthnot. The great hero, it will be seen, was somewhat universal in his love for art, and a little whimsical in the way in which he hangs La Madonna del Pesce by Grant's Melton Hunt and Landseer's Highland Whiskey Still.

From the "Drawing-room" the visitor enters "the Picture-gallery,"—the principal apartment in the house. In this room the annual banquet on the 18th of June was held:—the duke occupying the centre of the room, with his back to the park, and his face to the fireplace,—over which is hung a large and fair contemporary copy of the Wind-sor Charles I. on horseback. Here are seen the king of Sweden's present of two fine vases of Swedish porphyry, standing modestly at the side; while in the centre are two noble candelabras of Russian porphyry—a present from the Emperor Nicholas. The walls (before we speak of the pictures, for we must write for upholsterers and milliners now and then) are hung with yellow—the ceiling is richly ornamented and gilt—and the furniture throughout is yellow. The pictures—the true decorations of the room—are not seen, as we have said, to advantage, though hung with judgment as far as size and general harmony are concerned. In this room is the "Jew's-eye" of the collection, the little Correggio, Christ on the Mount of Olives—the most celebrated specimen of the master in this country. It is on panel; and a copy, thought to be the original till the duke's picture appeared, is now in the National Gallery. This exquisite work of art, in which the light, as in the Notte, proceeds from the Saviour, was captured in Spain, in the carriage of Joseph Bonaparte—restored by the captor to Ferdinand II.—but, with others, under like circumstances, again presented to the duke by that sovereign. Next in excellence after the single Correggio are the examples of Velasquez—chiefly portraits, but how fine! something between Vandyke and Rembrandt. The best specimen, however, which the duke possessed of this great Spanish master is not a portrait, but a common subject, The Water Seller, treated uncommonly and yet properly. The duke, unlike Marshal Soult, had no Murillos. After the specimens of Velasquez we would place a fine half-length of a female holding a wreath, by Titian. Two small examples of Claude at the Piccadilly end seemed promising, but we were not able to get near enough to speak decisively of their merits. Specimens of Teniers and Jan Steen are both numerous and good in this room; and there is a small Adrian Ostade, which would ornament a better collection than the duke pretended to possess. The duke, it should be remembered, did not profess dilettanteism or seek to be thought a collector. The pictures at Apsley House are either chance acquisitions abroad, commissions to artists, or portraits of Napoleon, of his own officers, his own family and friends. In this room, at the north end, is a marble bust of Pauline Bonaparte, by Canova—a present to the duke from the artist, as appears by the inscription on its back.

From the gallery, the visitor now enters the back of the building, with its windows looking northward, past the statue of Achilles, and up Park Lane. Here are two rooms—the "Small Drawing-room" and the "Striped Drawing-room"—both filled with portraits of all sizes. Here is Wilkie's full length of William IV. (his much finer full-length of George IV. in his Highland dress is not shown); four full lengths by Lawrence, of the Marquis Wellesley, Marquis of Anglesea, Lord Beresford, and Lord Lynedoch; Beechey's three-quarter portrait of Nelson, inferior to the portraits of the same hero by Abbott and Hoppner; two good portraits, head-size, by Hoppner, of the late Lord Cowley and Lady Charlotte Greville; and a three-quarter portrait of the duke's sister as a gypsy, with a child on her back, by, if we remember rightly, either Owen or Hoppner. We were too far off on this occasion to pronounce with greater precision on the subject. The other attractions of these two back rooms are, Gambardella's hard-painted portrait of the present "Duchess of Wellington," and a large picture, by Sir William Allan, of the Battle of Waterloo, with Napoleon in the foreground, bought from the painter by the duke himself, with this remark, that it was "good, very good—not too much smoke." A full-length portrait of "Napoleon" in the "Small Drawing-room" would, if we remember rightly, well repay a closer inspection.

From the "Striped Drawing-room" the visitor descends by a back-staircase into the rooms immediately below the Picture-gallery. Here is the "China-room,"—not rich in Delft, or China, or Chelsea, or Dresden ware, but boasting a most elegant and exquisite blue and gold service, that many a lady will linger over with eyes of admiration. Here, too, is Stothard's "Wellington Shield," in gold, presented to the duke in 1822 by the merchants and bankers of London; and here is the silver Plateau presented by the regent of Portugal. A few good busts in bronze crown the cases containing these elegant and costly gifts.

From this little El Dorado of handsome things the visitor passes first to the "Secretary's Room,"—then to the "Duke's Private Room,"—and, lastly, to the "Duke's Bedroom;"—all three on the ground-floor, facing the garden that skirts Park Lane and the public footway through Hyde Park from the duke's house to Chesterfield Gate. These three rooms open on one another, and the arrangements in all three are in every respect the same as when they were last used by the illustrious duke.

The "Secretary's Room" wears the appearance of a room belonging to a man of business, and a methodical man, who is secretary to a great man. The duke's own room is just what one expected the duke's room to be like:—lined with bookcases; filled with red-covered despatch-boxes; having a red-morocco reading-chair; a second chair; a desk to stand and write at; a glass screen to keep the cold away and not conceal the books and papers behind it; tables covered with papers, and a few portraits. The portraits here are fewer in number than we had imagined. Here are two engravings of the duke himself, framed, and leaning against a sofa—one when young, the other when old (D'Ossay's is the old portrait); a small drawing of the Countess of Jersey, by Cosway; a full-length over the fireplace, with on one side of it a medallion of the present Duchess of Wellington, and on the other a corresponding medallion of Jenny Lind.

A narrow passage to the east leads to the "Duke's Bedroom,"—a small, shapeless, ill-lighted room, with a rather common, mahogany, young person's bedstead, surmounted by a tent-like curtain of green silk. Neither feather-bed nor eider-down pillow gave repose to the victor of Waterloo and the writer of the Despatches. This illustrious and rich man was almost as humble in his wants in this way as Charles XII. of Sweden. The iron duke,

What though his eightieth year was by,
was content with a mattress and a bolster.
The present Duke of Wellington—the future owner of Apsley House—will, we trust, keep the rooms in which the great duke lived and slept, much, if not precisely, as they are now. The sitting-room and bedroom might certainly be kept intact; and if thus kept, with what interest will they continue to be looked on by millions yet to be born! Abbotsford is kept unchanged,—and thousands flock to see the romance in stone and lime raised by the Ariosto of the north. The bedroom of Byron at Newstead is preserved just as Byron left it,—with colored prints of Harrow School and Trinity College, Cambridge, hanging on its wall as they were placed there by the poet himself. What would Englishmen subscribe to restore New Place, at Stratford, as Shakespeare left it on the 23d of April, 1616? Who would not "call up" Pope's villa if he could? Nothing remains of Nelson's house at Merton. The choice contents of Strawberry Hill—those true illustrations of Walpole's writings—were scattered under the ruthless hammer of George Robins. The vigorous exertions of a few men have saved Shakespeare's birthplace from being sawn into snuff-boxes, knife-handles and tobacco-stoppers. Will not, then, the present Duke of Wellington preserve to us his father's study and his father's bedroom?

WRITTEN NEAR THE SEA.

BY THE LADY EMMELINE STUART WORTLEY.

THE Sea sounds with a mighty sound,
And it never seems at rest;
Like a haughty man that frets and chafes,
With a mountain on his breast—
Some sharp remorse—some stern regret,
By which he groans oppressed.

Yet the Sea turns never from the sun—
It glasses yon glad sky,
And those fair flowers of the heavens—the stars,
On his rough heart they lie;
But Man, proud Man, frowns these away,
When he groans with fiery sigh.

Man!—like the Sea, even while you moan,
Glass back the eternal stars,
Let the heavens lie against your heart
Through all its coil and cares,
And Hope's mild halcyons yet shall come
To charm away its jars.

Man!—when this Earth's dull cares assail,
Cling not to Earth the more;
Nor, groaning, let your mournful thoughts
Turn the theme o'er and o'er.
Immortal are yon lights that cheer—
Mortal all you deplore!

From the Ladies' Companion.

AN ANECDOTE OF MRS. RADCLIFFE.

TOWARDS the middle of the year 1795, a short time after the deplorable affair of Quiberon, an English lady was taken prisoner just as she was entering France by the Swiss frontier. Her knowledge of French was limited to a few mispronounced words. An interpreter was soon found, and upon his interrogating her as to her motives for attempting so perilous an enterprise without passport, she replied that she had exposed herself to all these dangers for the purpose of visiting the chateau where the barbarous Sieur de Fayel had made Gabriella de Vergy eat the heart of her lover. Such a declaration appeared so ridiculous to those who heard it that they were compelled to doubt either the sanity or the veracity of the strange being who ventured upon it. They chose to do the latter, and forwarded the stranger to Paris, with a strong escort, as an English spy. Upon her arrival there, she was safely deposited in the Conciergerie.

Public feeling just then ran very high against the English. The country-woman of Pitt was loaded with ill-usage; and her terrors, expressed in a singular jargon of English mingled with broken French, served but to augment the coarse amusement of her jailers. After exhausting every species of derision and insult upon their prisoner, they ended by throwing her into the dampest and most inconvenient dungeon they could find. The door of this den was not more than four feet high; and the light, that dimly revealed the dripping walls and earthen floor, came through a horizontal opening four inches in height by fifteen in width. The sole movables of the place consisted of a rope pallet and a screen.

The bed served for both couch and chair; the screen was intended as a partial barrier between the inhabitant of the dungeon and the curious gaze of the jailers stationed in the adjoining apartment, who could scrutinize at will, through a narrow opening between the cells, the slightest movements of their prisoner.

The stranger recoiled with disgust, and asked whether they had not a less terrible place in which to confine a woman.

"You are very bad to please, madame," replied her brutal jailer, mimicking her defective French. "You are in the palace of Madame Capet."

And shutting behind him the massive door, barricaded with plates of iron and secured by three or four rusty bolts, he left her to repeat his joke to his companions, and enjoy with them the consternation of Madame Rosbif.

Meanwhile the prisoner fell upon her knees, and gazed around her with a species of pious emotion.

"What right have I," she cried, "to complain of being cast into this dungeon, once inhabited by the Queen of France—the beautiful, the noble Marie Antoinette? I sought food for my imagination; I undertook a journey to France to visit the most celebrated sojourns of the most celebrated individuals. Fortune has come to my aid. Here is what is better than the chateau of the Sieur de Fayel, and the terrible history of the bleeding heart. Never did a grander inspiration overflow my spirit. I will to work."

She drew from her pocket a small roll of paper, that had escaped the scrutiny of the jailers; and, passing her hand across her forehead, approached the horizontal opening, in order to make the most of the little remainder of daylight; then, taking out a pencil, she rapidly covered ten or twelve pages with microscopic characters in close lines. The increasing darkness at length compelled her to pause, and she was refolding the MS. to replace it in her pocket, when a rude hand snatched it from her grasp.

"Ah! ah! Madame Rosbif," cried the jailer triumphantly, "so you believe yourself at liberty to scribble away here, hatching plots against the Republic, and holding intelligence with the enemies of the nation. Nous verrons cela! These papers shall be remitted this very day to Monsieur Tallien, and we well know all about this new attack upon liberty. Entendez-vous? miserable agent of Pitt and Cobourg!"

The same evening Tallien received the stranger's manuscript. Being unacquainted with the English language, he rang for his secretary; but the latter was nowhere at hand, so the puzzled minister took the papers and proceeded to his wife's apartments.

Madame Tallien was just completing her toilet for a fancy ball. Leaning forward in a graceful attitude, she was in the act of twining round her slender ankle the fastenings of a purple buskin. Her Grecian tunic, simply clasped upon the shoulder with diamonds, and her hair knotted like that of the Polyhymnia of the Louvre, harmonized admirably with the classical contour of her features. Monsieur Tallien, as he gazed upon her, half-forgot his errand.

The lady uttered a little cry of surprise.

"Upon what grave errand has Monsieur deigned to favor me with a visit at this unaccustomed hour?"

"I have here some papers," replied the minister, "that have been seized upon the person of a female spy, and are said to contain proofs of a dangerous conspiracy. They are written in English; my secretary is absent; and I must ask you to do me the favor to translate them to me."

Madame Tallien took the MS., and looked it over.

"Shall I read aloud?" said she, in an amused tone of voice.

Her husband assented.

"The wind howls mournfully through the foliage, and the descending rain falls in torrents. The terrors of my prison become every instant more fearful. Phantoms arise on every side, and wave their snowy winding-sheets. Misfortune, with her cold and pitiless hand, weighs heavily on my youthful brow."

"Thus spoke the lovely prisoner, as she groped with her trembling hands over the humid walls of the dungeon."

"Here is a singular conspiracy truly," said Madame Tallien, as she finished reading the above. "Let me see the envelope; 'Chapter xii. The Dungeon of the Chateau.' And the authoress' name. 'Anne Radcliffe.' Vite citoyen. Set this woman at liberty, and bring her to me. Your spy is no other than the great English romance-writer, the celebrated authoress of the 'Mysteries of Udolpho!'"

Tallien now recalled the romantic intention of the stranger's hazardous journey, as confessed by herself; perceived the mistake of his agents, and laughed heartily. Going quickly out, he issued orders for the immediate liberation of the prisoner, and desired the messenger to bring her straight to the presence of Madame Tallien.

Meanwhile, the beautiful Frenchwoman, forgetting her toilet and the hall, paced the apartment with almost childish delight and impatience. She was about to make the acquaintance — in a manner the most piquant and unexpected — of the authoress of those romances which had so often filled her vivid imagination with ideas of apparitions, and prisoners dying of hunger in horrible dungeons. She consulted her watch perpetually, and counted the very seconds. At length there was a sound of carriage-wheels in the courtyard of the hotel. Madame Tallien rushed to the door; it opened, and the two celebrated females stood face to face.

The minister's wife could not avoid recoiling with surprise, and some degree of consternation, before the singular figure that paused in the open doorway; for Mrs. Radcliffe had stopped short, dazzled and bewildered by the lights of the saloon, which wounded eyes accustomed for some hours past to the humid obscurity of a dungeon. The English authoress presented a striking contrast to the radiant being before her. Dry, cold, and angular, her attire necessarily in some degree of disorder from her arrest, forced journey, and imprisonment, her whole aspect had in it something bizarre and fantastic, that added to her age at least ten years.

A little recovered from her first surprise, Madame Tallien advanced towards the stranger, gave her a cordial welcome in English, and told her how happy she esteemed herself in having been the means of setting at liberty so celebrated an authoress. The Englishwoman made a polite reply to this compliment, and then they seated themselves before the fire, whose clear flame and vivifying heat were very welcome to the liberated prisoner, and quickly restored an activity of mind that appeared to have been benumbed by the coldness of her dungeon. The ensuing conversation was gay, piquant, full of charm and abandon, and was only interrupted by the orders given by Madame Tallien to her femme de chambre to send the carriage away, and deny her to all visitors.

Mrs. Radcliffe had travelled much, and related her adventures with grace and originality. Hours flew by unheeded, and the Englishwoman was in the very midst of some bold enterprise of her journey in Switzerland, when the timepiece struck twelve. She turned pale, and a visible shuddering seized her. Then pausing in her tale, she looked wildly and fearfully around, as if following the movements of some invisible being. Madame Tallien, struck with a species of vague terror, dared not address a single word to her visitor. The latter at length abruptly rose, opened the door, and with an imperative gesture ordered some one by the name of Henry to leave the room, after which she appeared to experience a sudden relief.

The lovely Frenchwoman, with the tact of real kindness, appeared not to notice this strange incident, and the new-made friends soon after separated, Madame Tallien herself conducting her guest to the apartment provided for her, where she took leave of her with an affectionate "au revoir!"

The following evening Mrs. Radcliffe appeared in her hostess' saloon, as soon as the latter had signified that she was ready to receive her. Calm and composed, habited à la Française, the English romancist appeared ten years younger than she had done the evening before, and was even not without a certain degree of beauty. She said not a word on the scene of the preceding evening; was gay, witty, amiable, and took an animated part in the conversation that followed. But as soon as the minute-hand of the time-piece pointed at half-past eleven, her color fled, a shade of pensiveness replaced her former gaiety and a few moments afterwards she took her leave of the company.

The same thing happened the next day, and every ensuing evening. Madame Tallien could not avoid a feeling of curiosity, but she had too much politeness to question the stranger confided to her hospitality. In this way a month elapsed, at the end of which time Mrs. Radcliffe could not avoid expressing, one evening when she found herself alone with her new friend, her disappointment at being detained a prisoner in France, without the power of returning to her own country. Upon this Madame Tallien rose, took a paper from a desk, and handed it to the Englishwoman. It was a passport, dated from the same evening that Mrs. Radcliffe had been liberated from her dungeon.

"Since you wish to leave your French friends," said her lovely hostess smiling, "go, ingrate!"

"Oh no, not ungrateful!" replied the authoress, taking the beautiful hands of her friend and carrying them to her lips; "but the year is fast waning, and a solemn duty recalls me to my native land. In the churchyard of a poor village near London are two tombs, which I visit each Christmas-day with flowers and prayers. If I return not before then, this will be the first time for five years that they have been neglected. You already know all my other secrets," she continued, lowering her voice; "it is my intention to confide this secret also to your friendly ears." Passing her hand across her brow, the Englishwoman then proceeded to relate a strange and tragic tale, for the particulars of which we have not space in our limited sketch. Suffice it to say, that it had left our authoress subject to a distressing and obdurate spectral illusion. In the reality of this appearance she firmly believed, not having sufficient knowledge of science to attribute her visitation to its true origin — a partial disarrangement of the nervous system. This visitation regularly recurring at midnight, and at once accounted for the singular behavior that had so piqued the benevolent Frenchwoman's curiosity.

Mrs. Radcliffe now returned to London, where she shortly afterwards published "The Italian; or the Confessional of the Black Penitents."

We can, in our day, realize to ourselves very little of the effect produced by Anne Radcliffe's romances at the time of their appearance. All the contemporary critics agree in testifying to their immense success, only inferior to that of the Waverley novels in more recent times. Now they appear nothing more than the efflux of a morbid imagination, full of hallucinations and absurdities, and insufferably tedious to our modern tastes, accustomed to the condensed writing of the present day. Their unconnected plots are nevertheless not altogether devoid of a certain sort of interest, and are fraught with picturesque situations and melodramatic surprises. The living characters therein introduced present few natural features. We recognize everywhere the caprices of an unbridled fancy, and a prevailing vitiation of sense and taste.

Anne Radcliffe died near London, on the 7th February, 1823, at the age of 63. The "New Monthly Magazine," for May of that year, announces her decease, and affirms that her death was accompanied by singular visions, which had pursued her ever since a romantic event of her youth.

SOULS' DISUNION.

BY CHARLES H. HITCHINGS.

Yes! we are severed wide apart,
So close as still we seem to be —
Severed while bound heart fast to heart
In mute conformity.
And sad it is to feel and know
To mortals never yet was given
To dwell, two souls in one, below,
Or shall be, save in heaven.
It is but by a common bond
We seem to grow so near, so near —
The same hope in a bright beyond —
The same enjoyments here;
The same sweet thoughts that wing their way
To the same sweet happy home of rest,
That bids us fold from day to day
Each to each other's breast.
'T is but our poor, imperfect speech,
Our eyes but half-revealing shine,
That prompts the pleasant lie to each
"His thoughts are e'en as mine."
Unfathomed depths in either soul
Full of stern discords still remain,
Hid in that seeming perfect whole
Enough to render twain.
Souls strung in life must ever be
Each to its own peculiar tone,
Till death shall strike the master-key,
And all be tuned to one.

Then in that deathless choir above
Our hearts unisonal shall join,
Merged in one symphony of love,
Beyond all mine and thine.

THE NEW-COMER.

A POEM FOR MOTHERS ONLY.

THE hour arrives, the moment wished and feared,
The child is born, by many a pang endeared;
And now the mother's ear has caught his cry;
Oh! grant the cherub to her asking eye!
He comes, she clasps him, to her bosom pressed,
He drinks the balm of life, and drops to rest.
She, by her smile, how soon the stranger knows;
How soon by his the glad discovery shows!
As to her lips she lifts the lovely boy,
What answering looks of sympathy and joy!
He walks — he speaks — in many a broken word,
His wants, his wishes, and his griefs are heard;
And ever, ever, to her lap he flies,
Where rosy sleep comes on with sweet surprise,
Locked in her arms, his arms across her flung,
That name most dear forever on his tongue.
As with soft accents round her neck he clings,
And cheek to cheek her lulling song she sings,
How blest to feel the beating of his heart,
Breathe his sweet breath, and kiss for kiss impart,
Watch o'er his slumbers, like the brooding dove,
And if she can, exhaust a mother's love!

JOHN RINTOUL; OR, THE FRAGMENT OF THE WRECK.

PART I. — CHAPTER I.

"It's a' because ye will have your own gate. What ails ye to stay ae night langer at hame! Black March weather, and no a star in the sky; and me your married wife, John Rintoul!"

"Eh, Euphie, woman!"

John Rintoul made no other answer; but scratched his black head dubiously, and throwing one wistful glance at his pretty wife, as she gathered herself up in her elbow-chair, cast another at the window, through which the lowering sky, without, met him with an answering frown. The wind was whistling wildly round the point, which deprived the waves in Elie bay of their full share of the turmoil without; but even here, sheltered though it was, the roll of the surf on the shore sounded like a perpetual cannonade; and the dark sky lowered upon the dark water, with only the fierce crest of a wave, or the breast of some benighted sea-mew, desperately fluttering to its nest, to break the universal blackness of the storm.

Scarcely the breadth of an ordinary street interposes between this window and the high-water mark to which these waves have reached to-night. The room has a boarded floor, very clean and white, just brightened here and there with a faint trace of the golden sand which Captain Rintoul crushes under his heel, as he sways himself between his wife's chair and the window. The twilight is slowly darkening into night—all the earlier for this squall; and the fire-light leaps about all the corners, throwing a brilliant illumination upon the bed before it, with its magnificent patchwork quilt, and curtains of red and white linen. At the foot of the bed, the chest of drawers stands solemnly, conscious of its own importance, supporting, with sober dignity, the looking-glass, and the family Bible, and two or three of the grandest shells. Between it and the door, gravely discoursing with those fugitive moments whose course it tells, the eight-day clock, sagacious and self-absorbed, glorifies the wall with the carvings of its mahogany case. There is a small round table—mahogany too, with a raised ledge round it, like the edge of a tray—in the middle of the room. On ordinary occasions this table stands in a corner, tilted up into the perpendicular, for display, and not for use; but to-night Mrs. Rintoul has had a solemn tea, and her table, in all its magnificence, has been doing service, as on a very great occasion, though only a family party have assembled round it. One still sits by it, playing abstractedly with its carved rim. You can see his blue sailor-dress, his short black curls, and how his face is half-turned towards Agnes Raeburn by the fireside yonder; but a brown hand, well formed, though scarred and weatherbeaten, supports his forehead, and the face itself is in shadow.

Mrs. Rintoul sitting there, half-angry, half-crying, in her elbow-chair—at present convinced that she has said something unanswerable—was Euphie Raeburn a year ago, the belle and toast of Elie. The fire lights up her pretty self-willed face, with its full red pouting lips and flushed cheeks, and the soft flaxen hair, which hangs in short thick curls just under her brow. She is only two-and-twenty, an acknowledged beauty, a wife whose husband is very proud of her—as Euphie herself feels he has good reason to be—and, crowning glory of all, a young mother, whom every one has been petting, and nursing, and humoring, since ever little Johnnie came home—after all, only a month ago. Little Johnnie lies on her knee, his long white frock sweeping over the arm of her chair; and she herself has still something of the state and dignity of an invalid. No wonder that tears of vexation and impatience glitter in Euphie's eyes, and that a flat contradiction of her will seems an impossible thing to John.

So he stands between the window and the table, rubbing his fingers through his short black hair, and swaying on one heel helplessly. John Rintoul, sailing long voyages for ten good years, and being the most frugal of good sailors all the time, is rich enough now to call himself joint-owner of the strong little sloop which rocks yonder on the troubled water at Elie pier. Joint-owner with Samuel Raeburn, his father-in-law, writing himself captain of the "Euphemia," and having his own father, an old, respectable fisherman, and Patrick, his young brother, for his crew. They are to sail to the Baltic in a day or two from Anster, another little town a few miles down the Firth; and John had made up his mind to proceed so far to-night.

"It's no canny sailing at night," said Agnes from the corner. "Stay at hame, John, lad, when Euphie wants you—what's the good of vexing Euphie!—and ye can sail the morn's morning, when the blast's by."

"Gin the morn's morning were here, ye would wile him to bide till the morn's night," said a deep voice from the window. "I'm no the man to vex a woman—specially a bit creature like Euphie there; but I've brought him up a' his days never to gang back of his word, and I canna change my counsel noo. John, you're captain, and I'm naething but foremast Jack; but if you're no coming, I'll step down to the sloop myself — the wind 'll be on afore we round the point, if ye're no a' the cleverer."

"Eh, my patience, hear till him!" exclaimed Euphie, "as if the wind hadna been on; and routing like a' the beasts in the wood, for twa guid hours and mair!"

There was no answer; but the dark figure in the recess of the window shut out the faint lingerings of daylight as the experienced father examined the sky — and Euphie lifted up her infant to its sorely-tempted father, and Paite Rintoul, under the shelter of his hand, cast sidelong glances at Agnes. Free of all responsibility in the matter, the youth waited for his orders — and John himself, captain and superior as he was, strong in the old filial reverence which the fisher patriarch had done nothing to lessen, waited for his father's decision with an anxiety which he scarcely could conceal.

"I never gang back o' my word," said the old man at length, slowly; "I've been kent by that sign as far as the northmost fisher town that ever sent boats to a drave; but your mother at hame has kent me coming and gaun this forty years guid, and nae miscarriage, the Lord being bountiful; and I've faced a waur nicht than this, baith on the Firth and the open sea. Is't the year out, Euphie, my woman, since John and you were married?"

"No till a week come the morn," said Euphie, with a little sob, "and that was what I wanted him to bide for, to haud the day."

"Weel, weel — ye'll haud the day yet mony a blithe year," said the old man with prophetic gravity, "and ye're no to take the first aye as an ill sign, if it's no so cheerie as it might be; — but I mind it's the auld law that a man should bide and comfort his wife till the year's dune; and as Euphie is so sair set against ye sailing the nicht, for a' ye passed your word to Baile Tod to take in your lading the morn — if ye take my counsel, you'll stay at hame, John, and I'll be caution for the sloop that naething but the will of Providence keeps it out of Anster harbor this nicht; ye can come east on your ain feet, and join us the morn."

"Eh, John, ye'll bide now!" cried Euphie, eagerly — her anxiety did not reach so far as to tremble for the safety of the first John Rintoul.

"It's very guid of ye, father," said the captain with hesitation, "and I'm sure I would have nae man gang for me where I was feared to gang myself; but it's no for the nicht, you see — I dinna care a button for the nicht; it's a' Euphie, there; she's but a bit delicate thing, that's had her ain gate a' her days; and I dinna ken what glamour's on me — I canna gang against her."

"Nae occasion — nae occasion, John," said the old man, shortly; "I maun be stepping myself; good night, lad — ye'll get nae ill of pleasuring your wife. Patie, I would like ye to gie a look in, and see your mother. I took fareweel of her myself, an hour ago; but I'll gang by the door with ye, on the road to the sloop. Euphie, ye'll be guid to a'boddy, and mind your duty, the time we're away; you're no a young lassie noo, ye ken — you're a married wife, with a house to keep, and bairns to bring up, godly and soberly — guid nicht to ye, my woman; and fare-ye-weel, bairnie, and God send ye grow up to be a comfort. Nancy, lass, fare-ye-weel; it's a ge y long voyage we're sailing on — an auld man may never see ye a', young things and blithe, again."

He had stepped out into the full glow of the firelight, an old man, rugged and weather-beaten. It was not necessary to see him first in Elie kirk, in his Sabbath dress, and with his grave, slow movements and reverent face, to understand the place he had reached among his fellows — Elder John — not without a solemn consciousness of the weight of office, a respect for the eldership in his own person, a conscious responsibility in all matters where advice seemed called for, and a little tendency to "improve" events for his own edification, as well as for the use of listeners. A personage in his appearance — old age, and storm, and trial, adding a certain homely dignity to the form and stature, which in earlier manhood were famous for nothing but strength — old John Rintoul had a visible will and energy about him, which gained expression in every word and step, in every emphatic motion of his head, and deliberate syllable of his speech. Honorable and upright beyond suspicion, as tenacious of the respect belonging to his humble name as if it had been a duke's, and unused for many a year to veil his bonnet to any created mortal, unless on chance occasions, or on questions exclusively belonging to their sphere — to the minister and the goodwife — only one or two other men in Elie held such a position as John Rintoul, fisherman though he was. His heavy eyebrows, reddish, but deeply grizzled, his furrowed brow and patriarchal locks and solemn, deliberate speech, not without its pomp of stately words, were in perfect keeping with each other. So were the profound religious feelings, strong enough to startle into touching meekness and humility, on extreme occasions, a spirit by nature and habit proud, and the deep, unacknowledged, undemonstrated tenderness lying at the bottom of his heart.

Such as grave livers do in Scotland use,

They gathered round him with something like awe, as he stood in the firelight bidding them fareweel, and Euphie bent over her baby to hide the chill presentiment which his words brought over her; and Agnes watched his moving lips with dilated eyes, full of tears, which she was afraid to shed. Then his hard, strong hand grasped theirs successively — then the sand upon the floor crashed under his heavy footstep — the door opened and closed, admitting a sudden blast; and John Rintoul and his youngest child, the Benjamin of his heart, went out into the storm.

CHAPTER II.

Early darkness, shutting in gradually, one by one, the pale streaks of sky in the west — out seaward, an unbroken gloom already settling upon the western point of Elie bay, like a wall of defence against the advancing storm, and lines of deadly white running out here and there upon the Firth, like the pale horse of the prophet — a fierce March wind chafing itself to passion here, among the few trees which skirt the suburbs of the little town, and leaping forth with a loud howl like a hungry wolf to join its brother madmen on the sea — a rush of waters close at hand, the angry surf of Elie shore, and a distant groan, more ominous still, telling how they fight upon the unprotected rocks, along the coast where the sloop must take its journey. The spray comes up dashing upon Patie Rintoul's face, as they leave his brother's door. The young sailor puts up his hand quietly to wipe it away. His heart is absorbed, beholding the little figure in the fireside corner, and meditating how he can steal away from Anster harbor in to-morrow's gloaming, to say another good-by to Agnes before he goes to sea. But to-night's voyage does not trouble Patie, for these waves have been his playthings since his earliest remembrance, when he himself slowly woke into consciousness, sitting in the sunshine with a great stone in his lap to keep his little baby figure upright, while his mother baited the lines, and his father put on his sea-going gear, in preparation for "the drive."

But the stately step of old John Rintoul falters a little on the stony road. Strange, solemn fancies come into his mind, whether he will or no; and, with a singular, intense excitement, he thinks he sees little figures of children beckoning to him from the low black rocks, or out of the tawny surf of the advancing sea. "Willie, Mary, little Nelly," murmurs the old man unawares; and then, gradually waking up, he passes his hand over his eyes, to put away the mist out of which these little figures have sprung; but still there is something glistening under his heavy folded eyelids, and his heart repeats, out of the deep love and sorrow which cannot desert the dead infants of his house, these names of his children who have "gone before."

Why does he think of them now? Willie, had he lived, would have been a man, nearly forty years old to-day; but his father sees him, and yearns over him, in his little white night-gown and close cap — the first-born, the beginning of his strength. It is the living who have faded into shadows. Even Patie here, whom they call the father's favorite at home, becomes as indistinct and remote as John whom they have left — and the old man's heart is with the little children, the blossoms of his youth.

"It's the wean that's put them in my head — it's the wean that's put them in my head," says the old man, half aloud, and his eyes are full of tears.

But Patie, meanwhile, with his heart wrapped in a soft twilight of its own, walks silently by his father's side, a very world apart from all his father's dreamings. The love-charm is strong on Patie; and all the songs that heart of man has woven for itself, to give its youthful rapture utterance, are chiming through his fascinated mind. Far from him, and invisible, is the spiritual world from which angels come to minister; for the earth, always young, thrills with warm life to the youth's every breath and footstep, and his heart beats high with sweet, inarticulate joy, and grows breathless with sweeter hope.

Father! father! little hands seem to clasp your fingers — little, gentle touches come upon you, and small white figures beckon, and voices call out of the night, out of the storm, floating away like fairy music into the unseen sea. What brings these heaven-departed children out of the Master's presence, and over all this lifetime of years — what brings them here to-night?

"And the sloop's no sailed yet — and my man and my two sons to gang down the Firth this night," said Christian Beatoun, John Rintoul's wife, as she stood at her door, looking out. "Ye needna speak to me, Allie; I ken of as many kind providences and preservations as ony man's wife in the hail town; but it's owre precious a freight — far owre precious a freight. Ye're ill enough yoursel when ye have ane in peril, and it's nae good, John or you either telling me; for do I no ken it's clean tempting of Providence to trust a hail family, and a' ae pair creature has in the world, to ae boat? Eh, woman, it's easy speaking; but losing ane would be losing a', if it was the Lord's pleasure to send such a judgment on me."

"Ye're meaning, ye can trust Him with ane, but ye canna trust Him with a', Kirstin," answered her sister-in-law, somewhat severely. Ailie Rintoul had all the harsher features of her brother John, and was of less visible kindness — a childless wife, too, wanting the mother's manifold experiences.

But Kirstin only wrung her hands and repeated, "Eh, woman, it's easy speaking!"

Her husband and her son were approaching just then the little triangular corner in which her house stood—it was out of the direct way to the shore, and the old man hesitated at the angle of the street.

"I bade your mother fareweel an hour ago," he said, half within himself, "and yet some way I canna pass the door. She's been a guid wife to me this five-and-forty year—Kirstin, poor woman! I would like to see her face again, whatever may happen; and if the Lord spares me to come hame—"

The old man turned the corner abruptly, all unobserved by the happy, absorbed Patie, who was still too much engrossed with his own fancies to perceive his father's.

"Is't you back again, John?" exclaimed Kirstin. "You'll no be gaun to sail the night!"

"I came for naething but a freit," said the old man; "just a bairnly fancy in my ain mind, and to bring Patie to say fareweel to his mother. I'm for away this very minute, Kirstin; theither man is sure to be waiting on us in the sloop, and I've gien John my word to take her on to Anster; he's to join us there, the morn; ye'll see him before he leaves the Elie. Now, my woman, fare-weel ance mair. I'll aye uphaud ye've been a guid wife to me, Kirstin, Beatoun, if it was the last words I had to say, and the Lord gie ye your recompense in His ain time—though I dinna need to tell you that such a thing as recompense comesna frae our merits, but His mercies. I canna tell what's come ower me the night; my mind's aye rinnin on little Willie and Mary, and the rest of the bairns that's departed. But fare-ye-weel, Kirstin, ance for a'—and pit ye aye your trust in the Lord, and wait to see what an ill Providence is to bring forth, before you let your heart repine—noo, I maun away."

"John, you're meaning something," cried his wife, anxiously; "you're wanting to break some misfortune to me!"

"No me—no me!" said the old man. "I'm no just sure what I mean mysel; but ye'll mind it, Kirstin, and it'll come clear some time. Fare-ye-weel, Ailie—fareweel to ye a'. I maun away to the sloop. I've sailed mony a coarser night, and never thought twice about it."

Saying this, with a prompt and ready step, as of one whose mind was disburdened, John Rintoul went his way. His wife followed him for a few steps, eagerly directing his attention to the storm; but the storm was checked by a momentary lull, and the clouds breaking overhead, gave a glimpse of a tragic moon climbing these gloomy heights from point to point. The sailor's wife received her son's farewell with a relieved heart, and returned to the door, from which she could watch them as they hastened to their little vessel. She was too much accustomed to such departures to think of remonstrating and weeping like the impatient Euphie, and her fears were calmed by the lessening violence of both winds and waves.

CHAPTER III.

The fire is trimmed, the hearth swept, the lamp, high and remote, burns solitarily for its own forlorn enjoyment, over the lofty mantel-shelf, and the little circle round the fire-side is silent, listening with various musings to the subdued sound of the wind without, and the murmur of the sea.

The baby has fallen asleep softly on the bosom of the young mother; she is bending her face over him, half in shadow—rosy shadow, warm and glowing—and touching gently with delicate fingers, now his little clenched hand, now his downy infant cheek. The awe with which her father-in-law's farewell filled her has faded from the light heart of Euphie; but she has fallen instead into the stillness of a dream.

A year ago Euphie Raeburn dreamed romances—dreamed distinct histories, full of joyous events, and words that made her heart beat; and you almost could have read them then in the absorbed eye glimmering under its drooped lid, in the soft cheek flushing under the pressure of her supporting hand, and in the hasty, scarce-drawn breath of the half-closed lips. But sweetly now the calm breath comes and goes upon the baby's brow, and over all her fair face lies such a shadow of repose, such a full, unspeakable content, as might charm all fear and danger out of sight of this new home. The little eyes are closed, the little lips apart—one small hand clenched upon the baby's breast, the other resting on the mother's—and Euphie's heart broods over her child, dwelling here in love and rest unspeakable—no longer busy with imagined scenes, or needing words to give her gladness vent, but her whole being possessed and overflowing with delicious quietness and repose.

And the father sits before the fire, leaning his elbow on his knee, and his head on his hand, gradually lengthening the tender looks he casts upon Euphie and her child, and suffering himself to be slowly beguiled out of the uneasiness which has already begun to disappear from his face. It is not the storm that brings upon John Rintoul's brow its look of troubled, restless fear; for himself he would heed the storm little, and it seems to be dying away into a long sighing gale, whistling about the low, strong walls, and chafing the waters still, but powerless for the desperate mischief which alone could make a sailor tremble. A dread of something haunts him—he cannot tell what, nor has it any definite form; but in the silence he is constantly hearing hasty footsteps, as of some one rushing to his door with evil news, and two or three times has started out of his reverie, with far-away sounds, as of voices in distress, ringing into his very heart; but the night goes on noiselessly, the awe and excitement lessen, everything remains as it was — and softening thoughts and tender fancies, and a sensation of something like the same sweet repose which is upon Euphie, steal over the relaxing mind of John.

But Agnes, the youngest of them all, rocks faintly back and forward in her chair with the restless motion of anxiety, and clasps her hands tightly together till the pressure is painful, and fixes her vacant eyes, now upon the window, now upon the fire, with wandering abstraction, starting to every whistle of the wind, but entirely wrapt and unaware of things nearer to her side. Agnes is slightly formed and rather tall, with grave blue eyes, very different from Euphie's, and an abundance of dusky hair of no decided color — and no one has ascribed character or position to Agnes through all her twenty years. She has been an average good girl, doing the usual offices of their humble life — helping her mother, admiring and serving Euphie — having her own little quarrels and jealousies — and to all appearance knowing no emotions deeper than a little wonder, and perhaps a little wounded feeling, at finding herself, among all her young companions, the only one loverless and unfollowed. To tell truth, Agnes Raeburn has nourished considerable pique, and felt herself greatly injured, ruminating over this. Her pride could not bear the neglect easily, and she did not at all appreciate the advantage of being fancy free — at least of being unsought; but a change has befallen her — and never was imperious beauty more haughty in her reception of humble suitor than Agnes has been to Patie Rintoul to-day.

Not that she objects to the bashful homage of Patie, or is at all displeased with his shy glances and reverent attendance — but Agnes has registered a vow, in the intense pride of being neglected, and is resolute to cast off and reject peremptorily her first wooer, whoever he may be.

But her heart is heavy, restless, agitated, she cannot tell why; and she sways herself in her chair, and wrings her hands with unconscious, involuntary emotion. Her mind is constantly going back to the old man's leave-taking, turning his words into every conceivable shape, and drawing all manner of indefinite dreads and terrors out of the tremor of the voice so little given to faltering, and from the glistening of the deep eyes so little used to tears. And it is, after all, a wild, imaginative, impulsive mind, which has dwelt so quietly these twenty years under

Samuel Raeburn's roof — and but a touch is necessary to send it away on an unknown erratic course, and to fill it with all the thronging possibilities and suppositions of fancy. The dark night — the wild sea — the waters sweeping over the little deck — the sails springing wild from their fastenings — the sloop plunging among the furious waves — and Agnes presses her hand on her heart, to still the cry that is bursting from its depths as this picture grows before her. The warm firelight dies away from her eyes — she can only see the ghastly glimmer of the moon on the broken water, and how the surf curls over the glistening rocks, like the foaming lip of a ravenous beast snarling on its prey.

"It's aye bonnie days in April," said Euphie, as her baby, waking from his sleep, roused herself from her happy dreaming over him. "If ye werena so set on your ain will, ane might ask ye never to sail till April, John."

"The sooner we're away, the sooner we'll be hame, Euphie, my woman," said the laconic John.

Euphie shook her head impatiently.

"Ane kens naething about it, when ane's a young lassie," she said, with a mixture of petulance and importance. "It's a' very easy to be phrasing and fleecing then — but when ane's a married wife, and ought to ken about a' the affairs of the family as weel as ony man in the town, and have a right to ane's judgment as weel — the guidman shakes his head — set him up! — and gives a laugh in your face, as guid as to say, 'Haud ye still, bairnie; I ken, and it's nae business of yours.' If I was just like you, Agnes, this night, I would never take a man if I lived a hundred years!"

But John, not unused to such little ebullitions, only stretched out his great finger to be enclosed in the baby's vigorous clasp, and laughed at his impatient wife.

"Naeboddy has ony call to laugh at Euphie," said Agnes, on all occasions the sworn defender of every caprice of her sister. "Euphie's aye had her ain way a' her days — and it's ill your part to gang against her, John Rintoul!"

"Hear reason, woman!" exclaimed the startled John; "when do ever I gang against her? for a' she's the most provoking fairy that ever threw glamour in a man's een. Had her ain way! — and I would like to ken wha it is that has my way too, as muckle as if I was a wee doggie rinnin in a string!"

"See, man, there's your son," said Euphie, thrusting the infant into his father's mighty arms. The argument was irresistible, and John, with a growl of delight, gathered in the little mass of white muslin to his breast, and looked the happiest man in the world.

But Agnes Raeburn sank back into her corner, breathless with fearful fancies — though now her greatest strain of excited listening caught no longer, except in a shrill but not uncheerful whistle, the sound of the calmed wind.

CHAPTER IV.

"It's turned out a fine, light, quiet night after all," said John Rintoul, as he went to the door with his wife's young sister. It was so; but to the excited eyes of Agnes the broad white moonlight, and black depths of shadow, had something weird and fearful still. Nor a creature stirred along the whole extent of the shore; and the slowly-retiring waters in the bay, and their own voices, as they said good night, were the sole interrupting sounds of the deep stillness, unless when now and then a sudden gust of wind rang like a pistol-shot among the echoing rocks.

There was no escort needed for the few steps of the familiar way, and, only pausing a moment to glance again upon the sky, which was not quite so promising to a second look, John Rintoul closed the door, and put up the simple, effectual bar which professed to secure it. Hurrying on, a black shadow in the moonlight, Agnes ran softly past her father's door — past the few remaining houses, till she reached the farthest point of the bay, and breathlessly climbed the high bank to look out upon the sea. Some wild terror of seeing the wreck, even below her feet, possessed her for an instant; but there was nothing but the slowly-vanishing foam, lying white upon the rocks, and the water ebbing gradually, with now and then a desperate backward leap, dashing spray into her very face. The sky was wild and troubled; the moon flying aghast and terrified, as she could fancy, through those black mists which hovered round her, trembling before the heavy pursuing clouds, which hurried upon her track; and the water was still heaving and swelling in its broad channel — a sea to make a landsman shiver. Agnes, born to look upon its different moods without fear, trembled not for it. She could see there was nothing to appall a stout heart, even in the restless swell and dashing spray of the dark Firth before her. But with all her imaginative soul, she shivered, and recoiled, from the forlorn, wan light and terrible blackness — the ghastly and dismal coloring of the night. The wind came creeping about her feet in her exposed standing-ground — creeping with furtive stealth, till it seized her like a secret traitor, and had nearly thrown her down over the steep headland into the surf below; and Agnes drew back with superstitious dread, her heart beating quick against her breast, and her frame thrilling all over with terror. But as far as her anxious eye could reach, up and down the Firth, there was nothing visible but the broad white moonlight and the dark water; not a sail or a mast, to break the depths of black silvered air, between the sea and the sky.

"The sloop's safe in Anster harbor long ago," said Agnes to herself; "and if it's no, there's my men been in mair peril. It's nae concern of mine. Eh, but Kirstin Beaton! she would never haud up her head again, if ill came to John."

And Agnes stole away home, persuading herself that Kirstin Beaton, and no other, was uppermost in her benevolent thoughts; and suffering herself now to tremble with anxiety and fear, and suggest consolations to her own heart, which her own heart refusing to accept, yet could not blame; for she thought of the men in peril, the households that might be desolate, and shut her ears, even while her breast heaved with a long hysterical sob, at some strange fairy whisper of the name of Patie Rintoul.

The evening was ended in Samuel Raeburn's house, and his wife had taken off her cap with the edged borders, and put on a plain, unadorned muslin one, and was secretly untying her apron under her shawl, and making other preparations for rest. The kitten — which all day long had tormented Mrs. Raeburn, ever on the watch for her clue, and remorselessly weaving its thread round all the chairs in the family apartment — now lay confidently at the house-mother's foot, overcome with sleep, like a tired child; and watchful grey-malkin stalked about the corners, with fierce moustache and stealthy footstep, assuring herself, with savage complacency, of the coming darkness, which should call her victims forth to meet their fate. The shutter was up upon the window, the fire gathered, and Samuel Raeburn himself loosed his heavy shoes by the fireside, and bade the goodwife "take heed to that monkey Nanny, that she never was out again so late at e'e."

"Deed, I wouldna have grudged her to bide with Euphie a' night, and the pair left her lane," answered the mother, whose fondness had made a spoiled child of John Rintoul's pretty wife.

"But John's there himsel, mother," said Agnes. "Euphie wouldna hear of him sailing on so coarse a night, and he stayed to please her; and auld John and Patie, and Andrew Dewar, are away to Anster with the sloop."

"And what ailed the skipper to gang wi' her too!" said Samuel. "I never agreed to trust my gear and my boat to auld John. Ye may say he's an elder. I wadna gie a prin for your kirk-officers; and if he was a' the kirk-session, or the hail Assembly to boot, is that to say he's studied navigation and a' the sciences, and is fit to have such a charge! What business has John Rintoul to waste his guid time (especially when it belongs to me as weel as to himsel) for a woman's havers?

I never got biding at hame to please my wife ; and if I'm no as guid a man onny day — "

"Ye never tried, Samuel," interrupted his wife, in a tone of admonition. "A man can do mony a thing when he likes to try — and I'll no say I ever was just like Euphie mysel ; but the night's as quiet noo as neeb be and nae fears o' the sloop ; and the best place for you is just your bed. Do ye think onybody ever catched auld John Rintoul in a public, wearing out baith body and spirit wi' thae weary politics ! A hantle guid they'll ever do the like of us ! And it's naething but the pride of a bow from Sir Robert, and being fleeced and made o' at election times, because you're a bailie, that gars ye heed them. Ye needna tell me — I just ken mysel."

"Guidwife, hold your peace !" said Samuel authoritatively. "It's no to be expected the like of you should understand, and I'll no fash to expluin ; though it's weel kent in the town that few men could do it better, if I was so disposed. I'm gaun to my bed (no for your bidding, but for my ain pleasure) ; and if I hear as muckle as a mouse stir by the time the clock chaps ten, I ken what I'll do."

So saying, and throwing his heavy boots into the corner with defiance, Samuel Rae-burn went wisely to bed.

So did the mother very speedily, after some confidential complainings to Agnes ; and Agnes, who dared not make even her own heart her confidante, crept away to her own little bed to pray confused, bewildered prayers for men at sea, and listen with cold tremor and shivering while her casement shook and rattled as if some hand without was on its framework, and wild sighs flitted past the window upon the fitful wind.

There was a strong vein of superstition in this fanciful and visionary mind, and Agnes trembled to see some unknown figure crossing the street in the broad moonlight before she went to rest, and hid her head, and shook with dread, when the mysterious creaks and unexplainable sounds of midnight stirred in the silent house. There seemed to her some strange presence abroad, pervading everything with a terrible brooding awe and silentness ; and all her life long she never forgot the feverish dreams and wakings of that March night.

CHAPTER V.

A fresh, boisterous March morning succeeded this night of so many mysterious fears and so little apparent danger ; and after their early breakfast, John Rintoul took tender leave of his wife and his mother, who had come to bid him farewell, and set out upon the Anster road. No one, not even Agnes, remembered, under the clear sunshine, the terrors of the previous night. The morning light laughed out a joyous defiance of dangers visionary and actual — ghostly presence and ghostly sound fled before it, mocked and discomfited ; and the Firth, heaving and swelling over all its broad waters still, champed at its bit only like a high-blooded horse, which the brave bright day, open-eyed and dauntless, reined with a firm and vigorous hand, exulting in the restive resisting might which its own higher strength could keep in curb so well.

"I needna bid ye farewell, Euphie," said John. "I wouldna say but I may come west and stay anither night at hame before the sloop's ready to sail, and ye'll come to Anster the morn, if ye get nae word before, and see us gang down the Firth. It's a grand wind — the sloop will see before it like a bird."

And so he went away — the wind was in his face, freshening his cheeks into glowing color, as he turned round again and again to wave another good-by to them. His road was along the shore — along the range of "braes" which made a verdant lining to the rocky coast — and he went on with a light heart, resolved upon a pleasant surprise to Euphie, whose face his peradventure of returning at night had brightened into such flattering gladness.

The close green springy turf of the braes was drenched with rain and spray, its grass blades all glittering and trembling under the sunshine. Humble little cowering plants of gowans put up a pale deprecating bud here and there, propitiating the favor of the rude elements ; and the low wild rose-bushes, full of brown budded leaves, which should yet make that sea-side road fragrant in summertime, caught at John Rintoul's feet as he passed, like importunate beggars asking help or sympathy ; but the gay, exhilarating rush of the waves on the shore, the sparkling of the light in the broad water, with its many tints and diversities of color, the red sail of yon flying fisher-boat, and its own exulting pace and shower of spray, quickened the sailor's pulse, and made his face glow. The day was full of mirth and involuntary laughter, the wind playing pranks like a schoolboy wit, and the whole earth rousing itself, fresh-hearted and elastic, to meet the unclouded smiling of the sun.

What are these few broken bits of wood lying here in a little cove where the green brae slopes downward to the very rocks ! In calmer weather, the water here is like a charmed mirror, softly laying itself over these folds and ledges of many-colored stone, till all their various hues shine and glisten as if they caught a very life from the clear medium you see them through. The rocks project on either side, leaving only a tortuous narrow channel, all broken and interrupted, to show you that this clear small ocean here is not a separate pool, but belongs to the ebbing and flowing sea. As it is, recluse and silent, shutting out everything but the beautiful clear water and the sunshine, it might be a fit bath for a princess of romance; for the braes fold their soft slopes together to conceal it, leaving only one deep sudden dell between them, a shadowy path by which you may descend.

And down upon the grass there, where the princess might repose herself when her bath was done, what are these rude fragments, wet and jagged and broken, with sharp nails projecting from their sides, and traces of bright painting worn old by time and drenched by sea-water, lying on the peaceful turf? The water has been high here over-night, as you may trace by the mazed line of seaweed and broken shells half-way up the brae. Memorials of some old wreck, perhaps — sad tokens of the storm of yesternight. Softly, John — take care that your heavy boot does not slide down all the way upon that wet and treacherous grass; as it slips from below you, and you catch at the small thorn rose-trees, and leave the mark of your resisting elbow upon this harmless family of gowans, there comes upon your face a light-hearted smile, while you think of many a joyous roll and tumble upon this self-same sod.

Fragments of a wreck, beyond question — of a recent wreck, for the rent is fresh, and the jagged edges sharp. The budded hawthorn, peering down from the edge of the brae, curiously broods over the secret here. The gowans, crushed under the weight, avert their childish heads, as if they would not hear the story; and, softening as it reaches this sunny pool, the water leaves the laughter which rings along all the farther coast, and whispers about the rocks with mysterious murmurs, as one who knows the story, but will not tell.

Warmly the strong life of manhood flushes on your bronzed cheek, John Rintoul; and the hand that lifts this piece of wood with sympathetic interest — moved at sight of the fate which every sailor knows may be his own, but otherwise all untroubled — could hold the helm, without trembling, in the wildest night that ever chafed these northern seas. But Heaven have pity on the strong man's weakness! What sudden spasm is this that blanches his hardy face into deadlier pallor than a woman's fainting, and shakes his sinewy arm like palsy? John Rintoul! — stout sailor! — easy heart! — what is there here to smite you like the hand of Heaven?

Nothing but his own name — his own name cut in awkward characters, as schoolboys use to inscribe them; and there sweeps back upon his fancy the very hour, when the ship-boy, on his first voyage, sick for home, opened the sailor's knife his father had given him, to cut these uncouth letters on the companion door; — how the skipper saw and swore at him, and took the precious knife away; — and how, in the darkness that night, when it was no longer needful to be proud and manly, he swung in his hammock unslumbering, and wept salt tears. He does not know, nor ever pauses to ask, why this childish grief comes back to his remembrance so clearly. Oh, Heaven! — oh, Lord, ruler of earth and heaven! — of danger, misery, and death! — his father! his father! Where is the old man now?

And, desperately springing to his feet, he rushes along the low sharp rocks, plunging here and there knee-deep in the dazzling water, to cast a wild look of inquiry upon the unanswering sea — far out, upon the farthest perilous point of all the range, with the waves laughing round him in a din of derisive mirth, foaming over his feet, throwing their salt spray in his face, gurgling away in wild sport from his side, shivering into hosts of dazzling diamonds, returning again with a shout and bound to leap upon him. Go home, poor heart, and weep, and seek Heaven's aid and counsel — it will but madden thee, this joyous sea.

Still holding in his hand the fatal token of shipwreck, and unconsciously tightening his chill fingers upon it, he comes back slowly over the rocks, his brow throbbing as if with twenty lives. Pausing a moment to gather to him his stunned faculties, he climbs the brae again with two firm strides, and resumes his journey — not home: assurance may be false, and the very certainty of sight deceitful — another 'prentice-boy may have carved John Rintoul upon the companion of another sloop, and father and brother be safe in Anster harbor still.

The road flies under his long, solemn, hurrying strides, as he passes along the coast like a spirit. One or two wayfarers, pausing with smiles to greet him, have turned away, scared and fearful, before the road is half-traversed. John sees nothing but the sea, and its glimmering, rocky margin, and never turns aside nor pauses, save when other fragments cast ashore call for his feverish, eager scrutiny; bits of far-travelled driftwood, borne from Norwegian forests; fragments of masts and spars long since broken by the waves: nothing that his keen eye can identify — nothing but this.

Past the old gray church of St. Monance, through the still street of Pittenweem — and now he sees masts like his own rising above Anster pier. The wood in his hand drops a slow drop of gathered moisture now and then, like a tear, and his own fingers clasping it are benumbed and cold as death; but his heart leaps upon his side with terrible throbings, and his brow beats with audible strokes, that deafen his ears and choke his breath. Ears and breath — what of them! the man's whole soul is in his eyes — gazing, gazing, gazing — Heaven help him! — with blind, impotent rage and fury, upon the blank, vacant waters of Anster harbor — on fisher-boats and stranger vessels, and men whose lives are naught to him — but the sloop is not there.

He has leant his head upon the wall of the pier, and given way to a momentary burst of convulsive weeping — tears that scald his cheeks, long-drawn, audible sobs that shake his whole strong frame; for John Rintoul has a tender heart like a child's, and even now, with a home and household of his own, regards his father with reverent affection and pride, his young brother with joyous, hopeful tenderness; and the strong love in his good heart shakes the whole balance of his being, as he meets this sudden blow.

Composing himself after a little interval, John turns to look again wistfully along the whole broad horizon, and, after a moment, with more vivid curiosity, to examine the faces of fishermen who come and go, and sailors from the little schooner which lies at anchor near. But there is no intelligent look shrinking from his eye — no consciousness of dreadful news to tell him. Now and then he receives a nod and good-morrow, but it is very clear that here is nothing to be told.

A portly figure, in the rusty every-day dress of a little country "merchant," advances from the point of the pier, as John stands slowly and painfully deliberating what his next step must be. It is Bailie Tod, owner of the freight, which now should have been stowing into the hold of the Euphemia, and he has been looking up the Firth for her with impatience, grudging the good wind which this delay may make her lose.

"Is this you, John Rintoul?" exclaimed the bailie, hastily — the sloop was somewhat too small a craft to give its skipper the title of captain, and, saving municipal distinctions, few other honorary handles were usual to the plain names of these plain townsmen — "something 's happened to the sloop, I reckon. I'm nae way bound to put off my business for ither men's dallying — and if there was anything to repair, ye needna have waited till now."

"The sloop left Elie harbor by six of the clock last night," said John, with startling abruptness; "and word or token of her I can find none but this."

"Lord bless me! and what 's this?"

"I sailed my first voyage in her," said John deliberately, looking down upon his tragic carving. "It's fifteen year ago, and her name was the Merry Mason then, and she belonged to one Peter Ness, a builder in Crail. She was a grand boat, new built, and making easy voyages, and little stressed with sair weather or heavy seas a' her days, if it werena last year in the Pentland Firth, when I took round a cargo of farming gear for Comielaw's young son. I looked her a' owre mysel, me and — and a better judge than me," gasped John convulsively, unable to say his father's name; "and Samuel Raeburn, the wife's faither, gaed halves with me to buy her. As steive and sound in a' her timbers as if she was new out of the builder's yard — and weel seasoned and proved forby, and as guid a sailer as ever ran before a wind — but I can find naught of her but this."

The bailie was not used to delicate handling of any subject, even so serious a one; and perhaps a more soothing and gentle response would have increased instead of broken the heavy stupefaction gathering over the mind of John, little accustomed as it was to violent emotions. "Do you mean the sloop 's lost?" cried Bailie Tod.

John looked up for an instant with eyes fiercely glaring upon the speaker, as if the question were an insult. Then his glance fell slowly upon the token in his hand. "I cut it mysel on the companion-door," he said, with heavy distinctness of utterance. "The Lord help me! how do ye think I am to gang hame with such a story in my mouth?"

Half an hour after, a little group of experienced sailors had collected round John Rintoul on Anster pier. Neither signal of distress nor sound had reached Anster during the night, and no one had thought more of the storm than of a "gey gale" or "a black east wind," disagreeable while it lasted, but nothing to have disturbed the customary hardihood of any among them. A St. Monan's fisherman, arrested in passing, declared to have heard nothing of the sloop; and there were the clear, unencumbered waters before them, and in all the Firth nothing like her visible to their eager glance — no sign or trace to be seen. Nothing but this; and John Rintoul held fast in his stiffened, benumbed fingers the fragment of wreck, with its boyish carvings, and its fearful significance of destruction and death.

"A man might cut his name, being a lad-die, on mair places than ane," said an old fisherman. "Are you sure of your ain hand, skipper, that you never did it ony place but there?"

John shook his head almost angrily, with the quick impatience of grief. He could not bear to have ignorant doubts thrown on his certainty, though he himself caught at doubts far more fantastic, and possibilities beyond the reach of any but the most excited fancy.

"Or they might see a wilder sea than they cared to face, and have slipped back, and missed the Elie, and gotten aground on Largo sands," said another speaker, "and be safe enough themselves, whatever had happened to the boat."

But John, in answer, only held up his hopeless, silent messenger—and the voice of his comforters failed—and they could suggest no further hope.

"Then there's naething remaining but to gang hame," said the fisherman, an elder too, and contemporary of old John Rintoul—"to gang to the minister, and get him to break it to the women-folk, and give thanks to God the auld man was a righteous man, and say the will of the Lord be done. It's what your faither would bid you, if he were here this day, John Rintoul."

And the men separated a little, and, though they still surrounded him, had loosened their ring and showed plainly enough that they saw nothing possible to be done. "Thanks to ye a'," said John, hurriedly; "I'll gang hame—my mother must ken. If you would gang up the length of St. Minans with me, just to ask a question or twa, I would be thankful, Robbie Seaton; and I'll get a boat and gang up to Largo sands as soon as I've seen them at hame. Ye're a' very kind friends—thanks to ye a'. I'll gang hame."

CHAPTER VI.

"The auld man says we'll spoil the bairn among us," said Kirstin Beatoun, reluctantly resigning her baby grandson into the arms of Ailie Rintoul: "ae bairn among sae mony grown-up folk is sure to be owre muckle made o'—I see that mysel."

Stern, tall, hard-featured Auntie Ailie made no response. It was only when little John was in other arms than her own that she saw the dangers attending his many-friended infancy.

Euphie's room was nearly as full as its dimensions permitted. She herself, enthroned in the elbow-chair, with its cushions of checked linen, sat by a fireside as clear and brilliant as the fresh day without, and her mother-in-law had just laid lightly round her shoulders, over her bright lilac shortgown, an additional comforting shawl. Euphie's pretty hair curled wilfully under her muslin morning cap, with its little narrow border of lace—lace over the price of which the elder Mrs. Rintoul and Mrs. Raeburn shook their heads with secret pride; and the pretty, delicate color in her soft cheek had grown a little brighter with the sweet exultation of her young motherhood, and the genial warmth of the atmosphere, both physical and mental, surrounding her. For Euphie had an innocent enjoyment of being petted, and cared for, and "muckle made o',"—it has been her fate all her life.

The carved mahogany tea-table of last night's entertainment has been removed to its old corner, and, carefully polished and shining, held its round top and elaborate rim in a perpendicular slant of complacent exhibition and it is only a plain deal table, for common use, by which Kirstin Beatoun stands, in her dark-blue woollen petticoat, and dark blue linen shortgown, her dress relieved only by the white lining of her turned-over collar, and by her trim check apron, glistening from the press. A little weatherbeaten, as becomes a fisher's wife, there is still a fresh bloom upon her cheeks, though they have seen more than sixty years; and with curves about her brow and eyes, and quiescent lines round the mouth, which betray many a past anxiety in the family mother, the eyes themselves are neither dimmed nor mottled, but shine with all manner of affectionate capabilities still. Upon the table beside her lies a bundle of warm blue woollen stockings, her own winter-evening work, which have to be added to her son John's stores before he goes to sea; and Kirstin herself, on "the muckle wheel," which stands in a corner of her cottage room, has spun every thread of the yarn which her bright wires afterwards manufactured into those substantial articles of comfort, with which she congratulates herself the old man and Patie are bountifully supplied.

But Ailie Rintoul is a skipper's wife, a person of consequence, with a much finer house, and higher proprieties about her than her sister-in-law. No shortgown, but a full dress and petticoat of black silk, not very long since degraded from its rank of Sabbath-day's apparel to be worn through the week, as after all a very thrifty dress, endues the tall and somewhat meagre person of Mrs. Plenderleath, whose rank fully qualifies her to bear her husband's name and her matronly title. This is entirely a matter of rank in these simple seaport oligarchies; and no one thinks of calling Kirstin Beatoun, good wife and kindly as she has been for five-and-forty years, by any other than the maiden name, which according to law, she relinquished so long ago, to be John Rintoul's wife. Auntie Ailie has taken off her bonnet, which lies on the bed, looking very prim, and well preserved, and thrifty; but no one sees the dignified Mrs. Plenderleath stir abroad without one; whereas Kirstin wears no upper covering over her snowy cap. Ailie Rintoul is a year or two younger than her sister-in-law, and is harsh of feature and slow of speech, like her brother—conscious of being an authority, too, like what he was, and full of a solemn importance, still more marked and evident; but other qualities less visible, and on the surface—powers of the judgment and the heart—well developed, although peculiar, and marked by strong individual characteristics, are there as nobler witnesses to testify the relationship between Mrs. Plenderleath and John Rintoul.

A little basket of new-laid eggs, the produce of her own beloved hens, stands beside Kirstin's stockings. Ailie has strong antipathies, and an active, cherished dislike to the remote members of her husband's family; so that her own childlessness has made her feel herself more and more emphatically a Rintoul, and she feels a personal gratitude to pretty little spoilt Euphie for the heir whom she holds in her arm.

Mrs. Raeburn cannot come west this morning to join the family conclave, but Agnes is here in her place. Agnes stands by the other corner of the fireside, turning the spinning-wheel idly. There is no yarn upon its polished round, as it moves in a slow measure, quite unusual to it, under the musing eyes which veil all their light with dreams. Agnes is dressed in a bright-colored printed gown of home-made linen, and looks nothing so melancholy or abstracted as she was last night; but the conversation of the matrons does not fix her wandering thoughts, and the gentle heaviness of girlish reverie falls upon her unawares. There is something soothing, slumbrous, drowsy in the lingering motion of the wheel; and so is there in her thoughts, which gradually grow slower, till they glide along in conscious silence, her mind only aware of them, but never exerting itself to lift the eyelids, which droop so pleasantly, and see what manner of thoughts are these. By and by she is seated, still in this charmed silence—still spinning unseen tissues over the vacant wheel. The baby leaps in the old arms which hold him so proudly; the young mother, enjoying with all her heart the tender sympathy surrounding her, answers Kirstin Beatoun's anxious questions, and is confidential about herself and her baby, while her "goodmother" encourages her, from her own experience, and Ailie is didactic and instructive; full of occult knowledge of the "ways of bairns." They are all occupied, each as suits her best; and no one interferes with the musings of Agnes, or with the empty wheel.

But round and round this fated house, in the clear sunshine, goes one with guilty steps and haggard face, like a midnight thief. A dozen times his feet have faltered at the door, but he sees the peaceful group through the window, and dares not enter—dares not go in with his terrible news in his face, to plunge them all into misery. Such a strange assembly, too, for one who has this news to tell—John Rintoul's faithful wife, Patie's loving mother; Ailie, only sister of the lost, nearest to him in blood, in disposition, and in sympathy; Agnes, over whom this strong light of sudden grief throws an instant revelation too, disclosing her in her unconscious reverie, just entering the enchanted ground whither Patie Rintoul had gone before her, drawing with him her girl's heart; and, scarcely last, the sorrowful messenger thinks of his own delicate Euphie, so little able to bear such a shock—and he shrinks and trembles at the door.

The hair upon his brow is wet; there is a cold dew over his face, and his fingers now will scarcely lose their hold of that bit of broken wood. But they have seen him within, and some one rushes suddenly to the door. He hears a great cry of mingled voices, asking what it is, and feels them all crowding round him. There he stands by his own bright hearth, his wife clinging to his arm, his mother gazing in his face, till he thinks his heart will burst—stands full in the rays of the gay firelight, which mocks him like the sunshine, holding his witness in his hand.

Nor has he obeyed the injunctions of his humble sympathizers, and transferred the painful task of telling the news to the minister. He has come to do it himself, alone and unsupported; and the questions they pour upon his ears—questions suggestive of some trivial misery, so much under the mark of the true one that he could laugh at them in bitter mockery—go near to make him mad. And at last, suffering far too intensely himself to remember any of the commonplaces of preparation, the usual modes of "breaking" such a piece of terrible intelligence to those most dearly concerned, John bursts into the heart of the subject with one desperate effort. He would fain say something gentler, but he cannot. Nothing will come from his parched lips but the abrupt and utmost truth.

"The sloop's gone down atween this and St. Minans; they've never been heard tell of in Anster. I found a bit of the wreck on the shore—ye a' mind it; and there's no anither token of them, man or boat, except at the bottom of the sea!"

John's hoarse, breathless whisper was broken by a scream—it was but Euphie, who had in this intimation only a great shock, but scarcely any bereavement—and on his disengaged arm Ailie Rintoul laid a savage grasp, gripping him like a tiger—"Say it's a lee—say it's a story you've made—and I'll no curse ye, John Rintoul!"

But Kirstin Beatoun said not a word. Her eyes turned upon her son with a vacant stare, and her fingers kept opening and shutting with a strange idiotic motion; then, suddenly starting, she lifted up her hands, and bent her cowering head under their shadow, pressing her fingers over the eyes that would not close. John made no answer to the fierce question of his aunt—said nothing to soothe the terror of Euphie; his whole attention was given to his mother.

There was a solemn pause—for even Ailie did not venture to speak now, till the wife and mother, doubly bereaved, had wakened from her stupor—and nothing but the low moans and sobs of Euphie disturbed the silence. It was but momentary, for they woke the stunned heart of Kirstin, and roused her to know her grief.

"Comfort the bit poor thing, John—comfort her," said his mother suddenly; "for she has her prop and her staff left to her, and has never heard the foot of deadly sorrow a' her days. The auld man and Patie — baith gane — a' gane — I ken it's true — I'm assured in my ain mind it's true; but I've nae feeling o't, man — nae feeling o't — nae mair than cauld iron or stane."

And, with a pitiful smile quivering upon her lip, and her eye gleaming dry and tearless, Kirstin turned to pace up and down the little apartment. Strangely different in the first effort of her scarcely less intense grief, Ailie Rintoul turned now fiercely upon John —

"Have ye nae mair proof but this? A wae might wrench away a companion-door that wouldna founder a sloop — are ye gaun to be content with this, John Rintoul? He's gane through as mony storms as there's gray hairs on his head — and ilka ane of them is numbered. Am I to believe the Lord would forsake his ain? I tell ye ye're wrang — ye're a' wrang — I'll never believe it. He may be driven out a hundred mile, or stranded on a desolate place, or ta'en refuge, or fechtin on the sea; — but ye needna tell me — I ken — I ken — I'll believe ye the Judgment's to be the morn, afore I believe my brother's lost."

Hot tears blinded Ailie's eyes, and all the stiff sedateness of her mien had vanished in the wild gestures with which these words hurried from her lips; she paused, at length, worn out and trembling with feverish excitement, and turned to the window to look out on the sea. John, still more completely exhausted, and lost in the deep, hopeless despondency which had now succeeded to the first impatience of grief, stood at the table silent and unresponsive still; and the slow, heavy footsteps of Kirstin Beatoun sounded through the room like a knell.

"And it was for this ye minded of the bairns! — oh, John, my man, my man! and it was for this the Lord warned ye with a sight of them, and put dark words into your mouth, that I kent nae meaning to! — Na, Ailie; no lost; blessings on him where he is, where nae blessings fail! I never had dread nor doubt before, but put him freely in the Lord's hand to come and gang at His good pleasure — and he came like the day, and gaed like the night, as constant, serving his Maker. He's won hame at last — and the Lord help me for a pair desolate creature, that am past kenning what my trouble is. Patie, too; bairns — bairns, ye needna think me hard-hearted because I canna greet — but it's a' cauld, cauld, like the blast that cast our boat away."

And the poor widow leaned upon the wall, and struggled with some hard, dry, gasping sobs; but no tears came to soften the misery in her eyes.

Agnes was cowering in a corner, like one who shrinks from a great blow; Euphie wept and lamented passionately and aloud — she felt the stroke so much the least of all.

CHAPTER VII.

That day the Firth was scoured up and down, from Inverkeithing to St. Andrews, and anxious scouts despatched along the whole line of coast to search at least for other evidence of the wreck. Other evidence there was none to be found — nothing, save this solitary fragment, had found its way to the home-shores of Fife, and the sea closed hopelessly over all trace and token of the lost vessel and her crew. The weather continued brilliant and glowing, full of sunshine and fresh winds; but not even the strong high tides, which covered Elie shore with wreaths of tangle and glistening seaweed, and scattered driftwood on the braes, brought any second messenger ashore, to confirm the record of the first. In a little empty chamber, in the roof of John Rintoul's house, this tragic token was itself preserved; and Euphie, when he disappeared sometimes, knew, with an impatient, half-displeased sympathy, that he was there — there, turning over the senseless fragment in his hand, carefully pondering its marks, and feeling his heart beat when he discovered a new jagged point in its outline, yet never drawing forth from it further tidings of the mystery which it alone could tell.

And by and by a stupefying calm fell over all their excitement. The loss of the "Euphemia" came to be a matter of history in the district, of which people told with heads sympathetically shaken, and exclamations of grave pity, just as Kirstin Beatoun herself spoke last year of the boats lost at "the drave." There were circumstances connected with the story, remarkable, and claiming special notice; as, for instance, the total disappearance of the wreck — all but the one singular token which John Rintoul himself had found; but the story itself was not remarkable — nothing more noteworthy or lamentable than the fall of a knight in harness, or a soldier in the field of battle, was the loss of a sailor in the wild element which he lived but to struggle with; and only another story of shipwreck, distinguished by a special mystery, was added to the far too abundant store of such calamities known to the dwellers of the east coast.

And "the Elie," with its quiet monotony of life — the bustle of leave-taking with which its few small vessels sailed, its fishing-boats went and came, and its little commotion of country business — the market of its small province of farms — went on without a change. A visible outward gravity and solemnness fell upon two or three households, who made no moan of their affliction — no small repining and complaint on the part of Samuel Raeburn and his wife, now suddenly fallen into comparative poverty ; but all the widening outer circles had died out of the placid water, and only a single spot remained to tell where so many hopes had gone down into the sea.

And looking into Kirstin Beatoun's sole apartment, with all its minute regularity of order — its well-swept earthen floor and shining fireplace, with the great empty "kettle," which she once needed in the old family times, standing upon the side of the grate, even when the little vessel she used herself hung from the crook, a speck in the large, hospitable chimney — you scarcely could have fancied that the house was desolate. There were one or two signs noticeable enough, if you had crossed the threshold before, ere this blow fell on Kirstin's life. No sound in the hushed house but the constant voice of the eight-day clock, telling hours and minutes, of which none were spent idly even now. No bits of tunes hummed out of the house-mother's contented heart — no little communication made to herself or to a passing neighbor, and even no passing neighbor throwing in a word of daily news from the threshold, as they used to do every hour ; for the door itself stood no longer open, inviting chance visitants or voices. Like a veil over a widow's face, this closed door chilled all voluble sympathizers round, and impressed the neighborhood with a deeper sense of widowhood and desolation than almost any other visible token could have done. The very children paused and grew silent, wondering with wistful eyes before the closed door ; and solemn was the greenish light within, coming solely, as it never came before, through the thick, small window-panes and half-drawn curtains, upon Kirstin herself, sitting before the fire in the profound silence, working nets or knitting stockings, spinning wool or hemp — no longer for the kindly household needs which it was such joy to supply — no longer for the winter fishing, or the herring drave, in which she herself had all the personal interest which a fisherman's wife takes in the success of "our boat" — but for the bare and meagre daily bread which she had now to win with her own hands.

She is sitting there now, with the fire throwing some ruddy shade upon her — sitting in the full daylight, in the middle of the floor. There is a significance even in the place where she chooses to put her chair and wheel, for Kirstin is in no one's way now, and does not need to leave the "clear floor," for which she would once have contended. Without, it is a May day, fresh and fragrant, and the clear water on Elie shore has forgotten the boisterous mirth of early spring, and out of its schoolboy din has gone back into an infant's sweet composure, and breaks in sunny ripples, soft and quiet, upon the narrow rim of golden sand. But there comes no sunshine here, to throw a passing radiance upon this still figure, with its drooping head and widow's cap, the wheel moving rapidly before her, and the monotonous continual motion of foot and hand. There is something strangely impressive in this combination of perfect stillness and constant mechanical motion — a mystic mesmeric effect binding the spectator as by a spell. The wheel moves on, and so does the hand that sways it ; but not by so much as the lifting of an eyelid does Kirstin show any sign of animation except this.

Yet she has visitors to-day. By the side of the fire, just opposite that great wooden arm-chair which no one ventures to sit down in, Mrs. Plenderleath, with a black gown heavily trimmed with crape, and ghastly black ribbons about her cap, sits solemnly silent too. Kirstin has no mourning except the widow's cap which surrounds her unmoving face — her everyday petticoat and shortgown remain the same, and she can only afford to wear her new mournings on Sabbath-days ; but there is a satisfaction to the richer Ailie in bearing constantly the memorials of their woe. Cold and gray, and sharply drawn, the thin lines of Ailie's face bear something like a high strain of irritation and impatience in their grief. Her eyes are excited and wandering — deeply hollowed, too, within these few painful weeks — and her lips have got a fashion of strange, rapid motion, quivering, and framing words as it seems, though the words are never said.

Just behind Kirstin, sitting on a low wooden stool, and half leaning against the elbow of the vacant arm-chair, is Agnes Raeburn. Samuel, her father, has taken the loss of the sloop as a personal offence, and has no commiseration to spare for the sailors who lost his property along with their lives ; nor has he ever professed to mourn for them ; yet Agnes has a homely black-and-white cotton gown, as cheap as cotton print can be procured, whereby she silently testifies her "respect" for the dead. And something more significant than her mourning speaks in those dark shadows under her eyes, in the pallor of her thin cheek, and in the lines which begin to grow far more clearly marked and distinct than they should have been for years, around the grave mouth, which never relaxes now to anything but a pathetic smile. But it is here only, or in the solitude of her own chamber at home, that Agnes permits herself the indulgence of this grief. Out of doors, and among strangers, her pride sustains her. She will not have any one say that she is breaking, for Patie Rintoul, the heart which he never sought in words.

Though now Agnes is solemnly assured that he would have sought it, and that Patie, whose dawning devotion she had scorned so far as appearance went, bore for her that high love at which her heart trembles, and which none may scorn. She knows it. How! But Agnes thrills over all her frame, and shrinks back and shudders. She cannot tell. A dark figure crossing the street through the world of white unshadowed moonlight—a distant step echoing over the stones when all the peaceful housekeepers of Elie had been for hours asleep—something at her window shaking the casement like a hand that fain would open it, but might not—and stealthy sounds, as of subdued footsteps, stealing all night long through the silent house. She thinks that thus he came to warn her—he, Patie—now the one perpetual unnamed He on whom her heart dwells; she thinks the passing yearning spirit took this only means in his power to let her know his love, as he parted with his mortal life; and the thought wraps heart and soul of her in a dim dreamy awe.

At present Agnes is knitting. It is Kirstin's work—work that she does at night to preserve her eyes from the more remunerative labor;—and so they sit together in perfect silence, Ailie Rintoul now and then rustling the sleeves of her black silk gown, as she lifts her large brown bony hand to wipe the continual moisture which overflows, as out of a cup, from the hollow rim under her eyes—Agnes moving her fingers quickly, and making a sharp, rapid sound with her wires—Kirstin, like a weird woman, with rapt head and look of perfect abstraction, spinning on, with that constant monotonous movement of foot and hand;—but no one of them stirring, except with this involuntary gesture, and none saying a word to the other.

After a long time spent in this silence, Ailie rises slowly to go to the window. The children without think her something like a spirit as they see her long, colorless face, surrounded with borders of narrow net and bits of black ribbon, looking out over the curtain. Slowly returning and resuming her seat, Ailie speaks:

"You said John was to be down from Leith the day?"

"Euphie was looking for him," said Agnes. "The owner of the brig was to let him ken whether he would do for mate this morning, and Euphie was busy at a' his claes, for he thought he would get the place."

Ailie shook her head bitterly. Kirstin made no sign; but the humiliation, and loss, and poverty, were an aggravation of the misfortune of her sister-in-law.

"And Euphie said, if you would gang there—if you would only gang hame!" said Agnes, rising to lay her hand hurriedly on Kirstin Beatoun's shoulder; "for it breaks everybody's heart to see you living your lane, and working this way night and day."

"A'body's very kind," said Kirstin steadily, "but I've had a house o' my ain for five-and-forty year, and I canna live in anither woman's now. Na, na, Nannie—my guid-daughter is very weel of hersel, and pleases John, and I'm aye glad to see her—and you're a fine simple hearted creatur, and I like to have you near me; but I maun bide in my ain house, Nancy, and be thankful that I have to work to keep a roof over my head; it's aye something to thole thae lang days for. If I had plenty, and ease, and naething to do but to sit with my hands before me, I would either gang daft or dee."

"But there's an odds between gaun to a strange woman's house—though I'm meaning nae ill to John's wife—and coming to mine," said Mrs. Plenderleath; "and ye could aye hae plenty to do, Kirstin, and I wouldna be against ye working, for I kin it's a grand divert to folk's ain thoughts."

"Na, Ailie, na," answered Kirstin Beatoun; "I have lost a'thing that made hame cheerie, man and weans, goods and gear; but I maun keep the four wa's a' my days—it's what was hame ance, and it's everything I hae. When my time comes, and I'm done with earthly dwellings—the Lord send it was this day!—the plenishing can be sellt, and the siller laid by for little Johnnie when he comes to be a man; but I maun keep my ain house a' my days."

This was by no means the first time Kirstin had declared her determination; and not even the faintest lingering hope that some one might still come back out of the mysterious sea, which had swallowed up her treasures, to make this once more a home worth living in, inspired her in her purpose. It was simply as she said. Her own house, and the desire to retain it, was all she had now remaining in this life; and her daily work was her daily strength, and kept her heart alive.

For no one dreamt of the little Dutch smuggling brig storm-driven up the Firth on yon tempestuous March night—no one knew of the young, pallid, half-drowned man whom the Dutch skipper could not choose but turn aside to save; and least of all could any one have imagined the strange, pitiful scene on board the "Drei Bruderen," where the poor young Scotch sailor, with that hardening cut upon his brow, lay wild in the delirium of brain fever, raving fiercely in the unknown tongue, which made his kindly, rude deliverers, grouped round his bed, shake their heads, and look doubtfully at one another, unable to distinguish a single word intelligible to them of all his lengthened groanings. They were on the high seas still, slowly drawing near their haven; and even now, while Kirstin Beatoun sat immovable under the shadow of her great hopeless sorrow, hope, and health, and a new life began to dawn again upon Patie Rintoul.

DR. YOUNG — DR. AKENSIDE — JAMES BOSWELL.

DR. YOUNG.

* JOHNSON got lazy towards the conclusion of his Lives of the Poets, and was glad to accept the offer of a life of Young from Mr. Herbert Croft, then a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, afterwards a clergyman, and still remembered as Sir Herbert Croft, and as the author of "Love and Madness," a kind of novel founded on the story of Mr. Hackman and Miss Ray. Croft was the friend of Dr. Young's son, but, judging from the Life, he would not appear to have known much of Young; while he has fallen into some curious blunders that deserve to be corrected in any future edition of Johnson's Lives.* Croft, however, was diligent in his inquiries about Young, and made applications for information about him to several of his friends, among others to Mrs. Montagu, whose letter in reply I was allowed to copy from the original, then in the possession of the late "Tom Hill." As this letter merits publication, and has never been in print, I send it for preservation and public use to the pages of Sylvanus.

TO HERBERT CROFT, ESQ., SOUTHAMPTON ROW, LONDON.

Sandleford, Sept. 17, 1782.

Mrs. Montagu presents her compliments to Mr. Croft, and would have returned an answer to his letter sooner, but being in the country it was delayed on its way to her. In regard to "Resignation," the matter which gave occasion to that poem was simply this; Mrs. Montagu having observed that Mrs. Boscawen, in her great and just grief for the loss of the admiral, seemed to find some consolation in reading Dr. Young's Night Thoughts, she wished to give her an opportunity of conversing with him, having herself always thought his unbounded genius appeared to greater advantage in the companion than the author. The Christian was in him a character more inspired, more enraptured, more sublime, than the poet; and in his ordinary conversation — — letting down the golden chain from high,

He drew his audience upward to the sky.

Mrs. M. therefore proposed to Mrs. Boscawen and Mrs. Carter to go with her to Welwyn. It is unnecessary to add that the visit answered every expectation.

Mrs. Montagu is very sorry it is not in her

* Let me observe here that I commenced my now largely and curiously annotated copy of Johnson's Lives in the year 1839, and that I have nearly ready for publication a new edition of the Lives, with such corrections and new matter inserted as my own unceasing love for the work has enabled me to supply. — P. power to furnish Mr. Croft with any important circumstances in Dr. Young's life; but he was sunk into the vale of years and quiet retreat, before she had the honor and happiness of his acquaintance, and his contemplation being then chiefly intent on things above the visible diurnal sphere, he rarely talked of the earlier and more active part of his life. From others she has heard many things greatly to his credit; particularly an act of uncommon liberality to his lady's daughter by her first husband; but as they were delivered to her in the vague relations of common discourse, she cannot speak of them with such certainty and precision as Mr. Croft's purpose requires. This deficiency she greatly laments, not only on account of the honor they would have done to the memory of her departed friend, but likewise for the sake of the world, to whom they would have held forth patterns of right and noble conduct. Though right and wrong are declared and made known to us by higher wisdom than human wisdom, yet such is the perverseness of mankind they are more apt to be influenced by the example of persons celebrated for their parts than by pure precept; for the same reason, in an unbelieving age, the interests of religion are connected with the character of a man so distinguished for piety as Dr. Young. Though unable to assist Mr. Croft, she must ever respect him for endeavoring to get information from Dr. Young's friends concerning him, instead of collecting from the whispers of calumny idle tales by which to blast the memory of a good man, and prevent the edification of a good example.

DR. AKENSIDE.

Akenside's share in "Dodsley's Museum," and the remuneration he received from Dodsley for his services in that work, have escaped his biographer. All that Mr. Dyce says on the subject, in his able and otherwise ample life of the poet, is as follows: "He also contributed to Dodsley's excellent periodical publication, The Museum, or Literary and Historical Register, several prose papers which deserve to be reprinted." The following document, from the original in my possession, is new to the biography of the poet: —

Jany. 20, 1745-6.

Dr. Akenside engages to Mr. Dodsley for six months, commencing the 25th of March next —

To prepare and have ready for the press once a fortnight, one Essay, whenever necessary, for carrying on a work to be called The Museum. And also,

To prepare and have ready for the press, once a fortnight, an account of the most considerable books in English, Latin, French, or Italian, which have been lately published, and which Mr. Dodsley shall furnish; and the said Account of Books shall be so much in quantity as, along with the Essay above mentioned, may fill a sheet and a half in small pica, whenever so much is necessary for carrying on the said design.

Dr. Akinside also engages to supervise the whole, and to correct the press of his own part. On condition —

That Mr. Dodsley shall pay to Dr. Akinside fifty pounds on or before the 27th of September next.

'Tis also agreed that so long as Mr. Dodsley thinks proper to continue the paper, and so long as Dr. Akinside consents to manage it, the terms above mentioned shall remain in force, and not less than an hundred pounds per annum be offered by Dr. Dodsley, nor more insisted on by Dr. Akinside, as witness our hands,

MARK AKINSIDE.
ROBT. DODSLEY.

This document is in Akenside's handwriting.

JAMES BOSWELL.

It is not known that Sir Alexander Boswell inherited his love of poetry from his father, and that the biographer of Johnson, like his son, was occasionally a poet. The following song, now first printed, and from the original in Boswell's own handwriting, was written by the charming biographer of Johnson, in commemoration of a tour he made with the famous Mrs. Rudd whilst she was under his protection, and for living with whom he was nearly disinherited by his father. Boswell occasionally sung the song on the Home Circuit.

LURGAN CLANBRASSIL.

A SUPPOSED IRISH SONG.

Tune — Drunk at night and dry in the morning.

O Lurgan Clanbrassil ! how sweet is thy sound
To my tender remembrance as Love's sacred ground ;
For there gentle Fainelagh first charmed my sight,
And filled my young heart with a fluttering delight.

When I thought her my own, O ! too short seemed the day
In a jaunt to Down Patrick, or a trip on the sea ;
To describe what I felt then all language were vain,
'Twas in truth what the poets have studied to feign.

But I found, oh ! alas ! that e'en she could deceive,
Then nothing was left but to sigh, weep, and rave ;
Distracted I fled from my dear native shore,
Resolved to see Lurgan Clanbrassil no more.

Yet still in some moments enchanted I find
A warm ray of her fondness beam soft on my mind :

While thus in bright fancy my Angel I see,
All the world is a Lurgan Clanbrassil to me.

Of Margaret Caroline Rudd, so intimately connected with the forgeries of the Perreaus, there is this mentioned in Boswell's biography : —

I talked a good deal to him (Johnson) of the celebrated Margaret Caroline Rudd, whom I had visited, induced by the fame of her talents, address, and irresistible power of fascination. To a lady who disapproved of my visiting her, he said, on a former occasion, "Nay, Madame, Boswell is in the right ; I should have visited her myself, were it not that they have now a trick of putting everything into the newspapers." This evening he exclaimed, "I envy him his acquaintance with Mrs. Rudd."

Would Johnson have envied him his song !

PETER CUNNINGHAM.

Kensington, 15th January, 1853.

THE NEW PRESIDENT LEAVING HOME. — A painful sensation was created in our quiet town by the departure of Gen. Pierce on Monday of last week for Washington. Few men have been so universally honored and beloved by their neighbors and townsmen, or carried with them, when they changed their residence, more fervent good wishes. All feel that they have lost an ornament of our society, a centre of attraction, and a personal friend ; and long will be the time before the void will be filled which his removal has made. While his generous nature and courteous bearing, uniting a graceful dignity with an artless frankness and unsuspecting familiarity, secured the devoted affections of all who approached him, his talents and public services procured for him confidence, respect and honor, as far as he was known. Since his nomination not one false step has he taken ; since his election to the highest position in the gift of mortals, not one indiscreet act has he done. In the excitement, and in some instances, the violence and virulence of electioneering strife, he bore himself with an exact propriety, and since his election his political opponents confess to their admiration of his indomitable independence and matchless power of keeping his own secrets. The most crushing calamity has saddened his brow and his heart, but it has secured for him the sympathies and prayers of all good men, and will, as we doubt not, lift up his thoughts to a Higher Power in the midst of the honors, the flatteries, the intrigues, the fawning, and the responsibilities before him. He goes to the White House with a patriotic heart, and with the solemn purpose, we are persuaded, to do his whole duty, knowing no north, no south, no east, no west, the president of the country and not of a section. Ignoring politics and parties, we confess to our gratification at the honor bestowed upon our little New Hampshire, and the honorable style in which the honor will be sustained. — Concord Congregational Journal.

Hand-Book of Universal Geography. Edited by T. Carey Callicot. 12mo, pp. 856. Geo. P. Putnam & Co.

This is a new volume of Putnam's useful Home Cyclopædia, containing a gazetteer of the world. With the present rapid development of geographical knowledge, and the almost incredible changes that are daily taking place in national affairs, it is difficult to arrange a gazetteer which shall not, in some respects, prove to be behind the age, when it comes to appear before the public. We have a proof of this in the excellent volume now issued. Based on Johnston's Dictionary of Geography, it shows a good deal of independent research, and an evident desire for the attainment of accuracy by consulting various authorities. The pains-taking diligence necessary for the completion of such a work, and which can be fully appreciated only by those who have been engaged in similar undertakings, has evidently been practised by the accomplished editor. Still, several errors of detail have escaped his eye, many of which might have been avoided by a comparison of the most recent sources of information. For instance, under the head of Cambridge, we are told that Harvard University "has 27 professors or other instructors, and 53,000 volumes in its libraries." This is entirely wide of the mark. The editor must have relied on documents of a quite ancient date. It is singular that where perfect accuracy was so easily attainable, he should have fallen into such glaring errors in regard to the most prominent American literary institution. Instead of 27 instructors, Harvard College numbers on its catalogue 83 instructors, besides the president, professors emeriti, officers of the observatory and library, and of the steward's department, and proctors, amounting in the whole to 45 persons, omitting two professorships now vacant. Instead of "53,000 volumes in its libraries," the public Library contains 61,000 volumes, the Medical, Law, and Theological Libraries, over 19,000, and the Society Libraries of the students, 12,000, making a total of about 92,000 volumes. The number of alumni which Mr. Callicot reports at 5,546, of whom 1,406 have been ministers of the gospel, would be more correctly stated at 6,842, of whom 1,707 have been ministers. Under the head of the "United States" we find several statements which conflict with the most recent authorities. The exports are said to be $151,898,720, and imports, $178,138,318. But, according to the latest documents, the total exports were $218,888,011, of which $196,689,718 was domestic produce. The imports for the same period amounted to $216,224,932. The number of steam frigates in the United States navy is made to be 15, which is too large a figure by at least 10. We notice several errors also in the statistics of foreign cities, especially in the population, which often varies from that given by the best recent tables, to such a degree, as, in this department, to make the Gazetteer rather an unsafe guide. The principal merit of the work consists in its great condensation, which enables the editor to compress an extraordinary amount of information within its pages, and the fulness with which it treats of American geography, especially on points that have been neglected by the largest European gazetteers. With all the defects and inaccuracies to which we have alluded, it cannot fail to be a welcome addition to our standard works of reference. — Tribune.

LOVE, HOPE, AND PATIENCE IN EDUCATION.

BY S. T. COLERIDGE.

O'er wayward childhood wouldst thou hold firm rule,
And sun thee in the light of happy faces;
Love, Hope, and Patience, these must be thy graces,
And in thine own heart let them first keep school.
For as old Atlas on his broad neck places
Heaven's starry globe, and there sustains it — so
Do these uphold the little world below
Of Education — Patience, Love, and Hope.
Methinks, I see them grouped, in seemly show,
The straightened arms upraised, the palms aslope,
And robes that touching as adown they flow,
Distinctly blend, like snow embossed in snow.
O part them never! If Hope prostrate lie,

Love too will sink and die.

But Love is subtle, and doth proof derive
From her own life that Hope is yet alive;
And bending o'er with soul-transfusing eyes,
And the soft murmurs of the mother dove,
Wooes back the fleeting spirit and half supplies —
Thus Love repays to Hope what Hope first gave to Love.

Yet haply there will come a weary day,

When o'ertasked at length

Both Love and Hope beneath the load give way,
Then with a statue's smile, a statue's strength,
Stands the mute sister, Patience, nothing loth,
And both supporting does the work of both.

We desire especially to commend these admirable lines to our readers. As a poem of its kind, it is well-nigh perfect, both in the conception and the execution. It is philosophy, sentiment, beauty, blended into one by the harmonious power of the imagination. As a study of poetical art, it requires, as all poetry of a high order, thoughtful and imaginative reading; and the power and beauty of it will reveal themselves on repeated perusal. It is, too, by virtue of its excellence as poetry, a moral as well as poetic study. Never by hand of heathen artist — sculptor or poet — never in marble or in pictured words, were Aglaia, Euphrosyne and Thalia shown in group more graceful, or attitude so august as these three Christian Graces. They are imaged, not like Atlas stooping with bent neck beneath the "starry globe," but erect, "The straightened arms upraised, the palms aslope," upbearing their burden. They stand, not like the nude pagan divinities, but draped with Christian modesty, the robes blending like "snow embossed in snow." This stationary beauty of sculpture changes to other imagery, to symbolize the course of the moral sentiments which are attendant on education. Hope is the first to faint, and the life of Love is so linked with hers that if Hope fail, "Love too will sink and die." There is a fine philosophy of the affections shown in the lines which tell of the subtle process by which Love finds in her own life the proof that Hope is not dead; and then the peculiar power of the imagination creates that second exquisite group — Love, "with soultransfusing eyes," bending over the fainting form of Hope and wooing her spirit back again. Last of all in this drama of education, you behold the third group — as beautiful and more awful — where Love and Hope, losing heart, would sink beneath the load, but that "the mute sister, Patience," stands "with a statue's smile, a statue's strength" — and "both supporting does the work of both."

This poem resembles in its philosophical vein the productions of some of the early English poets, but is superior to them in the better proportions of the poetic and philosophical elements — in the mastery which the imagination sustains over the metaphysical power. With all who know how to recognize and welcome Truth embodied in poetic creations, and arrayed in poetic garb — with all who look on poetry as a study, the poem, we are confident, will find favor. Especially may it be taken to heart by all who in any way have a duty of education — who, having to rule over "wayward childhood," are fain to look at the same time upon "the light of happy faces." The mother, in whose undying instincts towards her child the three Graces of education have the truest and most beautiful life — the school-mistress, ruling restless childhood — the teacher, who governs unruly boyhood, or guides early manhood — all are made to feel that Hope often sinks sadly down, and Love alone can win her fainting spirit back, and lastly, how Patience must needs do the all-sustaining work, when her two sorrowing sisters are drooping at her side. Not only for those who are charged with the education of youth is this apologue significant; it comes home to those, whose sacred function it is to lead their fellow-beings of every age — the old as well as the young — in the paths of righteousness and truth, and they who teach from the pulpit and from the altar-side have full cause to feel the need of the gracious presence of Love, Hope and Patience.

This poem may be new to many of the readers of Coleridge's poetry; the date of its composition we are not informed of; it appeared for the first time, we believe, in the edition of his poems prepared for the press by his daughter, the lamented Mrs. Henry Nelson Coleridge, and edited in 1852, by her and her brother the Rev. Derwent Coleridge. — The Register.

THE historian of the literature of the nineteenth century will not have occasion to lament the smallness, either in value, or perhaps in extent, of his materials. Already we have had Lives of Byron, Scott, Southey, Wordsworth, Campbell, Cary, Jeffrey, &c. Lord John Russell is giving us the Memoir and Diaries of Moore; and one of the publications of the present year, though as yet not publicly announced, will be a Life (though a brief one) of William Lisle Bowles — containing his early correspondence with Coleridge. Both Southey and Coleridge, it will be remembered, were constant in the acknowledgment of the debt of obligation which their early verse was under to the muse of Bowles. The Life of the Vicar of Bremhill, though not a stirring one, was far from devoid of interest, and in good hands will doubtless form a pleasing picture of pastoral and poetic life. — Athenæum.

WE see every reason to hail the kind of attention which is now being bestowed on the study and illustration of the New Testament Scriptures. Those fruits of collateral inquiry which the last age erroneously denominated the evidences of Christianity, while they are now gathered in tenfold abundance, are called by their right names, and ranged in their proper places. The more accurate philological study of the Greek language,—the light which the researches of Niebuhr and others have let in upon the contemporary and earlier history,—the multiplied facilities for travel, and the advanced intelligence of travellers,—have contributed to increase our means of confirming and illustrating the evangelic record. On the other hand, we cannot but think that a deeper insight into the character of Christianity itself has led us to give all such accessories their true importance, and no more. The stranger may gaze with wonder at the far-stretching outworks and bastions of the fortress; but he who dwells within, knows that its strength is not only, nor chiefly, in these.

The reader who feels the force of our last remark, will have no difficulty in joining us in the assumption, with which we shall proceed to the consideration of the works mentioned at the head of this article.

We assume, that it was the Divine intention to reveal a religion, which should suffice for the moral and intellectual elevation of ALM MANKIND; which, laying its foundations in individual convictions, should clear and exalt the conscience, purify the affections, ennoble the intellect; while, at the same time, it disclosed a hope common to all men, and capable of sustaining under every possible trial of humanity. We assume, further, that this religion was Christianity. And we are thus led to the contemplation of definite historical facts. Christianity was introduced into the world at a certain time, and under certain circumstances. Can we, by examination of the state of mankind at the time, perceive any remarkable preparations for the assumed work which Christianity had to accomplish? Periods of this world's history may be conceived, singularly unfitted for the promulgation of a religion which was to take general hold on mankind. Does the period of the promulgation of Christianity present any remarkable contrast to these?

Again: if it was the intention of the All-wise to bring the whole of mankind under one bond of union, we might imagine that there would be visible in history some traces of previous preparation; that amidst the wars of states, and the conflict of opinions, we should find some advance made towards the possibility and efficacy of such a blending of both, as was destined hereafter to take place. Nay, we may go farther than this. Excluding mere chance from any part in the arrangement of man's world, we may fairly say a priori, that we might expect to find some adaptations in local circumstances themselves, to the end which was to be answered. Situations might be conceived, which should be most adverse to the accomplishment of the end assumed. Was Christianity introduced in those situations, or in others of a very different character?

Again, if Christianity is to be founded in individual convictions, the weapon of its warfare, above all others, must be persuasion; and in order to persuasion, there must be one able to persuade. Do we find any provision made for such a persuader? The work will be no ordinary nor easy one. The conflicting elements of the ancient social system could never be amalgamated, but by one specially and unusually prepared for the task.

The hierarchical prejudice of the Jew, the intellectual pride of the Greek, the political preëminence of the Roman, would present insuperable obstacles to any man who was not capable of entering into and dealing with each, not as extraneous to himself, but as a part of his own character and personality. And more than this. The religion of Christ was, from each of these elements, itself in danger. It might become hierarchical and Judaistic, or philosophic and Grecian, or might lose its great characteristics in the political liberalism of Rome. It would need one singularly fitted by education and temperament, to mark boldly and keenly the outlines of the faith to be preached; who, while he recognized the legitimacy of the Judaistic and Grecian elements in Christianity, and laid down the canons of civil and political conformity, might yet be under exclusive subjection to none of these, but able to wield and attempt them all.

Have we any traces of the preparation of a workman for such a work? Does any appear on the stage of the early Christian period, answering to these unusual and difficult requirements? Can we find any person able, at that time of strange complication and difficulty, to carry out all men's religion among all men?

Our readers will excuse us for entering somewhat into these questions, and endeavoring popularly to state the resolution of them with which Providence, in the course of history, has furnished us. They will thus be better able to appreciate the nature of the service which has been rendered to the Christian world by the authors whose works are mentioned at the head of the present article.

Mr. Howson strikingly remarks (p. 4), "The city of God was built at the confluence of three civilizations." The Jews, the Greeks, the Romans, had each borne their part in the preparation of the world for the Gospel. "They were" (it is the saying of Dr. Arnold, Life, ii. 413, 2nd edition) "the three peoples of God's election: two for things temporal, one for things eternal. Yet even in the things eternal they were allowed to minister: Greek cultivation, and Roman polity, prepared men for Christianity."

The first pages of the father of history are devoted to tracing the original quarrels and reprisals between the inhabitants of the opposite coasts of Europe and Asia. And if ever two continents were designed for intercourse, these surely were. The Grecian or Asiatic fisherman could hardly sail out from the beach of his native creek without being tempted onward by the blue islands in the distance, which, like so many stepping-stones to another land, stud the waters of the Ægean. Adventure in the early ages was inseparable from piracy: and as villages banded into states, and states into confederacies, piracy became war, and war brought national glory. Thus the first undying song celebrates the expedition of the confederate Greeks to Troy in reprisal for the rape of Helen. Nor should the commercial element in this early intercourse be forgotten; nor the important fact, that one article of commerce was the persons of men. The principal trading cities were Tyre and Sidon: and we have in the prophecy of Joel (whose most probable date is as far back as the ninth century, B. C.*) a distinct charge against the Tyrians and Sidonians, that they had "sold the children of Judah and Jerusalem to the sons of the Grecians†, that they might remove them far from their border." Thus we have the Jew at a very early period carried into Greece, and introduced into Grecian families; and the first nucleus formed of that vast dispersion, which we witness in subsequent history. The captivities, first of Israel, then of Judah, can hardly fail to have driven westward, through Asia Minor and the Greek colonies, some scattered portions of the main bodies of captives. And doubtless the break-up of the great remnant of Xerxes' army under Mardonius added considerably to the number of Jews in Greece. Mr. Howson has remarked (vol. i. p. 18), that about the time of the battles of Salamis and Marathon, a Jew was the minister, another Jew the cup-bearer, and a Jewess the consort of the Persian monarch. Great indeed must have been the number of Jews settled throughout the East.‡ The small gleanings which returned with Ezra and Nehemiah was as nothing compared with those who remained contented in the land of exile. Asia was full of Jews. On the coast and in the islands of the Ægean, along the Asiatic, European and African sides, we find Jews and their synagogues. By trade for themselves, or by the policy of their patrons and conquerors, they had been thickly planted in their chief rising seats of civilization and commerce. In Antioch, Alexandria, Cyrene, Corinth, Athens, Thessalonica, and many other well-known cities, we hear of Hebrew settlements more or less considerable in number.

‡ Mr. Blackburn refers to the residence of Ezekiel in Assyria, that the mighty minister to the captive Jews settled by the river Chebar. He repeats, on the authority of Layard (Nineveh and its Remains), that the description by Ezekiel of the interior of the Assyrian palaces so completely corresponds with the monuments of Nimrod and Khorsabad, that there can scarcely be a doubt that Ezekiel had seen the objects which he describes, — the figures sculptured upon the wall and painted. — Blackburn's Nineveh, its Rise and Ruin as illustrated by Ancient Scriptures and Modern Discoveries.

Nor is it too much to say, that the influence of these widely dispersed Jews must have been everywhere felt. In the case of the Jew alone was religion bound to a law of moral purity. The Jew only had a conscience, in the better and higher sense.* Everywhere a mystery to the surrounding heathen, despised by the cultivated and learned, he yet found his way into the bosom of households, and laid hold on those feelings after purity and truth, or even those weaknesses and pronenesses to superstition, which are common to the tender in age, or sex, or bodily constitution. We find, in some of the most renowned cities of the East, that a large proportion of the female inhabitants had embraced Judaism.† And allowing for every admixture of superstition and misunderstanding, there can be no doubt that better convictions, and a yearning after something more solid than Paganism, must be conceded to have operated widely on the proselyte class. Where such feelings existed, the way was being admirably prepared for a religion, which, founded on all that was true and permanent in Judaism, should yet winnow off the effete and temporary, and embody in itself, with yet loftier sanctions, all that was pure and good in it before.

But this was not always the character of the world-wide Judaism of the day. Regarding the conscientious "God-fearing" proselyte as the mean, we have, for our two extremes, Pharisaism and Hellenism.

The Pharisaic society formed a hierarchicopolitical combination only equalled in efficiency and influence by that of the Ulemas in Turkey or the Jesuits in modern times, and forming to this last, in some respects, a remarkable parallel. Schrader‡ has vividly depicted the zeal, aims, and practices of the Pharisees. By their stern theocratic exclusiveness, their minute literal observances, their proselytizing zeal, they formed the inner stronghold of Judaism — the conservative power which kept inviolate the letter long after the spirit had departed. At the same time that the gross materialism of their expected messianic kingdom attracted the lower and selfish multitude, the apparent earnestness and perfection of their legal obedience acted as a lure for better and loftier spirits. In comparison with the importance of collections for the temple, the first moral duties were set aside by them; weighed against the advancement of hierarchical Judaism, justice and mercy were light altogether. Their history, like that of the body to whom we have compared them, is one of intrigue, turbulence, and bloodshed. We find them in the courts of princes, and in the houses of widows; praying apart in the holy places at Jerusalem, and mingling with the great concourse at Rome; the stirrers-up of the people to sedition and tumult, the secret organizers of conspiracies, and subverters of thrones.

From this compact and organized body it was to be expected that Christianity would meet with the most determined opposition. They had been the bitterest enemies of its Divine Founder. His teaching was the negation of all their views; its success would be death to their dearest hopes. Moral purity was by Him upheld at the expense of ceremonial correctness; all hierarchical system was abolished by a religion whose foundations were laid in individual conviction; the messianic pomp of the expected kingdom was apparently resolved into some spiritual renovation, to them unintelligible, or, if understood, unwelcome.

Such was one, and that the prevailing element in the Judaism of the time; prevailing, not because numerically the greatest, but because in it was concentrated all the fire and zeal of the system; because it had the only organization, the only perfect unity of mutual understanding and action. The other, the Hellenistic element, embraced all those Jews who had become mingled with Grecians, used their language, and had learned their habits of thought. To them, for the most part, the sacred tongue was unknown. They had their own version of the Scriptures, made in their great metropolis, Alexandria. They formed a widely-spread and motley combination of various grades of opinion and practice. For the most part, Hellenism was a fruitless attempt to unite principles essentially discordant. Its philosophico-allegoric speculations on Scripture may have amused some ingenious minds like that of Philo; while, on the other hand, the refuge which its purer creed offered at small cost from the utter abandonment and hopelessness of heathenism, attracted many of the conscientious and upright; but we can hardly imagine in the Hellenist either logical consistency, or very fervent zeal.

As regarded Christianity, Hellenistic Judaism was a most important preparation. By it the essential truths of the Old Testament had long ago been clothed in the language of philosophic thought. At Alexandria, at Antioch, at Ephesus, the weapons had been prepared, with which the warfare of persuasion was to be carried on. It was the link between the schools of Athens and the schools of the Rabbis; the form in which, if at all, the truths of Christianity must be presented to the Grecian mind. The processes of dialectic argument, unknown to eastern composition, were eminently suited to a religion whose hearers were to prove all things, in order to hold fast that which is good. And it was now no new thing to have sacred truth propounded in these dialectic forms.

We have thus been gradually led to the second great element in the social system at the Christian era—the intellectual culture of Greece. If Humanity is to be gained for the highest purposes, the reason of man must be satisfied, and his intellect ennobled; nor can that be the religion under which man's highest state is to be realized, which is not prepared to enlist and consecrate every lawful use of his powers and faculties; to work in the lump until the whole is leavened. At the same time, let it be granted that this is to be done, not by unaided human power, but by a revelation from above—and it is manifest that a very important part of the preparation for receiving such a gift would be, the demonstration of the insufficiency of man himself to attain to this ennoblement of his powers. And this is the work which, in the designs of Providence, was accomplished by that wonderful development of the human intellect witnessed in ancient Greece. That a height of intellectual excellence should there have been reached which has never since been attained—that in philosophy, in art, and in poesy, the patterns for the world should there have been set once for all, will surprise only those who do not bear this purpose in mind.

But while the failure of Greek philosophy to regenerate mankind was thus in progress of demonstration, these highest exercises of man's intellect were but preparing the way for Him who was to come. The language of the Greeks is itself a wonderful monument of the culminating intellectual period of our race. In no other tongue under heaven can the minutest shiftings and distinctions of the mental feelings be expressed with so much precision. In no other are there so many varieties of construction and arrangement, by each of which some minute distinction of meaning or emphasis is given. In no other language have we so many apparently insignificant particles, by which the exact reference of secondary clauses to the main subject, and to one another, can be marked off and determined. In that language, every term relating to things human or divine had already been discussed, and its meaning labored out with marvellous patience and accuracy.

Nor was Providence, which was thus preparing a garb for Christianity, wanting in making it generally known and used. The dispersion of Greeks is hardly less wonderful than that of Jews. In early times, their colonies had spread along the coasts of Italy and Sicily, of Africa and Asia Minor. Their hostile intercourse or intrigues with Persia had gradually carried them further East; till finally the conquests of Alexander distributed the Greek tongue and influence over the whole of his vast but fleeting empire. Amidst the struggles and confusion incident on his death, this one effect alone of his conquests remained undisturbed and increasing. All the dynasties which sprang from his grave were Greek, and tended to consolidate the Grecian element which his victories had first introduced. Greek letters and arts became everywhere cultivated; the language usurped the place of the indigenous tongues in all polite intercourse. Nor was Judæa exempt from this influence. Lying between the contending kingdoms, and ever involved in their quarrels, it too received, although slowly and reluctantly, the unhallowed boom of Grecian culture.

There yet wanted a political power which might adjust to equilibrium these disturbing forces. Had the world been seething in tumult, as it was under the successors of Alexander, the propagation of Christianity would have been, humanly speaking, impossible.

And we must here express our opinion, that there are few things more instructive in history, than the relation of the Roman Empire to the spread of Christianity. Whether we regard it in its rise, at its height, or in its decline, we see in it a vast instrument to subserve the purposes of Providence with regard to the religion of Christ. In its rise, with which we are here more immediately concerned, by a rapid succession of conquests and annexations, it reduced to political unity and security the various conflicting powers whose struggles had hitherto distracted the world. Crushing and afflicting as was the character of its rule over its provinces, it was everywhere the government of order, and the friend of commercial intercourse. Among its works conducive to safe transit by sea and land, we may reckon, for the first, the extinction of piracy in the Mediterranean; for the second, the admirable roads with which every part of its vast territory was intersected. It was through these seas, and along these roads, that "the noble army of martyrs," as well as the armies of Rome, advanced to the conquest of the world. In times of restricted intercourse, and unsafe transit, these missionary journeys would have been impracticable.

The Roman policy with regard to religion was entirely consistent with the other parts of the system. Every existing religion of nation or tribe was sanctioned by law; but no countenance was given to the introduction of new tenets or modes of worship. Thus Christianity, for many years after its promulgation, grew up undistinguished from Judaism, and under the shelter of this religio licita as one of its sects. It was not till the inhabitants of whole districts flocked to baptism amidst the indignation of surrounding Jews and Pagans, that we find systematic persecution enjoined; and by that time Christianity was strong enough in numbers to be aided, rather than crushed, by such hostility.

During and for some time after the reigns of the first twelve Cæsars, the citizen of Rome was endowed with considerable privileges. Among these, exemption from corporal punishment, and the power of appealing to the people, were the chief and best known. It is true, that this last had now merged into an appeal to him who wielded, by his concentration of offices, the power of the populus and the plebs alike; but it had not, on that account, lost its value as a means of rescue from arbitrary decisions, and from the warping of justice by the venality of provincial judges.*

The foregoing sketch of the state of the world shortly after the Christian era, will enable us to lay down a priori the necessary and desirable qualifications of the man who is to be the main agent in propagating the Christian faith.

First. It is absolutely necessary, that he be a Jew. Founded as Christianity is on the ancient covenant and promises, its appeal to the world was mainly through Judaism; addressing itself "to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile." It is to the Jews that the preacher must look for his earliest and his most able converts; men who, having been reasoned with out of the law and the prophets, were thereby convinced, and prepared to convince others, that Jesus was the Christ. And none but a Jew would gain access to that exclusive and prejudiced people. The synagogues would be forbidden ground to a Gentile teacher; the ears of the Jews would be absolutely closed against him.

For the same reason, the Apostle of the world must be not a Hellenist, but of pure Hebrew descent. It is of the utmost importance that he should be able to speak and cite in the sacred language of the law and prophets. The Hellenists were looked on by the purer Jews with disparagement and contempt. They had their own synagogues, in which the sacred tongue was never heard, and to enter which would have been pollution to the scrupulous and rigid Pharisee. Thus a Hellenist would have acted at a great disadvantage, in leaving the central fortress of Judaism untouched, because to him inaccessible.

This last consideration will at once bring before us another requisite. None but the strictest sect of Judaism will furnish the man who shall be sufficient for this work. The pretended mysteries of the Rabbinical teaching must be in his grasp to deal with and set aside. None must be able to say of him, "This man, who knoweth not the law, is cursed." In one point at least his message to the Jews should be without fault: all should be compelled to look up to him as one trained to teach, and thoroughly capable of doing it. If the question, "Whence hath this man letters?" was for other and wise purposes permitted to be asked respecting Him who came to be rejected and suffer and die, it would have been, as far as we can judge, a serious obstacle to the work of one who must be to the Jews as a Jew, in order to persuade and gain them.

But yet another reason existed (and this is ably brought out by Schrader* and Neander†) why the great apostle of Christianity should be a Pharisee. Of all the opposition offered to Jesus of Nazareth, that of the Pharisees was the most consistent and entire. They saw in his teaching the abnegation of hierarchical Judaism. If He were a teacher from God, the ceremonial law had passed away, the barrier between Jew and Gentile was broken down, and Judaism became an empty husk henceforward. None thoroughly understood this but the bigoted Pharisee. The lapse of years, and the warning of heavenly visions, had not kept the greatest of the chosen Twelve from vacillating on this vital point; and there is every reason to believe that the Church at Jerusalem remained to the end practically prejudiced against the free admission of the union of mankind in Christ. Amidst all the difficulties and inconsistencies on this matter, he only would be sure never to go wrong, who having during his life of Pharisaic zeal keenly stigmatized as an abomination the anti-exclusive spirit of the religion of Jesus, had thus gained the clearest view of its universality, and in his conversion adopted this view as his own to the full.

But Jew and Pharisee as he must be, other elements must be mingled in him, which few who were Jews and Pharisees united in themselves. A Jew born in Palestine, and receiving a purely Jewish education, could have been a missionary for the most part to pure Jews only. It is plainly necessary that he be, though not a Hellenist himself, yet from youth accustomed to the use of the Hellenistic version of the Scriptures, together with the Hebrew original — nay more, from youth accustomed to the habits of thought and expression of the more cultivated Greeks — no stranger to the literature and rhetorical usage of that language which had been prepared for the work which Christianity had to do. The advantage of a boyhood spent in the haunts of Greek literary culture would be great, even if he himself did not frequent the schools for instruction. A certain pride in the place of his birth would lead a youth of genius to some acquaintance at least with the Greek writers who had sprung from it, or were connected with the studies there pursued; and the first remembrance of his early days would be bound up with his taste, however brief, of the sweets of profane literature. All this would eminently fit him to address a Grecian audience; to know the peculiar stumbling-blocks which the hearers must be taught cautiously to approach, and gently to step over; and skilfully to avoid incurring those charges, which might exaggerate in the Greek mind the repulsiveness of himself and his message. At the same time, no extraneous culture could educate a Pharisee. In the Holy City alone, and in the schools of the Jerusalem rabbis, was the fountain head of Judaism to be drawn from.

Thus we have arrived at the complicated, and we may conceive, not often united requirements, of pure Judaic extraction, with birth and early education among Hellenists and Grecians, and subsequent training in the rabbinical schools of Jerusalem. If, however, we rested here, one important advantage would be wanting. The great apostle is sure to incur the deadliest hatred of the Pharisaic party, which he has deserted to pass over to Christianity. That hatred will be unrelenting, and will pursue him wherever his message is delivered. No calumny will be spared, no attempt withheld, to make him odious to the local magistracies. Should he be found in Judea itself, the jealousy of the Roman procurators, ever ready to awake against turbulence and sedition, will be aroused to effect his ruin. One safeguard, and one only, humanly speaking, would obviate the danger of his career being cut short by conspiracy on the part of his enemies, or the tyranny of an unprincipled governor. If he possessed the privileges of a Roman citizen, his person would be safe from punishment at the hands of the officers of Rome; and an escape would be always open to him from conspiracy or apprehended injustice, in an appeal to the supreme power in the great metropolis.

We have said nothing of personal characteristics. That the apostle of the world should be full of earnestness and self-forgetting zeal, is too obvious to be insisted on. That a great persuader should, besides convincing men's minds, be able to win and keep their hearts—that he who wishes others to weep must weep himself—has long ago passed into an axiom. But we prefer filling in this part of the sketch à posteriori, from the facts themselves.

That the person so required was found—that so many and unusual attributes were combined in one individual—is known to us all. But it seems to have been reserved for our own age of biography and minute research, fully to trace all the qualifications of Saul of Tarsus for his great mission, and to point out their examples in his extraordinary career.

There is no work extant in which this is more laboriously and completely done than in Conybeare and Howson's "Life and Epistles of St. Paul." The names of the authors are vouchers for their ability to perform their task; and no one will consult their book without being convinced of the diligent research and careful accuracy with which it has been accomplished. No pains have been spared to gather information on every point of the apostle's life and the abundance and excellence of maps, and illustrations by landscapes and coins, make the book a complete manual of all that relates to the subject. The authorities referred to are given at length in the foot-notes, which greatly increases the value of the work to the scholar. On the whole, we doubt if any modern literature possesses a treatise more complete or satisfactory in its design and execution.

Perhaps there is a little too much of imaginative minuteness in some of the descriptions of the journeys of the Apostle; and we confess an objection to the frequent and sometimes bewildering illustration by reference to modern state relations or local circumstances. These, however, to which might be added an occasional want of condensation, and exuberance of style, are but slight faults, compared with the essential service which these authors have rendered to English biblical literature by their elaborate researches, and to English society by the pleasing and attractive garb in which they have clothed the results.

Into the important portion of the work which Mr. Conybeare has contributed—the translation of the Epistles—it is not our intention to enter critically. In such a wide field of controversy, philological and doctrinal, there will be much for every scholar to question. At the same time we have found much to approve; and we hail every independent scholar-like attempt to render the sacred text in our language, in hopes that it may lead at some time to the judicious removal of some of the acknowledged blots on our otherwise excellent authorized version.

Mr. Lewin's work, though published since the first volume of Conybeare and Howson, is an original contribution to the same subject, from a candid and diligent layman. While there is much in it that is really valuable, it is to be regretted that Mr. Lewin has not enriched and in some places rectified his book by the admirable and copious treatises which have of late years been published in Germany, and of which the authors of the former work have largely and most properly taken advantage. This fact tends to place Mr. Lewin's book altogether on lower ground than it should have occupied; while the unfortunate inaccuracy of its printing is continually confusing the reader.* At the same time, Mr. Lewin's useful historical memoirs, his plans of the principal towns, with geographical authorities cited at length†, and the justice and good feeling which he shows in his remarks, will prevent his work from being laid aside, and cause it to be retained as accessory to, or a cheaper substitute for, the more important and costly volumes of Conybeare and Howson.‡

We have placed two well-known German works on our list, because our neighbors have in this, as in most of the departments of biblical literature and research, the credit of having led the way, and suggested to ourselves the reproduction or expansion of their labors; and because there is something so well fitted in the German mind for treating subjects of this kind, that, after all acknowledged defects are allowed for, and evident excrescences pared away, we always have left, in the work of an intelligent German, abundant suggestive matter that is truly valuable, and nowhere else to be found.

Schrader's treatise spread its publication over the years 1830-1836; and considering the time, we cannot help ranking it as the most remarkable work on the subject. Its plan is that of a biography, with the chronology and doctrine treated of in separate volumes, and followed by a translation of the Epistles, with a commentary. For really sound research into the necessities and inner proprieties of St. Paul's preparation for his work, we know of no book which approaches Schrader's in value. We might perhaps be disposed to find a little fault with Mr. Howson for not having more abundantly transferred to his pages the interesting speculations of this author. We might think that some pruning of graphic description would have been more than compensated by giving us the substance of some of Schrader's valuable chapters in his second volume on the personal character and training of the Apostle.

At the same time, there is one part of Schrader's work which disfigures it in common with many of the best German treatises on matters connected with historical Christianity. We mean its perfectly gratuitous rationalism. If Saul was in reality, as Schrader and we are sorry to say Neander also would have us believe, merely struck with lightning on the way to Damascus—not only were the solemn words then related to have been spoken to him, and on which he distinctly grounds his apostleship, the offspring of his excited imagination—but he must himself be charged with deliberate falsehood and imposture; for in neither of the narratives of his conversion which we possess from his own lips, is there the slightest intimation of a storm having overtaken the party, but an evident intention to imply that, in the brightness of the noonday sun, a light brighter still was shed around him, and a supernatural voice plainly heard, answered, and heard again, the speaker being all the while distinctly seen.*

Neander's work is well known in this country by translations, as one of the most valuable contributions to an intelligent appreciation of the mind and mission of the various great Apostles, and the conflicts and character of the first Christian age. Tinged strongly with the peculiarities of the German school, it yet exhibits so thorough an understanding of the position, wants, and divisions of the nascent Church, and so admirable a spirit of Christian faith and charity, as to have be-

* If, to take another instance (and here we must include Mr. Lewin in our reprehension, and even complain somewhat of the guarded and ambiguous language of Mr. Howson), the pythoness at Philippi was not really possessed by a spirit, but only (we quote Mr. Lewin) "subject to ravings, and at the present day would merely be committed to the charge of a keeper"—how on the one hand can we account for those ravings taking daily the form of vehement recognition of the divine mission of the Apostle, and how on the other can we give any consistent account of her cure, which both these authors believe to have followed on St. Paul's words? Far better and deeper in this instance Neander, who, though he supposes the case need not imply possession by a personal evil spirit, yet distinctly recognizes the agency of the chief spirit of evil, and the maiden's liberation from it by the Apostle. See the whole matter very satisfactorily treated in the recent work of Baumgarten, "Die Apostel-geschichte, oder der Entwicklungsgang der Kirche von Jerusalem bis Rom," vol. ii. § 26. There is a sensible and able refutation of the rationalistic views of Saul's conversion in Hamson's "Apostel Paulus," p. 12, ff.

* The Greek is printed without accents, a practice against which every scholar should protest, and about as rational as it would be to print an English work without crossing the i's or dotting the i's. The punctuation of the text is in some places in utter confusion. Take an example:—"but, at night he escaped from his guard, and got on board, and reached, Alexandria." (P. 84.) Such abound throughout.

† His geographical notices are not always accurate: e. g., where, in speaking of Myra, he makes it the metropolis of Lycia in the apostolic times, on the authority of the Synecdemus of Hierocles, a work of the sixth century; and in the same notice makes the distinct rivers Limyrus and Andriaki into one.

‡ Mr. L. gives the Epistles in the authorized version, with a few departures, and those not always for the better.

come an indispensable element in the study of the apostolic history.

We shall proceed now, with the aid of the works which we have characterized, in some measure to fill in a posteriori the outlines given above. To do this continuously would be out of the question. We must necessarily select a few salient points of the history as examples of the rest.

The destined Apostle of the Gentiles was born of pure Jewish descent, "a Hebrew of Hebrews," at Tarsus, the capital of the province of Cilicia, a few years probably after our era. With his birth he inherited the citizenship of Rome.* His native place, characterized by himself as "no mean city," was one of the most celebrated seats of Greek learning. Two eminent Stoics, Athenodorus the tutor of Augustus, and Nestor of Tiberius, were taken from the school of Tarsus. Strabo gives it the preference over Athens and Alexandria, and every other academy of the time. No city could be imagined more fitting for the birthplace of an apostle of the Gentiles. Free from the warping influences which would have beset a childhood in Athens, Alexandria, or Rome, the Hebrew youth might here stray without danger into the pleasant paths of Grecian literature.† We know that his main education was Jewish. In all probability, both the Hebrew text of the Scriptures and the Septuagint version were familiar to him from childhood. The former would be sure to be known and read in a pure Hebrew family; and the familiarity with which he cites the latter from memory, can hardly be accounted for except by early habitude. Mr. Howson traces, with that graphic minuteness which, while it is sometimes his temptation, is undoubtedly also his excellence, the illustrious recollections connected with the tribe of Benjamin, and with his own royal name, which would stir the spirit of the eager Hebrew boy — and the fine emotions with which one capable of the feelings which we find expressed in his writings, would wander by the clear cold stream of the Cydnus, and gaze on the snowy heights of Taurus.

But other and more exciting scenes soon rose upon his view. We can hardly conceive the burst of enthusiasm with which such a Jewish youth, educated in exile, first beheld the spot where Jehovah had placed His name. We may well conceive that from the time of the youthful Saul entering the Holy City, his previous intercourse with Hellenism was dropped, and he devoted himself zealously to the study of the law and traditions of his fathers. He himself appeals to the fact many years after: "My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among mine own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews; which knew me from the beginning, if they would testify, that after the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee." (Acts xxvi. 4, 5.)

"Having a foundation of excellent natural talents gifted with creative profundity, and a rare clearness and energy of thought, he made his own the whole cycle of Rabbinical Scripture-lore, its jurisprudence and its theology, the different exegeses of the Bible, its allegory, typology, and tradition, as his Epistles sufficiently show. By this theoretical education, he was enabled, in after times, so powerfully and convincingly to refute Pharisaical errors, and to unfold the most profoundly and amply of all the Apostles the intrinsic doctrines of Christianity. By nature an ardent and decided character, armed with the choleric and melancholic temperament found among reformers, he embraced whatever he once held to be right with all his soul, and was thus inclined to a rude straightforwardness and action in extremes. Thus he became a Pharisee of the strongest kind, and a blind zealot for the law of his fathers (Phil. iii. 6., Gal. i. 13, 14)."

Saul was never a hypocrite. He hated the name and followers of Jesus from his innermost soul. In this he nobly differed from many of his elders and compeers, who in hypocrisy carried on an opposition to a teaching which in their hearts they approved, but saw to be the certain ruin of their worldly hopes. Schrader (ii. 47, ff.) brings out well this difference, and speculates on its probable effects. It was no small thing for Pharisaism to possess a partisan of an earnest and thorough spirit — one too, who was not, like the Palestine Jews, confined to a narrow Judaistic circle of experience, but had from childhood known Gentile persons and practices. Is it not certain that they who compassed sea and land to make one proselyte, would be carefully

* This fact is as certain as its explanation is obscure. It was formerly assumed (by Tillemont and Cave, see C. and H. vol. i. p. 49) that the privilege belonged to natives of Tarsus; but more accurate knowledge has precluded this. The probable account is that which Mr. Howson has adopted, that Saul's father had gained the citizenship as the reward of services rendered during the civil wars to some influential Roman.

† We find him quoting Aratus (a Cilician poet), Epimenides, and Euripides, or Menander. Where did he read these authors, if not in his early youth at Tarsus?

* Schaff, Geschichte der Christlichen Kirche von ihrer Gründung bis auf die Gegenwart, vol. i. p. 163. This work, of which the first volume was last year published in America (Mercersburg, Pa.), promises to be one of the best compendiums extant of Church history. Its spirit is thoroughly Christian, its arrangement clear, its style lively and attractive; and it contains notices of the most recent German and other opinions on every question as it arises.

training such an one for a missionary of their own and promising themselves by his coöperation a rich accession of Gentile converts! If so, Pharisaism was eventually pierced to death by a shaft winged with its own feather.

We must quote Schrader for the further usefulness to Saul of his Pharisaic education:—

In order to defend themselves against the attacks of Jesus, and retain their own influence, the Pharisees not only availed themselves of excommunication and persecution of those who would not implicitly obey them, but sought even more eagerly to fill their partisans with inexpiable hate of Him. This was the easier, because to those who reckoned Pharisaism as a thing from God, Jesus could only appear as God's enemy. It required no perversion of truth to prove this. They need only say that He was the greatest foe of the patriarchal traditions, did not keep the Sabbath, did not fast, nor pray as other men, neglected the necessary washings, held converse with Samaritans and Gentiles, placed them on a level with Jews, nay, required and yielded obedience to the Gentile government, gave himself out for the Messiah, &c., and they were sure to render their fanatical scholars His irreconcilable enemies. But to Paul, all this was of the utmost value. He thus learnt to apprehend in many respects the plan and intentions of Jesus more correctly than even His own friends and disciples. To these last it appeared impossible, in their deep reverence for their Master, that He should in any way have impugned or rejected that which was to them above all things precious and sacred. And hence it was that they so seldom understood His sentiments, which deviated from the established maxims, and so often defended him against the charge of transgressing or rejecting the Mosaic law. The Pharisees, on the contrary, veiled nothing; to them it was a delight to lay hold of, and disseminate among their partisans, such acts and sayings of Jesus as contradicted that which had usually been esteemed true and divine. . . . As the foe of the ancient traditions and precepts, and of Pharisaism, as the abrogator of the law of Moses and of Judaism, as the friend and enfranchizer of Gentiles and sinners—thus was the image of Jesus vividly present in the heart of the Pharisee Saul. And as it often happens to those among us who advance far before their age, that their views are rightly apprehended, and therefore decried by their opponents, but misunderstood by their friends, and by way of justification attempted to be reconciled with doctrines previously held, thus it was also in the case of our Lord; His friends and worshippers were blind, and His enemies only had eyes to see His intentions. (Vol. ii., p. 82, f.)

With such an impression of Jesus, and with his earnest character and fiery temper, Saul could not but be a persecutor. To extinguish the hated name—to prevent the obnoxious sect from spreading in or out of Jerusalem—would be an exertion worthy of all his energies. To this accordingly we find him devoting himself, when the sacred narrative first introduces him to our notice.

The question, whether he had seen our Lord in the flesh, is wrapped in obscurity. The probable answer is in the negative. Had he taken any part in the acts of the Pharisees during the eventful period of the ministry of Jesus, he would hardly have passed it over in silence in those passages where he speaks so freely of his state and acts as a persecutor; and that he should have been present, and have taken no part, is inconceivable. Why he was absent from Jerusalem during those three years, it is impossible to say. It may have been just the interval between the completion of his Rabbinical training and his maturity as a member of the Sanhedrin, which we afterwards find him. He may have been at Tarsus, or on travel. That he should not yet have arrived as a youthful scholar, is chronologically improbable. However it was, such seems to have been the fact; and his first hostile efforts were brought to bear on the Church about eight years after the Ascension.

We refer to Mr. Howson for the complete detail of the trial and execution of Stephen, and for some able remarks on the influence, in after times, which the apology of the martyr seems to have had on the mind of his chief persecutor. It has been assumed by recent writers (Schrader, Olshausen, Neander), that a deep immediate impression was made on Saul's mind by the circumstances of the death of Stephen, and that he was in a remorseful state of self-questioning when he undertook his errand to Damascus. But this idea, intimately bound up as it is with the rationalistic interpretation of the narrative of his conversion, is entirely opposed to the history (Acts ix. 1), and to his own assertion: "Being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted them even unto strange cities." We have no reason whatever to suppose that any change had taken place in his sentiments towards Christianity. Nay, we quite agree with Baumgarten in placing here the culminating point of his zeal, and seeing in this sudden arrest and turning of his course by the working of Divine wisdom and power, a fitness for the occasion and for the character and temperament of the man. As Bengel strikingly remarks, "in summo furore peccandi ereptus et conversus est."*

Of all that has been written on the mind and feelings of Saul consequent on his conversion, we have read with the greatest interest the remarks of Baumgarten, vol. i. pp.

* Such too was the view of Chrysostom: καὶ ὅταν αὐτὸς ἀπίστος, ἀμύδιτος ἐπὶ τῷ πνεύματι, τοιοῦτο αὐτῷ ἐπέγυνεν ὁ Χριστός. C. & M. l. p. 108.

198-223. On one point only we entirely differ from him. He spends some pages in tracing during this period the inner experience detailed by the Apostle, Rom. vii. 7-25. We believe the greater part of that weighty passage to belong to an earlier and totally different portion of his life; and it seems to us strange that a writer who has taken so just a psychological view of his subject should have adopted a theory which tends completely to confuse it, and destroy its unity. This is not the place to discuss and appropriate that description; it may suffice to say that, while we distinctly recognize its autobiographical character, we see in it a reference to a process much more frequent in the human mind, and better calculated to be a general pattern for us all, than that by which the zeal of the persecutor became transformed into the zeal of the apostle.

Some degree of mystery has always rested on the visit to Arabia;^{*} but almost all writers are agreed in connecting it with an immediate reception of the Gospel from Christ himself. Mr. Howson indeed gives the alternative, that perhaps he went to preach "in the synagogues of that singular capital which was built amidst the exiles of Edom, whence 'Arabians' came to the festivals at Jerusalem (Acts ii. 11);" but we must own the other alternative seems to us more probable; and that, whether the rationalistic or the supernatural view be taken. The former is given by Schrader (ii. p. 147):—

He cared not, previously to the public opening of his ministry, to obtain information from other men in a matter which was accessible to him by his own reason (?), but preferred shortly after his baptism to retire apart from all human society to the solitude of the Arabian wilderness; with this view beyond doubt, undistractedly to prepare himself for the work of the promulgation of Christianity, to meditate on his present circumstances, to think of that which lay before him, to make powerful resolutions, or rather to confirm himself in the resolution already made, and to take counsel of God and of himself, or of that which was become a divine or living principle within him. In this he acted as other men of great and independent character have done, and even as Jesus himself, who also immediately after His baptism withdrew Himself for a similar purpose into the same wilderness.

But sensible as this view is as far as it goes, none can fail to see how entirely inadequate it is to satisfy the requisitions of the historical facts resulting, or the assertions of the Apostle himself. In a passage (2 Cor. xii. 1, ff.) where he is undoubtedly describing his own experience, and referring to a period not far removed from this, he speaks of "abundance of" visions and "revelations" being granted to him, and recounts in mysterious words the nature of some of these. We should therefore be much more disposed to agree with Baumgarten, when he says (vol. i. 223):—

Those will take the right view of this sojourn of Saul in Arabia who regard it as a still retirement, in which he lived in communion in the spirit with the Lord in Heaven, as the original Apostles had conversed with the Lord on Earth.

Another difficulty belongs to this period, which has been very variously dealt with. The facts are simply these. Some physical weakness, of a conspicuous and distressing kind, resulted from the exaltation of the spirit at the expense of the body. Perhaps his own words—"when I could not see for the glory of 'that light,'"—may furnish some clue to its origin. Feebleness of sight, connected probably with some nervous infirmity, may have constituted the thorn in the flesh, concerning which he prayed thrice that it might depart from him: which made his "bodily presence weak, and his speech contemptible;"^{*} and of which he could say to the Galatians, "My temptation which was in my flesh ye despised not, nor rejected. . . I bear you record, that if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me."[†] But even this, whatever it was, served him as an argument for the divine character of his mission. It precluded any imputation that he had won his converts by the charms of graceful rhetoric; he was among them "in weakness, and fear, and much trembling." So does every circumstance in the life of this remarkable man fit into its place, and bear its part in the work prepared for him.

Five years at least elapsed after his conversion before we find him actively engaged in ministerial labor. He certainly was not idle, but his proper vocation had not begun. There had apparently been nothing more than fragmentary testimonies in the synagogues. At Damascus and at Jerusalem he had been exposed to the fury of those Jews, whom he had now through life for his implacable enemies. At both places he was rescued by the brethren; who yet, not knowing in what department to employ the zeal of the new convert, sent him back to his native town, to wait a special call of Providence.

A great question soon began to be agitated in the Church. Was Christianity to be preached to the Gentiles? That they were eventually to share in its blessings, no believing Jew doubted; but how this was to be brought about, was yet unknown. The first step towards a solution seems to have been taken at Antioch, by certain Cyprian and African Hellenists, who had fled on the perseentation which arose about Stephen, having *spoken to Gentiles in that city. This new step aroused the attention of the mother-church at Jerusalem. Barnabas, himself a Cyprian, was sent to report on the movement, or perhaps to restrain what was deemed an excess of zeal. By what he saw, he was convinced, and sympathized. But joy was not his only feeling at seeing the Gentile converts. The time for action was obviously come. There was one in retirement, to whom it had been said, "I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles." He went to Tarsus to seek Saul. For a year they taught at Antioch, which became the second historical capital of Christendom, the great centre of activity during the transition-state from Judaism, and most appropriately the birthplace of that name, by which those who were neither Jew nor Greek, barbarian nor Scythian, were in future to be called. After a journey to Jerusalem for a special eleemosynary purpose, the two friends depart, by Divine command, on their first great missionary journey.

The whole process of this, as of the other journeys, is admirably narrated, discussed, and illustrated by Conybeare and Howson. We have every accessory which could be desired. Recent surveys and soundings have furnished accurate maps of almost every country and coast; while Mr. Bartlett's beautiful drawings give reality to the scenery of the most remarkable spots. There can hardly be more pleasant reading for the lover of travel and adventure, than the pages of this work which trace the Apostle through Cyprus, or Asia Minor, or Greece, or afterwards on his perilous voyage by Malta to Rome. And it is no small merit of the work that, while it extracts information from every source, an admirable spirit of Christian faith, accompanied by a manly love of truth and soundness of judgment, characterize it throughout. While its hand is in every German treatise, its heart is thoroughly English; and its effect will everywhere be, to confirm those great central truths, round which it has grouped the accessory and subordinate matter.

The first eminent fruit of this journey was the conversion of the proconsul of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus. From this time Saul becomes known by the Hellenistic name of Paul. The coincidence is at least remarkable, and may not have been altogether fortuitous. But that the Apostle, as Jerome and Augustine believed, took the name from his convert, we may with safety deny. Such a piece of secular conceit was wholly alien from his character; and could only pass current when that character was, as a whole, very imperfectly studied. It is far more probable that the change marks the transition from his earlier memoirs, when from the still Jewish character of the Church his Hebrew name prevailed, to those recording his preaching among Gentiles. The bearing of two names, the original Oriental appellation, and the same Græcized or Romanized, in sound or meaning, was very common.*

During this journey we have striking instances of the fitness of the Great Apostle for becoming all things to all men, that he might by all means win some. At Antioch, in Pisidia, we have his first recorded discourse. It was delivered to Jews, and besides its historical detail, so suitable to his hearers, contains, as Mr. Howson justly observes, the kernel of that great argument which he afterwards unfolded in the Epistle to the Romans. At Lystra we find him dissuading the heathen multitude from sacrificing to his companion and himself, in words of singular skill and beauty, founded on an argument from natural theology, far too expansive for any mere Pharisee to have propounded.

On the commencement of the next journey a personal dispute separated from him the former companion of his toils and dangers. He is henceforth either alone, or accompanied by a group of which he is unquestionably the centre; thus bringing his apostolic agency more plainly into relief, and removing all possibility of actual rivalry, or, which was more to be apprehended, the setting up of one against another in the minds of converts.

It is on this journey that the most remarkable instances of that which we are illustrating are presented to us. It originated in that affectionate yearning after converts once gained, which we see so often expressed in his Epistles. This directed his way to Derbe, Lystra, and Iconium. His course lay through his native province and city; and Mr. Howson is justified in raising on the well known character of the Apostle the following supposition:—

One other city must certainly have been visited. If there were churches anywhere in Cilicia, there must have been one at Tarsus. It was the metropolis of the province; Paul had resided there, perhaps for some years, since the time of his conversion; and if he loved his native place well enough to speak of it with something

* The reading Ἑλλήνας for the Ἑλληνιστάς of the received text, is now almost universally adopted. The received reading would stultify the whole narrative. There was and could be no difficulty about preaching to Hellenists.

We do not in the text forget, nor depreciate the importance of the special mission of Peter to Cornelius; but regard this incident as necessarily prior in point of time, and that, as intended more to give solemn sanction in the sight of those who would be most difficult to persuade, than to precede all efforts of the kind.

* See Grotius' note in loc.; and Conybeare and Howson, vol. i. p. 164.

like pride to the Roman officer at Jerusalem, he could not be indifferent to its religious welfare. Among the "Gentiles of Cilicia," to whom the letter which he carried was addressed, the Gentiles of Tarsus had no mean place in his affections. And his heart must have overflowed with thankfulness, if, as he passed through the streets which had been familiar to him since his childhood, he knew that many households were around him where the gospel had come, "not in word only but in power," and the relations between husband and wife, parent and child, master and slave, had been purified and sanctified by Christian love. No doubt the city still retained all the aspect of the cities of that day, where art and amusement were consecrated to a false religion. The symbols of idolatry remained in the public places—statues, temples, and altars—and the various "objects of devotion," which in all Greek towns, as well as in Athens (Acts xvii. 23), were conspicuous on every side. But the silent revolution was begun. Some families had already turned "from idols to serve the living and true God." The "dumb idols" to which, as Gentiles, they had been "carried away even as they were led," had been recognized as "nothing in the world," and been "cast to the moles and to the bats." The homes which had once been decorated with the emblems of a vain mythology, were now bright with the better ornaments of faith, hope, and love.

We leave in the able hands of our authors the description of the journey itself, and select one or two points for our especial purpose.*

At Neapolis, the port of Philippi, the missionary band, now augmented by the youthful Timotheus, and Luke "the beloved physician," first set foot in Europe. From the high grounds above that town, they gazed on the plains where the world was lost and won; arrived at the walls of the now flourishing colony, they entered a miniature of that great capital in which the Apostle had already resolved to bear witness to Christ. Here, amidst the insignia of Roman power, in a Greek city, they sought out the few Jews who assembled by the river brink outside the gate for the purpose of prayer. The combination is singular, and more remarkable, as we reflect how many ages had been spent in bringing it about, how many and jarring influences had converged. Here we have the first record of the Roman citizenship having procured for the Apostle and his companion an honorable dismissal, and doubtless for the cause which he preached respect and protection, after illegal treatment during a tumultuary outbreak.

* We cannot withhold our praise from the minute and very satisfactory manner in which the contemporary geography of Asia Minor is discussed and illustrated in this chapter. Certainly the sacred chronicle has never before had such diligent and loving labor bestowed on it.

But before he had been many weeks in Macedonia, the enmity of the resident Jews had been thoroughly aroused, and they were acting in concert against him. They drove him first from Thessalonica, then from Beroea. It became necessary to take measures for his safety. As at Damascus, the brethren sent him away by night. His destination was a distant part of Greece, where the enmity of the Thessalonian Jews might for a time be baffled. He went by sea to Athens.

And here we have everything present, which can kindle enthusiasm in the breast of the Christian scholar. For those who have tasted deeply the sweets of art, poetry, or philosophy, there is an indescribable charm in all that is connected with Athens. It is the metropolis of the human intellect; the holy city of the nether world, as Jerusalem is of the upper. And when, as in this case, the two are linked together—when we see the man prepared by Jewish birth and training, united with Grecian culture, standing on the Areopagus and preaching God's revelation, we feel, if ever we do, the unity and harmony in the divine counsels of all that is holy and beautiful and great in man; that ours is not a nature of bright fragments, disjointed and helpless, but that there is a power able to unite and hallow all that is good, or seeking after good, amongst us. His ἀρχαῖος ἄστυς comes on us with its familiar sound, as we have heard it from Pericles and Demosthenes and the illustrious masters of persuasion, like a well-known strain grafted into some loftier harmony. In the stately periods of this second and nobler Areopagitica, we read an indubitable proof that the speaker had drunk no shallow draughts at the fountains of Grecian learning. Perhaps there does not exist a more perfect specimen than this speech affords us of cautious prudence and consummate skill. It might well be so, when such a man had been so prepared; when a mind of the highest order was enlightened and directed by the special suggestions of superhuman wisdom. The authors at the head of our article have vied with one another in its praise. An able analysis is besides given in Hemsen, Der Apostel Paulus, pp. 148, 149.

But Athens was not destined to be noted in the annals of the Apostolic Church. We know nothing of any permanent fruit of the Apostle's residence there. It was not from the stronghold of the human intellect that the Gospel was to win its most numerous or brightest trophies.

It is a serious and instructive fact, that the mercantile population of Thessalonica and Corinth received the message of God with greater readiness than the highly educated and polished Athenians. Two letters to the Thessalonians, and two to the Corinthians, remain to attest the flourishing state of those churches. But we pos-no letter written by St. Paul to the Athenians, and we do not read that he was ever in Athens again. (Vol. i., p. 409.)

The next visit was to the capital of the province, the rich and dissolute Corinth.

The reasons which determined St. Paul to come to Corinth (over and above the discouragement he seems to have met with in Athens) were, probably, twofold. In the first place, it was a large mercantile city, in immediate connection with Rome and the West of the Mediterranean, with Thessalonica and Ephesus in the Ægean, and with Antioch and Alexandria in the East. The Gospel once established in Corinth, would rapidly spread everywhere. And, again, from the very nature of the city, the Jews established there were numerous. Communities of scattered Israelites were found in various parts of the province of Achaia—in Athens, as we have recently seen—in Argos, as we learn from Philo—in Boeotia and Eubœa. But their chief settlement must necessarily have been in that city, which not only gave opportunities of trade by land along the Isthmus between the Morea and the continent, but received in its two harbors the ships of the Eastern and Western seas. A religion which was first to be planted in the synagogue, and was thence intended to scatter its seeds over all parts of the earth, could nowhere find a more favorable soil than among the Hebrew families at Corinth. (Ib., p. 410.)

Into the many points of interest which now gather round us, we must forbear to enter at any length. At Corinth, St. Paul wrote his first extant Epistle to his Thessalonian converts. There commenced that invaluable series of letters in which, while every matter relating to the faith is determined once for all with demonstration of the spirit and power, and every circumstance requiring counsel at the time, so handled as to furnish precepts for all time, the whole heart of this wonderful man is poured out and laid open. Sometimes he pleads, and reminds, and conjures in the most earnest strain of fatherly love; sometimes playfully rallies his converts on their vanities and infirmities; sometimes, with deep and bitter irony, concedes that he may refute, and praises where he means to blame. The course of the mountain torrent is not more majestic nor varied. We have the deep, still pool, the often returning eddies, the intervals of calm and steady advance, the plunging and foaming rapids, and the thunder of the headlong cataract. By turns fervid and calm, argumentative and impassioned, he wields familiarly and irresistibly the varied weapons of which Providence had taught him the use. With the Jew he reasons by Scripture citation, with the Gentile by natural analogies; with both, by the testimony of conscience to the justice and holiness of God. Were not the Epistles of Paul among the most eminent of inspired writings, they would long ago have been ranked as the most wonderful of uninspired.

It is not to be supposed, that we now possess all or nearly all the letters written by the Apostle. If we take into account his fervid and affectionate spirit, and the frequency of communication between the principal cities of the Roman world and along the great roads, we may safely say, that many Epistles of guidance, warning, and encouragement were addressed by him to the numerous churches. Of these he mentions* one to Laodicea, now not extant; and it is necessary, unless we do almost more than commentators' violence to the natural construction of words, to suppose a lost Epistle to have been sent to Corinth. The interesting letter to Philemon was doubtless one of a large class addressed to individuals.

And not only have Epistles been lost, but voyages and visits to churches remain unrecorded. The phenomena of the Epistles to the Corinthians are not satisfied by the history in the Acts. If there be plain meaning in plain words, the visit which he was about to pay them when he sent the Second Epistle, would be the third.† But the History informs us of only one previously paid. It becomes necessary then to interpolate a voyage to Corinth during the "three years'" stay at Ephesus of Acts xix.; for this is the only admissible time. And this has accordingly been done by almost all modern critics. Mr. Howson devotes some space to an able description of the probability and nature of this visit. We cannot, however, agree with Wieseler in uniting with it the sojourn to Crete implied in the Epistle to Titus, nor in placing that letter itself, or any of the so-called Pastoral Epistles, at this period; seeming to us as they do to bear unquestionable evidence of a much later date.

We pass on to the return from the third visit to Corinth. For many years now had the hostility of his own countrymen pursued the Apostle. Bitter and unrelenting, it met him at every station of his apostolic work. As an omen of this journey, a conspiracy awaits him as he is about to set sail for Syria. But it is defeated by a change of plan. The old route is retraced. The Egnation Way is once more traversed to Philippi. His heart at this time seems to have been unusually full—his words more than ever impassioned and earnest. What outpourings of affection would there be to the Thessalonians, "his glory and his joy," — to the Philippians, "his brethren dearly beloved and longed for, his joy and his crown!" But we are not left to conjecture. We hear of a whole night's discourse at Alexandria Troas. We have the tone of his spirit feelingly struck in the short hint that he sent the ship round Cape Lectum to Assos — "for thus had he arranged, intending himself to go afoot."*

* Col. iv. 16.

† We are well aware of the ingenuity which the ἄλλοις ἁγίοις ἐκ τῆς ἰδέας of ch. xii. 14, and the ἄλλοις τοῖς ἐξομαί of ch. xiii. 1, have been twisted different ways by commentators to escape this third visit. But we hope an age of biblical exegesis is dawning, when we shall inquire no longer what words may mean, but what they do mean.

He hastened, therefore, through the southern gate, past the hot springs, and through the oak woods — then in full foliage — which cover all that shore with greenness and shade, and across the wild water-courses on the western side of Ida. Such is the scenery which now surrounds the traveller on his way from Troas to Assos. The great difference then was, that there was a good Roman road, which made St. Paul's solitary journey both more safe and more rapid than it could have been now. We have seldom had occasion to think of the Apostle in the hours of his solitude. But such hours must have been sought and cherished by one whose whole strength was drawn from communion with God, and especially at a time when, as on this present journey, he was deeply conscious of his weakness, and filled with foreboding fears. There may have been other reasons why he lingered at Troas after his companions; but the desire for solitude was doubtless one reason among others. The discomfort of a crowded ship is unfavorable for devotion; and prayer and meditation are necessary for maintaining the religious life even of an Apostle. That Saviour to whose service he was devoted had often prayed in solitude on the mountain, and crossed the brook Kedron to kneel under the olives of Gethsemane. And strength and peace were surely sought and obtained by the Apostle from the Redeemer, as he pursued his lonely road that Sunday afternoon in spring, among the oak woods and the streams of Ida. (Conybeare and Howson, vol. ii. p. 214.)

He had a strong presentiment that this would be his last apostolic journey. He had determinedly set his face towards Jerusalem. Like his Master, he had a baptism to be baptized with, and was straitened till it was accomplished. He dared not trust himself at Ephesus, the scene of his former labors and dangers. He might be involved in the one or the other anew, and thus his object be foiled. But the ship tarried a short day or two at Miletus. He sent for the Ephesian elders — he spoke to them his second great discourse — the noblest extant effusion of love, as that at Athens of wisdom.

Then pass rapidly before us the great crises of his course. His apprehension at Jerusalem — his rescue from the conspiracy of the Jews — his detention at Cæsarea — all hastened on the fulfilment of the divine announcement, "As thou hast borne witness at Jerusalem, so thou must bear witness at Rome."

* Acts xx. 13.

We laid great stress at the outset on the importance of his Roman citizenship. It was this which prevented his life falling a sacrifice to the caprice or corruption of the procurators of Judæa. It was this which rescued him from the conspiracies of his fellow-countrymen. It was this again which secured his transmission to the metropolis.

But we may turn aside to remark, in the two apologies delivered by him during this interval, new proofs of exquisite tact and skill. The narrative of his conversion is common to both. The first is made before the infuriated Jewish multitude in their native tongue. He probably foresaw that he should hardly be heard to its termination. But, at all events, it was an opportunity for them to hear from his own lips, unvitiated by the misrepresentations of his enemies, the account of the momentous change which befell him. Accordingly, he uses all possible caution in his narration. Every word is carefully chosen. To the Jews he speaks as a Jew. The Christian faith is "this way;" the Jews at Damascus are "the brethren." The hated Name is avoided throughout, — used but once, and that in the speech of another. Ananias is "a devout man, according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews who dwell there;" not a word is breathed about his being "a disciple" (Acts ix. 10). In the second apology, all the circumstances are changed. He is speaking under the safeguard of his civil privileges, before the Roman procurator, the Jewish king, and an assemblage of the high officers of both. The detail, so useful in the other case, but likely to be wearisome here, is altogether dropped. Ananias does not appear. The "heavenly vision" is represented as embracing the whole command given in fact through Ananias, and all the weight is laid on the paramount duty of yielding obedience to it. Thus we have two distinct treatments of the same occurrence, both strictly within the limits of truth, both admitting of illustration and justification by the ordinary methods of speaking among men, adapted with exquisite skill to the different trying circumstances under which the orator was placed.

We come now to that voyage to Italy, so full of incident and adventure, so rich in materials for the research of the geographer, the sailor, and let us add, the psychologist. The duties of the two former have been admirably fulfilled by an English gentleman, whose work concludes the list at the head of our article. After the labors of Mr. Smith, there can be no doubt left on any reasonable mind as to the direction of the Apostle's course, or the accurate trustworthiness of the history. The idea that St. Paul was shipwrecked not on Malta, but on Melita or Meleda, high up in the gulf of Venice, was preposterous enough at any time, when compared with the requirements of the narrative; but has now, by an abundance of circumstantial evidence of the plainest and most satisfactory kind, been fairly scouted out of the field. We cannot follow Mr. Smith through the various interesting steps of the identification of the scene of the shipwreck with St. Paul's Bay at Malta, but recommend our readers to study them in the book itself, believing that they will find them, as we have done, irrefragable. Mr. Smith has also done excellent service by bringing his naval experience and reading to bear on the various nautical incidents recorded. He has shown that the course adopted under each trying circumstance was precisely that which good seamanship dictated; that the very shiftings and characteristics of the wind were such as are well known to and expected by sailors in the Levant at that time of the year. He has elicited some curious results respecting the character of St. Luke's naval knowledge; showing that he was not a sailor, but a landsman well accustomed to the sea. This point he illustrates by the journals of others similarly situated, and by comparison with the Evangelist's own account of the storm in the Lake of Gennesaret. The book is full of solid proof and valuable suggestion; and we may safely say, that a more valuable original contribution to biblical knowledge has not been made by any countryman of ours during the present century.

But psychologically this voyage is hardly less interesting. The influence acquired by a prisoner in chains over the motley assemblage congregated in the huge Alexandrian corn-ship, would of itself testify to his being no ordinary character. But when we combine this with our previous knowledge of the man and his mission, we hardly could have testimony more satisfactory to the consistency of a truthful narrative than this, that one so described antecedently should have so done and spoken and influenced those about him. The following beautiful description is from Schrader, whose unworthy rationalism here completely disappears, and gives place to an enthusiasm far more genial to him:—

Amidst the many dangers which Paul, well-accustomed to perils by sea, had clearly foreseen, he was the adviser, he was the comforter of all; like a genius from a higher world, he stood among the men of this earth, carried onward by the persuasion that he should proclaim the Gospel in this world's metropolis, and before its rulers; that he should gain for it a new and noble victory; that in chains and weakness, not in freedom and strength, he was to work its work. So lofty was his purpose, so visibly was his God pleased to glorify Himself in him through his captivity, that at midnight it was bright day about him; the angels of God hovered round; waking and sleeping, in thoughts and dreams, they whispered consolation; they pronounced his purpose so blessed, so knit into the divine counsel, that God would, in its pursuance, defend both himself and all that were with him in the ship (Vol. ii., p. 363, f.).

We have now brought the great Apostle to Rome. And here the shades of evening close over him, and the apostolic history withdraws its guidance. We only know that for two years he continued in custody, but in his own lodging, privately preaching the Gospel. We cannot doubt that some of his Epistles date from this imprisonment. Hence he wrote to the Colossians, to the Ephesians (for we still believe, notwithstanding the arguments of Conybeare and Howson, and so many able critics, that it was veritably addressed to them), to Philemon, and the affecting letter to the Philippians; the latter in the apparent prospect of death. The evidence supplied by each of these has been well collected and applied by many able writers, and seems unobjectionable and convincing.

From this time the shade becomes deeper and more impenetrable. We have yet remaining (to say nothing of the much-questioned Epistle to the Hebrews) three letters, two to Timotheus and one to Titus, commonly known as the Pastoral Epistles. These, in style and diction, are so completely distinct from the others, that while they bear indubitable marks of the mind and hand of Paul, we must refuse to insert them anywhere in the existing series, but regard them as subsequent, and in a later manner. If this were once established, the important question of a second imprisonment would be also decided: for journeys are spoken of, and events alluded to, which make it impossible that two of them should have been written in captivity. We cannot pretend here to follow out this matter; we will only cursorily notice two points connected with the question:—

1. The statement in 2 Tim. iv. 20, "Trophimus have I left at Miletus sick," has never received any satisfactory explanation on the hypothesis of one imprisonment. Those who wish to see to what shifts the advocates of that theory are reduced by those words may refer to Schaff's Kirchengeschichte, p. 273 b, or Davidson's useful introduction to the N. T. vol. iii. p. 53.

2. There is between the remarkable doxology at the end of the Epistle to the Romans, and the Pastoral Epistles, a curious affinity in style and diction. Might it not well have been that the apostle, reviewing his Epistle in later days at Rome, subjoined this fervid ascription of praise (for the Epistle was manifestly complete without it)—and so may it not be synchronous with the Pastoral Epistles?

Of the death of St. Paul, we know next to nothing. All that tradition tells us, is no more than might be inferred from his own notices, and therefore probable; but, on this very account, of little independent weight. Gathering the evidence for ourselves, we may safely assume that he died by martyrdom, and possibly at Rome.

However this may have been, we know that he regarded his course as FINISHED. The end for which he was raised up had been answered. A man had been found, who, by birth, by training, by privilege, by character, united in himself the many requirements for an Apostle of the nations. By this man's living word, the principal churches in the world were founded. By his written testimony, the principal disputes of Christendom were anticipated. To this army went Augustine; to this, Luther. From this, future champions of God's truth and man's right may yet equip themselves.

We regard it as a sign for good, that just now attention should be directed to the biography and character of St. Paul. No study could prove so effectual an antidote to the assumptions of hierarchical pretension; — none will afford a more grateful relief from the tinsel of that frippery Christianity which is now so ostentatiously imported among us. He is above all others the Apostle of individual religion; of those things which are true, and honest, and just, and pure, and lovely, and of good report. His course was a life-long and single-hearted striving after one glorious purpose with no side-aims nor reservation.

The more such a character is known and appreciated, the better Protestants shall we be, and the better Christians.

J. G. WHITTIER has just issued a new volume of Poems, called "The Chapel of the Hermits and other Poems." From the prelude we take the following lines:—

"I do believe, and yet in grief,
I pray, for help to unbelief;
For needful strength aside to lay
The daily cumberings of my way.

"I'm sick at heart of craft and cant,
Sick of the crazed enthusiasts' rant,
Profession's smooth hypocrisies,
And creeds of iron, and lives of ease.

"I ponder o'er the sacred Word,
I read the record of our Lord;
And, weak and troubled, envy them
Who touched His seamless garment's hem;—

"Who saw the tears of love He wept
Above the grave where Lazarus slept;
And heard, amidst the shadows dim
Of Olivet, His evening hymn.

"How blessed the swineherd's low estate,
The beggar crouching at the gate,
The leper, loathly and abhorred,
Whose eyes of flesh beheld the Lord!

"O sacred soil His sandals pressed!
Sweet fountains of His noonday rest!
O, light and air of Palestine,
Impreguate with His life divine!

"O, bear me thither! Let me look
On Siloa's pool, and Kedron's brook—
Kneel at Gethsemane, and by Gennesaret walk, before I die!

"Methinks this cold and northern night
Would melt before that Orient light;
And, wet by Hermon's dew and rain,
My childhood's faith revive again!"

So spake my friend, one autumn day,
Where the still river slid away
Beneath us, and above the brown
Red curtains of the woods shut down.

Then said I;—for I could not brook
The mute appealing of his look—

"I, too, am weak, and faith is small,
And blindness happeneth unto all.

"Yet sometimes glimpses on my sight,
Through present wrong, the eternal right;
And, step by step, since time began,
I see the steady gain of man;

"That all of good the past hath had Remains to make our own time glad—
Our common, daily life divine,
And every land a Palestine.

"Thou weariest of thy present state;
What gain to thee time's holiest aid?
The doubter now perchance had been
As High Priest or as Pilate then!

"What thought Chorazin's scribes? What faith
In Him had Nain and Nazareth?
Of the few followers whom he led,
One sold Him—all forsook and fled.

"O, Friend! we need nor rock nor sand,
Nor storied stream of Morning-Land;
The heavens are glassed in Merrimack—
What more could Jordan render back?

"We lack but open eye and ear
To find the Orient's marvels here;
The still, small voice in autumn's hush,
Yon maple wood the burning bush.

"For still the new transcends the old
In signs and tokens manifold;—
Slaves rise up men; the olive waves
With roots deep-set in battle graves!

"Through the harsh noises of our day,
A low, sweet prelude finds its way;
Through clouds of doubt, and creeds of fear,
A light is breaking, calm and clear.

"That song of Love, now low and far—
Ere long shall swell from star to star—
That light, the breaking day, which tips
The golden-spired Apocalypse!"

From Hogg's Instructor.

SIR EDWARD LYTTON BULWER LYTTON, BART.

"NOWHERE is painting, by pen or pencil, so inadequate as in delineating spiritual nature. The pyramid can be measured in geometric feet, and the draughtsman represents it with all its environment, on canvas, accurately to the eye; nay, Mont Blanc is embossed in colored stucco, and we have his very type and miniature fac-simile in our museums. But for great men, let him who would know such pray that he may see them daily face to face; for, in the dim distance, and by the eye of imagination, our vision, do what we may, will be too imperfect." These are the words of him who is facile princeps among the biographic essayists of the day; they are used by him as he commences to convey to his speaking canvas the lines and features of Schiller's intellectual countenance. Of Schiller, he knew very much more than could be gathered from his artistic productions; he had perused his letters, he knew each event of his history, he could tell how he had comported himself in each remarkable occurrence of his life. And yet he says, and says most truly, that more than all this was necessary; and his words apply to men who cannot be distinctively called great. But how are the difficulties of the task of the mental portrait-painter increased, if the private history of the man whom he portrays is almost entirely unknown to him; if he has to draw every tint, not from the living face of nature and life, but as seen through the multiform and changing media of published works! To produce a likeness of the man, of which he can say with unfaltering confidence that it is true, is well-nigh impossible. It is so mainly for two reasons; because, in the first place, the artist should not confound himself with his creations, and because, secondly, the sentiments of the lip and pen may be very different from those which find embodiment in the action and the life.

You can discover from the works of an artist what are his powers, but precisely in proportion to his perfection as an artist will he conceal what are his feelings, what he himself is. Shakspeare, as all critics have remarked, bodies forth every creation with the definite individuality of life; you cannot say Shakspeare speaks more in the mystic contemplation of Hamlet than in the gross actualism of the gravedigger, in the kingly tones of Othello than in the intense, lynx-eyed baseness of Iago, in the ethereal music of Ariel than in the tuneless groanings of Caliban; in each instance, there is the self-originated utterance of distinct existence. In the case of Goethe the same holds true, though, certainly, less completely. In Milton, despite what has been said of his self-consciousness, we must recognize the same crowning merit. In inferior artists, again, this power of individual creation becomes weaker; in Schiller, in Byron, and even in Shelley, subjective elements forever mingle with, and render imperfect, the creations of art. In all cases, the truer the artist, the more difficult is it, in his productions, to discern the reflection of the man.

It is too true, on the other hand, that the utterance of the artist may by no means consist with the actions of the man; and even where traces of self-portraiture are manifest, we cannot be assured that they will not deceive us. The end of man, as we have known for one or two millenniums, is an action, not a thought; and in this truth is involved the following—that the test of manhood is action, and not thought, or at least ostensible thought. Were the history of Coleridge utterly unknown, at what strange conclusions respecting his personal character would we probably arrive! To mention but one of his poems and one trait of character, let us imagine ourselves forming our idea of his energy from the "Religious Musings." What clearness, we would say, what fiery earnestness, what strength as of a world-volcano heaving mountains at the stars! Nor would the study of the "Friend" materially affect our decision; and we would probably arrive at the ultimate conclusion, that the man Coleridge had been certainly of a lofty, contemplative mind, but that his high ideal soul had rolled majestically along on the wheels of action. And yet, who can for a moment forget that the writer of "Religious Musings" furnishes in his own person the most melancholy instance upon record of the separation between action and thought! The subject of our present notice here comes to help us out of our difficulty, or rather to assist us in convincing the reader that it is a great difficulty of which we speak. "If it were necessary," says Sir Edward, "that practice squared with precept. . . our monitors would be few. . . Our opinions, young Englishmen, are the angel part of us; our actions the earthly." Yet it is only the angel part that we generally find in the works of an author, and, if he is a perfect artist, we shall get not even this, but merely the objective creations of art, over which, save in imparting to them life, the artist has strictly no power. In writing of our hero, we should always like to consult his valet.

Moved by these and like considerations, we do not feel ourselves entitled to pronounce an authoritative decision, which would embrace his whole character, respecting the distinguished man whose portrait we on this occasion present to our readers. We do not know enough of Sir Edward to speak of him as a man; we address ourselves to consider him.

as a writer. And surely here the task which presents itself to our view is of a difficult nature. To specify the works of Sir Edward would fill a paragraph; to give the most cursory view of each to our readers, would fill half a number; to consider each fully in its artistic perfection, its relation to the author's mind, and its bearing upon the age, would fill a large and tensely written volume. It is evident that selection must be made, and that minute delineations cannot be attempted; but even on such conditions we feel that the work of compression will be difficult. Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer, in his aspect of literary man, comes before us in four different characters at the very least; as novelist, as poet, as historian, and as public teacher. To these we might add the characters of translator, political writer and dramatist; but we prefer embracing these under one or other of the titles above specified. We shall conduct our brief survey in the order we have adopted above; and first, of Sir Edward as novelist.

The vast prevalence of the fictitious style of composition in the present day cannot fail to strike the most casual observer. It is a sign, and an important sign, of the times. Much were to be said upon the subject, did space permit, but we are compelled to condense our remarks into the smallest possible compass. Sir Edward himself has cast his eye upon the phenomenon, and favored us with deliverance thereon. "Literature," he says in a note to his "Athens"—"literature commences with poetical fiction, and usually terminates with prose fiction. It was so in the ancient world—it will be so with England and France. The harvest of novels is, I fear, a sign of the approaching exhaustion of the soul." This is certainly an opinion which by no means flatters that department of literature which the speaker has so brilliantly adorned; but we fear it contains much of truth. When men, like overgrown children, cry out for amusement, and when authors, responding to the cry, all rush forward with their wares, careless in great part of artistic merit, and adopting as their motto the words, "who peppers the highest is surest to please," the prospects of literature may be considered dark. Why gird on the armor of the legionary, when the light arms are as effective; why earnestly gaze on the face of nature for the revelation of the beautiful, or dig sedulously in the mines of thought for the true, if tinsel passes well enough with the "general reader" for the one, and pointless commonplace, or cloudy sentimentality, or mere bluster, for the other? And is not this too much the case among us at present? Towards novel-writing there is a tremendous attraction at present for every entrant into the ranks of literature; if the gold of heaven gleams elsewhere, here, at least, is the gold of earth.

Deterioration in quality must accompany excessive increase in quantity; public taste may thus come to be fatally tainted; and so the result apprehended by Sir Edward seems too likely to ensue. But we would cling to a better hope. We think a task devolves upon criticism, and a very important one; we believe that an enlightened, uncompromising, and impartial criticism might do much. Surely, if criticism were well awake, certain gross deviations from anything like artistic correctness would not be suffered to continue; and most gross are the absurdities and artistic blunders committed in this very department of novel-writing. We believe the novel to be a form of composition admitting the exercise of the highest genius, adapted to convey most powerfully the noblest instruction, and peculiarly suited to embrace statements or solutions of the great problems of humanity. We cannot, we regret to say, enter at any length upon the subject here. Suffice it to say, that the novel, at least as strictly as any other form of composition, must be true. The garb is simply nothing; it may be of gold, or it may be of iron, but the truth it contains is the matter of importance. In what sense, then, must a novel be true, since its plot is known to be a mere form of delivery? It must be true to nature. To say it may be ideal and above nature, is to fall into an error in critical analysis; the ideal is as much natural as the actual; it belongs to the domain of spiritual nature, which is surely as real as physical nature. But the formula "true to nature" may seem vague, and must be more accurately defined. The province of the novel, in its widest expression, is life; life in every aspect, under every condition of circumstance; life as bounded by the laws of the actual world we live in, or life under the conditions of a perfect humanity and a perfect social system. As its province is life, so the actors in the novel are drawn from life in all its aspects; hence the ultimate work of the novelist is to portray character. Here, again, we must guard against error from a misconception of the ideal. Character may be true to nature, though it has no actual present existence on the earth; but it must ever be true to the conditions of humanity. The nature with which the ideal concerns, and connects itself, is a nobler nature than the actual; if we consider well, we will find that the actual is, in a true and important sense, less natural than the ideal; for the ideal is always some bodying forth of that first and noble nature from which humanity has fallen, and to which, beyond the portals of time, it shall yet attain. To portray the ideal is the highest possible effort of the novelist; as indeed it is of the epic poet and dramatist.

But this is a province which has hardly been trodden, and, we suspect, not trodden very successfully. Bulwer has made a noble attempt, and at least indicated the path. In general, however, we must be content with life in its actual forms; nay, so far from absolute perfection are we, that it affords us extreme delight when we meet with anything like a true delineation of actual existence. To specify and illustrate the errors to which novelists are exposed in depicting actual life, would exhaust our space. The principal may be classified under, or inferred from, the following categories:—1st. The conversion of man into mere embodiments of certain passions; the representation of life as one wild hurly-burly of passionate excitement, without making allowance for the continual drizzling rain of custom, which so cools the heated brain, and dims the fiery eye, in every-day existence; 2d. The failure in what we must call the right depicting of silence; oblivion to the sure fact, that men, when they feel most deeply, speak least, and, indeed, if men of action, are not much given to embody their thoughts, and much less their feelings, in words at all; 3d. The grouping, as characters of fiction, of mere oafs and human oddities, which are sometimes, unhappily, met with separately, but never in great abundance or connection, in the actual world; 4th. The imputation to the characters portrayed of an intellectual nature solely, and not only a superiority to, but an absence of, passion.

We shall glance at five of Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton's novels, as indicative at once of his powers, of their development, and of their result. These five we may name are commencing our survey: "Pelham," "Eugene Aram," "Rienzi," "Zanoni," "The Caxtons."

"Pelham" was the first work in which Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton fairly caught the ear of the world. It was begun, he informs us, at the age of eighteen; it was published in 1823. It might be pronounced a clever, promising book, shallow in itself, but what might be called profound in the circumstances. It appears, certainly, incorrect to style it the sympathetic portrait of a dandy; the satire with which it abounds is surely sufficiently palpable. Yet "the gentleman" is not here drawn, so to speak, in his deepest nature; Bulwer himself, we make bold to aver, will now furnish us with a definition of that character far truer than could have been penned by Pelham. In "Pelham" we have a delineation, which may be allowed to pass muster, of the external layer of the gentleman; we have a correct enough exhibition of those laws which draw their authority from those strange entities, fashion and etiquette, and of the exterior wrappings in which, as in a uniform, he who would be pronounced by them a gentleman must array himself. He, who has the calamity to be thus esteemed by these sickly but malignant phantoms, must be "an honorable man"—that is, being interpreted, must be ready, at a moment's notice, to blow into air that which occupies the place where brain should be, in the cranium of an adversary, or to have his own hat-supporting apparatus similarly shattered; he must, with heroic martyr spirit, endure to have his body compressed, or distended, or distorted, as the cross-legged hierophant, fashion's high-priest, ordains; he must have a shrinking terror at the vulgar, and must never fall into the gross error of imagining, that one can deserve honor as a man, if he is not also entitled to honor as a man of fashion. That Pelham laughed at much of this, is true; but that Pelham would have stretched out his hand to Robert Burns, joined with him in pealing forth "A man's a man for a' that," and recognized him for a true-born gentleman, is beyond our faith. That Bulwer's heart would leap as his hand touched that of such a man as Burns at the present day, we well know.

"Pelham," then, was the portraiture of a man of the world—a dandy of superior species, but yet pretty clearly distinguishable from the species, man. In other respects the book possessed many claims to attention. It has not a few powerful passages. The conception of Gertrude, telling her sorrows, just before death, by the light of the silent and beautiful moon, to him who loved her unutterably, is very fine; and the picture of Tyrrel's death-scene, though it has perhaps a barely perceptible touch of the theatrical sublimity, is vivid, and artistically finished. A literary diviner, on reading "Pelham," might have said, that man will go far, he will soon shake off the dandiacal rings and tippets, and move men, for he has been in the sibyllis cave of passion, and can paint what he saw there.

Bulwer's powers had ripened considerably by practice and experience, ere he wrote "Eugene Aram." "It saw the light in 1831." We demur somewhat to the estimate of this fiction by an influential writer of the day. "Eugene Aram," says Mr. Gilfillan, "seems to us as lamentable a perversion of talent as the literature of the age has exhibited. . . . The morality, too, of the tale, seems to us detestable. The feelings with which you rise from its perusal, or, at least, with which the author seems to wish you to rise, are of regret and indignation, that, for the sin of an hour, such a noble being should perish, as if he would insinuate the wisdom of quarrel (how vain!) with the laws of retribution." Now we wish it to be distinctly understood, that we do not here join issue in any assertion which cannot be made and proven, to the effect that Bulwer has wandered from psychological truth; but we must assert, both, that the charge against the morality is either null or far too strongly put, and that the true test of the psychological correctness of Bulwer's delineation, is, in some respects, different from that which is applied above. It seems to us to be the aim of the novelist to delineate those strange influences, and their effects, which so often and so strangely chequer the wondrous web of life; to show how a mind of radically noble temper may be lured into sin, by Satan cunningly arrayed in the seraphic garb, and wearing the seraphic smile; how the golden atmosphere of noble youthful enthusiasm may, in this strange world of ours, cast heavenly hues over the fiendly visage of crime. That such cases do occur, is surely undeniable; and if such cases there are, or if, in consistence with psychological truth, they are conceivable, we can see no argument which can be forcibly urged against their use. As to the morality, we think it admits a strong defence. Sir Edward himself says — "No moral can be more impressive than that which teaches how man can entangle himself in his own sophisms — that moral is better, viewed aright, than volumes of homilies." Surely this is more than plausible. We venture distinctly to state the moral bearing of the work in these two propositions: — "1st. It points out, with terrific emphasis, the fatal error of listening to the faintest suggestions of sin, to the most plausible side-speeches of crime. Burns counselled well when he advised his young friend to pause on the instant that his honor (let us say conscience) warned him, 'debarring a' side pretences;' Bulwer has embodied the lesson magnificently. 2d. It exhibits with like power the inevitable retribution that awaits crime; it points to the inflexible Fury tracking the blood-stained; it shows chance, and concealment; and hopes, and all, crushed in the resistless jaws of law. This is made the more striking by the allegation of the fact, that Eugene did actually not strike the death-blow; participation in the crime was fatal. Surely we must not expect a novelist to turn aside to state in terms what his tale imports — it is in the events of the plot, in the fate of the characters, that he is expected to teach. The whole tale of "Eugene Aram," as told by Bulwer, is a magnificent assertion of the majesty and the power of justice.

We have said, we do not mean to inquire into the psychological correctness of Bulwer's portraiture of Eugene Aram; we do not assert its correspondence with the actual Aram, but would only indicate generally the nature of the test proper to be applied. The writer of fiction is, by the form of composition he has adopted, released from the bondage of those rules which govern certain other departments of literary production; he is not bound, for instance, as the historian, to the precise narration of what did in any historical epoch or event actually happen. His range is far wider; he may never depart from nature, but he may work his will with circumstances; he may step to the farthest bounds of the possible; he may shape the conditions of his problems as he will, provided that he always works them out correctly. We are disposed to think, that a very considerable approximation to correctness has been made; but we deny not, that strong objections may be taken; that especially Bulwer might be pressed by the question, Is it possible for a household devil, in the shape of the consciousness of being a murderer, to dwell in a man's bosom, without tainting the whole atmosphere? 'Would it not, with its green malignant eye, wither every noble aspiration? Would it not forever close the heart against the entrance of heaven-born love, and open it only to earth-born or hell-born lust? Would it not weaken purpose, or convert it into stubbornness? Could the same bosom be the dwelling of one great sin, one all-pervading hypocrisy, and also of virtue? There is one circumstance among the data of the problem, which, whether Sir Edward attached such importance to it or not, actually renders his solution either correct, or so nearly so, that it were hypercritical to arraign him. Eugene Aram, according to Bulwer, did not strike the blow which occasioned death; and we can well imagine this circumstance constituting, in his own eyes, a valid base on which to rear his self-defence, his vindication to his own breast. We conclude the whole matter thus: Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, in the novel of "Eugene Aram," has, with very great ability, performed the task which he appointed himself; a profound mental and moral analysis will detect imperfection in his character of Aram; but the whole book resistlessly preaches the madness of dalliance with crime, and the utter inability of mortal man to escape the scrutiny and vengeance of the Infinite Eye; while, as seems clear to us, the sympathy demanded from the reader is not intended for, and can scarce be conceivably accorded to, the crime, or excite a murmur against the iron majesty of justice.

Considered generally, "Eugene Aram" indicated a great improvement in the author's powers. The style is more continuous, more sustained, and riper, than in "Pelham;" the painting is far richer and mellow, the colors are more artistically blended, the knowledge is deeper and wider. The love of Madeline is such as might inhabit where the emotions of an angel were joined with the intellect of a woman; so true, so pure, so lofty; Faith and Love ever at the door of the heart to turn away the cold suggestions of doubting Reason. The effect of Eugene's speech at the trial, upon Madeline, as contrasted with that upon old Lester and the judge — the calm, beautiful, satisfied smile which lit up her wan features — is a golden letter from the very handwriting of nature.

But we must hurry on. Of "Rienzi," published some five or six years after "Eugene Aram," we shall not say much. It is a novel of passion; we miss the simplicity of life; amid the tumultuous emotions and gorgeous scenes, we can scarce believe that we are treading the solid old earth. Its style is one of sustained brilliancy; now it is melted and shaded into soft, delicate beauty, now it rises into startling grandeur — it never subsides into commonplace or dulness. Here, we think, Bulwer's portraiture of love, in which he has perhaps no living equal, attains its consummate flower. We scarce know to which of his delineations of this passion, in the novel before us, to accord the palm; to the weak, womanly Adeline, who is strong only in love, who is strong enough to die beautifully, but not to live well; to the complete, ineradicable devotion of Irene, so mild, but so all-subduing, so spontaneous, so self-sacrificing; or to the proud love of Nina, gazing in haughty self-reliance and self-satisfaction on all the world beside, but losing all pride for self as she gazes on one who has given her a being nobler than self. Adeline is the soft, flower-like woman, waving beautifully in the summer gale of gladness, but withering in the winter blast; Irene is the human angel, of whom poets have so long sung; Nina is the queen, worthy to reign with and to die for, her husband-king. Bulwer has surpassed himself in these portraits. Rienzi himself is a stately, noble creation; he endeavors to tread the surges, and is engulfed. We cannot stay to analyze his character. We could quote passage upon passage from this magnificent fiction, and for each passage the reader would thank us, but space forbids. We might quote the description of the plague, and the contrasted though ghastly beauties of the garden whither the half-insane youths and maidens had retired; or we might quote the description of the final scene of terror and woe. These would show Bulwer's power as a painter of the terrific; but we think the mildly beautiful is fully as much his province, and prefer giving two short passages, not as specimens of his power, so much as glances into the gorgeous scenes described. Neither the one nor the other requires comment; we only say of the first, that the scene is Italy: — "The last rays of the sun quivered on the wave that danced musically over its stony bed; and, amidst a little copse on the opposite bank, broke the brief and momentary song of such of the bolder habitants of that purple air, as the din of the camp had not scared from their green retreat. The clouds lay motionless to the west, in that sky so darkly and intensely blue, never seen but over the landscapes that a Claude or a Rosa loved to paint; and dim and delicious rose-hues gathered over the gray peaks of the distant Apennines. From afar floated the hum of the camp, broken by the neigh of returning steeds, the blast of an occasional bugle, and, at regular intervals, by the armed tramp of the neighboring sentry. And, opposite to the end of the copse, upon a rising ground, matted with reeds, moss, and waving shrubs, were the ruins of some old Etruscan building, whose name had perished, whose very uses were unknown." Better still are the following superb pair of portraits: — "Flowers dropped on his path, kerchiefs and banners waved from every house; tears might be seen coursing, unheeded, down bearded cheeks; youth and age were kneeling together, with uplifted hands, invoking blessings on the head of the restored. On he came, the Senator-Tribune — 'the Phoenix to his pyre!'"

"Robed in scarlet, that literally blazed with gold, his proud head bared in the sun, and bending to the saddle-bow, Rienzi passed slowly through the throng. Not in the flush of that hour were visible, on his glorious countenance, the signs of disease and care, the very enlargement of his proportions gave a greater majesty to his mien. Hope sparkled in his eye, triumph and empire sat upon his brow. The crowd could not contain themselves; they pressed forward, each upon each, anxious to catch the glance of his eye, to touch the hem of his robe. He himself was deeply affected by their joy. He halted; with faltering and broken words, he attempted to address them. 'I am repaid,' he said — 'repaid for all; may I live to make you happy.' . . . Upon a steed, caparisoned with cloth of gold, in snow-white robes, studded with gems that flashed back the day, came the beautiful and regal Nina. The memory of her pride, her ostentation, all forgotten in that moment, she was scarce less welcome, scarce less idolized, than her lord. And her smile, all radiant with joy, her lips quivering with proud and elate emotion, never had she seemed at once so born alike for love and for command — a Zenobia passing through the pomp of Rome, not a captive, but a queen."

We shall make but one other quotation from "Rienzi;" it is one of those brief utterances which occasionally leap, attired in perfect poetic beauty, from the brain of Bulwer: "God never made genius to be envied! We envy not the sun, but rather the valleys that ripen beneath his beams."

"Zanoni" appeared in 1842; we think it unquestionably Bulwer's highest effort. In it the novelist fearlessly enters those lofty regions where the poet and the prophet alone can steadily tread; he attempts the delineation of the ideal; by the keen light of the soul, he daringly endeavors to penetrate the clouds and earthly mists which encompass humanity, and, dashing them aside by the mighty hand of genius, to reveal to men what a man may conceivably be. He oversteps the bounds of the actual, and endeavors to give us a glimpse of that higher natural, which we call the ideal.

We feel ourselves here most irksomely restrained by the limits of our paper, so many and so important questions present themselves to our consideration in treating of "Zanoni." We shall abstain from general commendation, and endeavor, compressing our thoughts as in a vice, first, to convey to our readers the general philosophic point or import of the book; and, secondly, to indicate, in a few remarks, the relation of such a work, and of the ideal in general, to Christianity. We commence with a few quotations; we open a few windows, through which we may see into the whole temple.

"Wisdom, contemplating mankind, leads but to the two results—compassion or disdain. He who believes in other worlds can accustom himself to look on this as a naturalist on the revolutions of an ant-hill or of a leaf. What is the earth to Infinity—what its duration to the Eternal? Oh, how much greater is the soul of one man than the vicissitudes of the whole globe! Child of heaven, and heir of immortality, how from some star hereafter wilt thou look back on the ant-hill and its commotions, from Clovis, to Robespierre, from Noah to the Final Fire! The spirit that can contemplate, that lives only in the intellect, can ascend to its star, even from the midst of the burial-ground called Earth, and while the sarcophagus called Life immures in its clay the Everlasting!"

... "At the entrance to all the grander worlds dwell the race that intimidate and awe. Who in the daily world ever left the old regions of custom and prescription, and felt not the first seizure of the shapeless and nameless Fear?" ... "Faith builds in the dungeon and the lazar-house its sublimest shrines; and up, through roofs of stone, that shut out the eye of heaven, ascends the ladder where the angels glide to and fro—PRAYER." ... "When Science falls as a firework from the sky it would invade, when Genius withers as a flower in the breath of the icy charnel, the hope of a childlike soul wraps the air in light, and the innocence of unquestioning belief covers the grave with blossoms." ... "Oh, artist! haunted one! Oh, erring Genius! Behold thy two worst foes—the False Ideal that knows no God, and the False Love that burns from the corruption of the senses, and takes no lustre from the soul."

If these passages are well pondered, they will, we think, convey to the reader a correct and pretty comprehensive idea of the nature of the work from which they are selected; we need scarce pause to remark, that very much of it has come over from the fatherland. Our first quotation indicates the general tone of the book; its superiority to mere temporal, actual, earthly things. The second, a very important passage, points out the place which fear occupies in the machinery of the work, and utters grandly the grand fact, that, as a preliminary to all nobility and excellence, the soul must be courageous. The third and fourth proclaim the all-importance of faith, of belief, as contra-distinguished from logical inference and understanding. The fifth may be considered as the general summing up of the purport of the book, the assertion of the necessity to a true intellectual ideal of the belief in a God, and the necessity to a true emotional ideal of the purification of the soul from all sensual desire.

The whole atmosphere of "Zanoni" is pure and ennobling; it promulgates certain great and perennial truths; we can scarcely conceive any one arising from its perusal without being raised to a region of lofty and yet healthful sentiment. We do not say that its analysis is always so penetrating as to cut to the very truth; we suspect an incorrect conclusion, running through all our modern criticism, in the difference asserted between faith, and intellectual, or, if it must be said, logical belief; we think, also, that the distinction between science and art, between the ideal and the natural, is inaccurately defined. But the book is a noble one.

Of the relation of the ideal to Christianity we can say but a word or two. Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton errs always, and errs radically, when he speaks of Schiller's ideal, or any other ideal, of Schiller's ethical system or any other ethical system, as Christian, or as agreeing with Christianity in essence. The highest possible approach, which human intellect can make to Christianity is to develop its ethics. If conscience, aided by intellect and knowledge, can do this, it is its utmost: but Christianity is distinguished forever from all such systems. It is a power, not a system; creates not a certain set of opinions, but a life. In Christianity a directly supernatural power is brought to bear on the whole nature of man; and to him who declares himself a Christian we put this one testing question: "Do you believe in that change which is called the second birth—do you believe in the direct action of the Deity on the human mind in conversion?" The most perfect ethical system, the most diligent practice of correct ethical rules, will never change man's heart, or make him holy there. The lever may be sound; but, to move mankind, it must find some fulcrum beyond the earth on which to turn. An ethical system may be a lever—Christianity alone is a lever in the hand of the mighty God. Besides all this, we cannot see the fairness of the assertion that certain systems purely human are Christian, when "the Deity" is all that we have for the triune Christian God. We can grant no man the Christian name, who is not Christian in some sense which would not apply to Socrates. But, however Bulwer may err in other places in talking of Christianity, we cannot bring the charge against "Zanoni;" or, if we did, it would be rather by inference than by direct evidence. If Christianity is taken as true, then every part of the work before us is in admirable place, as an unfolding of certain portions—perhaps the most important portions—of its ethics; and this supposition we think ourselves justified in making in Bulwer's favor. If the ideal in "Zanoni" is revealed as a system which can renovate the world, it is powerless—it is dead.

The style in which "Zanoni" is written is very much adorned. We could imagine Sir Edward having Richter in eye as he composed it; though, even in translation, we can recognize a deeper and softer mellowness of coloring, a more profound poetic love for nature, and a richer ideality in Richter than in Bulwer. The passages we have quoted may remind readers of the schrech verses in "Walt and Vult;" and we must still quote one passage, which we pronounce gorgeous, and which, we think, would not have dishonored Richter. It is part of a description of Mount Vesuvius; "The little party had now arrived nearly at the summit of the mountain, and unspeakably grand was the spectacle on which they gazed. From the crater arose a vapor, intensely dark, that overspread the whole background of the heavens; in the centre whereof rose a flame, that assumed a form singularly beautiful. It might have been compared to a crest of gigantic feathers, the diadem of the mountain, high-arched, and drooping downward, with the hues delicately shaded off, and the whole shifting and tremulous as the plumage on a warrior's helm." It would be difficult to find half-a-dozen finer figures than this in the literature of the century.

If "Zanoni" is Bulwer's highest effort as a novelist, and contains the noblest passages he has ever penned, "The Caxtons—a Family Picture," we would pronounce, as a whole, his most perfect work. In "Pelham," he had held the mirror up to nature in one of her most fantastic products—the dandy; grant that he laughed considerably at the picture, yet that code of morality which is essentially different from the dandiacal was not unfolded; in "Eugene Aram," he had ventured into a dangerous region, and represented life under abnormal conditions; in "Rienzi" he had painted passion with all the fiery colors which belong to it, but we scarce saw the firm ground of life under its burning feet; in "Zanoni," the delineation of the ideal was boldly, and with singular success, attempted; in "The Caxtons," the face of the true gentleman is at length unveiled, the atmosphere is healthy, the action of passion is shown, but it is assigned its own, and only its own, place; the ideal is restricted to the realizable, and the picture is—life.

No dandy could have said this: "De-fine-gentlemanise yourself from the crown of your head to the sole of your foot, and become the greater aristocrat for so doing; for he is more than an aristocrat, he is a king, who suffices in all things for himself—who is his own master, because he needs no valetaille." The man who wrote the following had looked upon life with a calmer eye than that of passion: "My father's reply to this letter was what might be expected. It gently reinforced the old lessons in the distinctions between aspirations towards the perfecting ourselves—aspirations that are never in vain—and the morbid passion of applause from others, which shifts conscience from our own bosoms to the confused Babel of the crowd, and calls it 'fame.' But my father, in his counsels, did not seek to oppose a mind so obstinately bent upon a single course—he sought rather to guide and strengthen it in the way it should go. The seas of human life are wide. Wisdom may suggest the voyage, but it must first look to the condition of the ship, and the nature of the merchandise to exchange. Not every vessel that sails from Tarshish can bring back the gold of Ophir; but shall it, therefore, rot in the harbor? No; give its sails to the wind!"

The characters, too, of this masterly fiction are singularly true. In drawing Mrs. Caxton, it would seem that the writer had studiously rejected every fictitious grace, had flung aside every tint which might be borrowed from passion, and determined, be the portrait what it might, that it would be to the life. The result has been that Mrs. Caxton is scarce so much a fictitious as a historic personage; she is the gentleman's wife of the nineteenth century; she is the exact representative of thousands. A greater intellectual power might have been imputed with perfect truth, but even this aid the novelist scorned; and he has succeeded in producing one of the most perfect and truly lovable characters in the whole range of fiction. Uncle Jack is most cleverly sketched, and almost every line is from nature. Austin and Roland are both true to the time and to nature. Love, too, as it generally exists in the nineteenth century, is admirably portrayed; in the present time, in one case out of a hundred, it may be the natural, spontaneous, noble growth of the soul; while, in ninety-nine cases out of the hundred, it is the fruit of calculation or policy; in other words, in rare instances it deserves the name—in the vast majority of matches there is only its counterfeit. It is observable that every important love-match in the book goes awry, except that of Pisistratus and Blanche; and, although it may be said that this is but in accordance with the old adage, yet we must remark the circumstance, that love here does not, after a troubled course, settle finally into a quiet woodland cove, as is the approved plan; it leaps over a ledge, and disappears in darkness. This is, perhaps, more accidental than intentional on the part of the novelist, but it is, nevertheless, true: in our present mechanical life, be it an improvement or be it not, the place of emotion is, save in rare conjunctions of circumstance, supplied by calculation.

In "The Caxtons," we have, we venture to think, the final development of Sir Edward's powers—the final product of his mind; we have that calmness which marks the greatest strength, that serenity which marks the truest wisdom, that unostentatious, peaceful dignity which marks perfection of style. We confer upon it very high praise, when we say that here Bulwer has shown himself possessed of true humor, of sympathy, we shall not say with the low, but with the humble, the homely, we might almost say the ridiculous; he has proved that he can convey to his pages those little occurrences which none but the keenest eye can see, and with which only the warmest heart can sympathize, which, as it were naïvely, wrinkle the face of life with smiles. The opening passage of "The Caxtons," commencing with "It's a boy," is a sample of delicate and genuine humor, of a far higher sort than finds place in his other works, and far above the region of fun.

So much for Sir Edward as a novelist, in which character, certainly, he has won his greenest laurels; our glance at him in his other capacities must be very brief, for he has entered the lists in every form of contest, and competed for every crown.

Sir Edward is willing to stake his fame on "King Arthur;" we are happy it is out of his power to do so. He will never be considered a great poet. And he may be somewhat astonished when we assure him, that the very fact which he adduces as a presumptive proof that his great poem must be good, seems to us to be the great cause of its defects. For twenty years he devoted himself to prose composition, and then took up his harp to sing us an epic song. We suspect that twenty years of prose extinguished his power of melody; that his voice lost tune.

We do not positively assert that he was born for a poet; but, considering that his first honors were won in the livery of the Muses, we think it very probable that, had he devoted his life to poetry, his ear might have so improved, and his perception of the beautiful in sound so sharpened, that he might finally have succeeded in linking the beautiful in sound to the beautiful in sight, and so producing the highest embodiment of beauty—a poem. But, after twenty years of prose, to return to the jealous Muses! We fear they will never recognize thee for a true singer, but pluck thee for a syren.

We think "King Arthur" is deficient in three respects: in melody, in blended poetic wholeness, and in belief, or the power of inspiring such. The melody is often trancingly sweet, but is somewhat monotonous, and occasionally stiff; the parts do not blend into each other, almost invisibly, yet without any loss of clearness, as they ought, and as they do, for instance, in Milton; and, last and fatal fault, the reader does not for a moment believe, or think that the author believes—Imagination does not fling her gold-dust in the eyes of Reason, so as to change for a moment their cold, scrutinizing light. In illustration and proof of this last assertion, read the following stanzas: it is impossible, in doing so, not to think that the author is laughing in his sleeve at the whole affair; the subject is the departure of Arthur:—

In street and mart still plies the busy craft;
Still beauty trims for stealthy steps the bower;
By lips as gay the Hircas horn is quaff;
To the dark bourne still flies as fast the hour,
As when in Arthur men adored the sun;
And life's large rainbow took its hues from One!

Yet ne'er by prince more loved a crown was worn,
And hadst thou ventured but to hint the doubt
That loyal subjects ever ceased to mourn,
And that, without him, earth was joy without,
Thou soon hadst joined in certain warm dominions
The horned friends of pestilent opinions.

This is admirable, if the feat given is to hop, at a moment's notice, from the sublime to the ridiculous; if a rather poor and stale joke is, in the circumstances, utterly inconsistent with epic grandeur, the stanzas are utterly inadmissible.

But we might say much, too, very much, in praise of the poem. It contains numberless splendid lines; certain of its portraits, as that of the Vandal king, are drawn with amazing truth and point, and a very great command of imagery is shown.

The following picture of Arthur and Ægle we think extremely beautiful:—

Lo! the sweet valley in the flush of eve!
Lo! side by side, where through the rose arcade
Steals the love-star, the hero and the maid!

Silent they gaze into each other's eyes,
 Stirring the inmost soul's unquiet sleep ;
 So pierce soft starbeams blending wave and skies,
 Some holy fountain trembling to its deep !
 Bright to each eye each human heart is bare,
 And scarce a thought to start an angel there !

Before them, at the distance, o'er the blue
 Of the sweet waves which girt the rosy isle,
 Flitted light shapes the inwoven alleys through ;
 Remotely mellowed, musical the while,
 Floated the hum of voices, and the sweet
 Lutes chimed with timbrels to dim glancing feet.

The calm swan rested on the breathless glass
 Of dreamy waters, and the snow-white steer
 Near the opposing margin, motionless,
 Stood, knee-deep, gazing wistful on its clear
 And life-like shadow, shimmering deep and far,
 Where on the lucid darkness fell the star.

And when, at last, from Ægle's lips, the voice
 Came soft as murmured hymns at closing day,
 The sweet sound seemed the sweet air to rejoice —
 To give the sole charm wanting — to convey
 The crowning music to the musical ;
 As with the soul of love infusing all !

We cannot, we regret extremely, give the whole scene: the following is in a different, though kindred, style ; it illustrates well Bulwer's command of the stores of beauty contained in the Greek mythology : —

Spring on the Polar seas ! not violent-crowned
 By dewy Hours, nor to cerulean halls
 Melodious hymned, yet Light itself around
 Her stately path sheds starry coronals.
 Sublime she comes, as when, from Dis set free,
 Came, through the flash of Jove, Persephone.

She comes — that grand Aurora of the North !
 By steeds of fire her glorious chariot borne,
 From Boreal courts, the meteors flaming forth,
 Ope heaven on heaven, before the mighty Morn,
 And round the rebel giants of the Night,
 On earth's last confines bursts the storm of Light.

Wonder and awe ! lo, where against the Sun
 A second Sun* his lurid front uprears !
 As if the first-born lost Hyperion,
 Hurled down of old from his Uranian spheres,
 Rose from the hell-rocks on his writhings piled,
 And glared defiance on his Titan child.

Now life, the polar life, returns once more ;
 The reindeer roots his mosses from the snows ;
 The whirring sea-gulls shriek along the shore ;
 Through oozing rills the cygnet gleaming goes ;
 And, where the ice some happier verdure frees,
 Laugh into light frank-eyed anemones.

So much for "King Arthur;" its beauties almost make us exclaim, "The power of language could no farther go;" its faults are perhaps all embraced in these words, "it lacks the unconscious fervor of poetry."

"The New Timon" is keen, clear, sparkling, swift-flowing ; in melody free and firm, in diction flashing, in spirit kindly and true ;

 we suppose there are very few similar pieces of higher merit in the language. This portrait of Lord John Russell justifies, and more than justifies, all we have said : —

Next, cool and all unconscious of reproach,
 Comes the calm "Johnny who upset the coach."
 How formed to lead, if not too proud to please —
 His face would fire you, but his manners freeze.
 Like or dislike, he does not care a jot ;
 He wants your vote, but your affection not.
 Yet human hearts need sun as well as oats —
 So cold a climate plays the deuce with votes.
 And while his doctrines ripen day by day,
 His frost-nipped party pines itself away ;
 From the starved wretch its own loved child we steal,

And "Free-trade" chirrups on the lap of Peel !
 But see our statesman when the steam is on,
 And languid Johnny glows to glorious John !
 When Hampden's thought, by Falkland's muses drest,
 Lights the pale cheek, and swells the generous breast ;

When the pent heat expands the quickening soul,
 And foremost in the race the wheels of genius roll.

In a different tone is this, but very fine : —

That wistful eye, that changing lip, that tone,
 Whose accents drooped or gladdened, from her own,

Haunted the woman's heart, which ever heaves
 Its echo back to every sound that grieves.
 Light as the gossamer its tissue spins
 O'er freshest dews when summer morn begins,
 Will Fancy weave its airy web above
 The dews of Pity, in the dawn of Love !

We may take this as the illustration of a remark which applies to Sir Edward's style in every form of composition ; he indulges, more than any writer we know, in the personification of the feelings and passions, their representation, without being directly decked out in the attributes of the living, as actual acting entities. Love, in her smile, shedding dewy freshness and sunny warmth : Hate, frowning with the frown of his birth-place :
 Hope, waving her banner of woven smiles and sunbeams : Despair, scowling with relentless malignity on his victims — all these, and multitudes more, figure in Sir Edward's pages.
 When executed with poetic truth, no form of adornment is more pleasing.

Of Bulwer as a translator and dramatist we speak not : in the first capacity he has, if we mistake not, won universal applause : in the second, he combines his qualities as novelist and poetical composer, making a most happy compound.

As a public teacher, Sir Edward has said a great deal that one may believe and follow, and a great deal more that one should know.
 With a keen, bright blade he cuts into fashion-

worship, wealth-worship, religious formalism, "respectable" baseness, and most of the shams and anomalies that lurk about our social fabric. He does not cast his eye over the time with the revealing lightning that sometimes dwells in that of Carlyle; he does not penetrate in many cases into the very root of our social evils; but he smites often with great effect, and in the proper quarter. The first of our following extracts contains a melancholy fact; the second is a clever, and doubtless a true portrait; the third we beseech our readers to take home and sleep over — they may get a glimpse of truth ere the morning: — "As the first impression the foreigner receives on entering England is that of the evidence of wealth, so the first thing that strikes the moral inquirer into our social system is the respect in which wealth is held; in some countries pleasure is the idea; in others glory, and the prouder desires of the world; but with us money is the mightiest of all deities." . . . "Mr. Bluff is the last character I shall describe in this chapter. He is the sensible, practical man. He despises all speculations but those in which he has a share. He is very intolerant to other people's hobby-horses; he hates both poets and philosophers. He has a great love of facts; if you could speak to him out of the multiplication table, he would think you a great orator. He does not observe how the facts are applied to the theory; he only wants the facts themselves. If you were to say to him thus, 'When abuses arise to a certain pitch, they must be remedied,' he would think you a shallow fellow — a theorist; but if you were to say to him, 'One thousand pauper children are born in London; in 1823 wheat was forty-nine shillings; hop-grounds let from ten to twelve shillings an acre, and you must, therefore, confess that, when abuses rise to a certain pitch, they must be remedied,' Mr. Bluff would nod his wise head, and say of you to his next neighbor, 'That's the man for my money; you see what a quantity of facts he puts into his speech.'" "Facts, like stones, are nothing in themselves, their value consists in the manner they are put together, and the purpose to which they are applied. Accordingly, Mr. Bluff is always taken in. Looking only at a fact, he does not see an inch beyond it, and you might draw him into any imprudence, if you were constantly telling him 'two and two made four.' Mr. Bluff is wonderfully English. It is by 'practical men' that we have ever been seduced into the wildest speculations; and the most preposterous of living theorists always begins his harangues with 'Now, my friends, let us look to the facts.'" "

Our space is well-nigh exhausted; we cannot speak of "Athens." It shows the power of hard-working retained by him who is probably the greatest novelist of the day: it is emotionally true; sympathizing with all that is free and noble. In style it is fervid and luminous: on the whole, it is a fine book.

The general characteristic which, more than another, distinguishes the subject of our sketch is vast diffusion accompanied with extraordinary power; diffusion of energy, width of sympathy, variety of intellectual faculty. This diffusion, this width, and this variety have perhaps been equalled in extent, but they have very rarely been equalled both in range and in strength; where they have, as in the case of Southey, the fact has been the marking one in the character. Neither emotionally nor intellectually, is Sir Edward's mind determined, with overwhelming force, in any one direction; round no one subject has centred his love; to no one subject have his intellectual powers, with exclusive and concentrated force, been directed. The result has been that, in neither case, he has attained the highest degree of excellence; as a thinker, his generation will never accept him for guide, or expect from him the deepest wisdom; as a poet he has failed. The novel may be regarded as that debatable ground, between the realms of the philosophic thinker and the poet, where those who are not irresistibly fixed by nature, either in the one sphere or in the other, may find fitting development and exercise for their powers: in the department of the novel, accordingly, Sir Edward has won very high honors. In opinion, striking generally the golden mean, he is remarkably safe. In composition, he honestly avoids the fantastic, and does not appear to be haunted with the dread of commonplace, which leads so many at present astray; if he cannot win our applause by lofty excellence, he scorns to do it by stage tricks: he floats, arrayed in fairest colors, between the region of the poet and the prosier; he has not the belief, the music, the heaven-kindled enthusiasm of Milton; he has not the coldness and penetration of Butler or Foster; his poetry often degenerates into prose, his prose sometimes rises into a region of power and beauty which may be called poetic.

Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer Lytton is the son of General Bulwer, of Haydon Hall, Norfolk. At college he was distinguished as a poetical prizier; an infallible indication of linguistic fluency, but almost never of poetic power. He published "Pelham" about the year 1827; and the order in which we have given his chief novels indicates chronologically the stages of his mind. He obtained his baronetcy from the whig government.

The firm foot is that which finds firm footing. The weak falters although it be standing upon a rock.

THE LIFE AND POETRY OF EDGAR POE.

Among the results of that spirit of enterprise which has brought us into intimate connection with the other nations of the earth, a more extended knowledge of literature is certainly not the least interesting. The triumphs of science and human energy, which have done so much to change our ideas of distance, and to give us ample opportunities of becoming acquainted with the remote portions of the world, have had an effect in widening the circle of readers to such a degree, that authors may now be said to write, not for those of their own country merely, but for a world-wide public. This is especially the case in regard to those who, though separated from us by the mighty ocean, use the same language, and give expression to ideas very similar to our own. The extent to which our knowledge of American literature has increased within the last few years, is one of the most striking illustrations that could be adduced of the manner in which free communication between nation and nation contributes to the general diffusion of enlightenment, and the cultivation of an elevated taste. As may easily be supposed, our transatlantic cousins have hitherto profited most by these benefits. Their literature and art are little else as yet than reflections of our own; but we have, nevertheless, obtained some return for what they have derived from us, in the works of the more recent American authors — works which are now beginning to exhibit greater originality, and indicate the formation of what will in course of time be worthy of being considered a national literature. The poets and novelists are leading the van in this intellectual progress; for it is obvious that the specimens of American poetry with which we are now more or less familiar, evince a far higher order of genius, and more remarkable characteristics of originality, than anything of the kind which the poets of the New World formerly produced. They are distinguished by a greater degree of freshness, by a more delicate sense of the beautiful, and a higher tone of feeling; and although a great poem, in the true sense of the term, has not yet reached us from the other side of the Atlantic, not a few remarkable ones may now be pointed to in the works of such men as Longfellow, Bryant, Lowell, Whittier, and Poe. While the first two of these are now nearly as familiar to the lovers of poetry among us as they are in their own country, the others, equally worthy of notice, are by no means so well known as they deserve to be. Poe, as a writer of more than ordinary power, and as one who has evinced far more originality than any of his contemporaries, is especially worthy of attention; and we therefore propose, in the course of this article, to present our readers with an outline of his strange, sad history, and a few selections from such of his poems as are most remarkable.

Three volumes of poems, tales, essays, and criticisms, recently collected and published in America, contain the contributions of Edgar Allan Poe to the periodical literature of his country, and form the sole basis upon which his reputation as a writer rests. Very recently, his poems alone have been republished in England, with a brief prefatory essay, in which his merits as a prose-writer are scarcely even referred to, while the moral of his life is obviously mistaken. From a biography prefixed to the New York edition, we are enabled to form an estimate of his personal character, such as his works do not afford; and we doubt if the records of human wretchedness and frailty can yield anything more painful than the facts upon which that estimate is founded. Mental philosophy will scarcely enable us to account for the consistency of a fine sense of the beautiful, both in physics and in morals, with an extreme practical demoralization; but that it did exist in the case before us, as in many others, there is no room to doubt; for never, we believe, was genius allied to vice in its grosser forms more apparent than in the career of Edgar Poe. Unhappily, circumstances of the most unfavorable kind surrounded him at his very birth, for both his parents died while he was a mere child, leaving him little else than the dangerous inheritance of strong passions and a restless disposition. His lot, in a worldly point of view, was by no means a hard one, however, for at his father's death he was adopted by a gentleman of ample means and a kindly heart, who strove with true paternal solicitude to guide and control the wayward boy. His efforts were unavailing; for no sooner had Poe returned from England, where he had been taken by his foster-father for the purpose of obtaining the advantages of a liberal education, than he entered upon the course of recklessness and dissipation which ended only with his life. Expelled from an American university, he returned home to repay his guardian's kindness with insults and ingratitude of the worst description, and subsequently set forth on a Quixotic journey to join the Greeks in their struggle for independence. Greece he never reached, however, but was picked up a wandering beggar in Russia, and sent back only to be cashiered from a military establishment into which he had been admitted by influence of no ordinary kind.

We next hear of him as a private soldier, then as the successful competitor for a prize offered by an enterprising publisher for a tale and poem, and again as a miserable and half-famished writer for obscure periodicals. Poe's genius was not such as to remain long in obscurity, and accordingly his writings speedily brought him into notice, and procured him lucrative and honorable employment. For a time he seemed to have overcome his evil propensities, and to have resolved upon a new course of life. He married a young, beautiful, and gentle wife — "The Beautiful Annabel Lee" of his touching and exquisite lyric. He surrounded his home with all those refinements which a highly-cultivated taste could suggest and a moderate income allow. In his humble yet poetical home, he appeared to those who knew him best to have begun that career of high endeavor for which his genius was so well fitted, and to have entered upon a course which would soon lead to fame and fortune. A few months, however, and all this was at an end. His employers were compelled, reluctantly it is believed, to free themselves from a connection with one whose power they appreciated, but whose irregularities and apparent insanity were continually the source not only of annoyance, but of great pecuniary risk; for Poe's antipathies, always violent, were rendered tenfold more so by intemperance, and he seldom scrupled as to the means of giving expression to them. After continued periods of dissipation, intervals of sobriety and great labor occurred. There were times of remorse, and often of brilliant achievement. Let no one deem such language misapplied in the case of one who was as yet only a writer of fugitive papers for ordinary periodicals. The periodicalism of America has fostered all its best writers; and there, not less than with us, do we find the highest evidences of intellectual strength in what is designed to last only for a few days. The nature of many of Poe's contributions was, however, enduring; they bore the impress of genius; and, twenty years hence, the best of them will probably be much more familiar to English readers than they are now. These were thrown off with amazing rapidity, considering their character, at a time when, after his settlement in New York, all who admired them, and were interested in their author, deemed that he had entered upon a new and purer course of life.

This hopeful period, however, was soon at an end. In two years after, his wife, whom he seems to have really loved, died in abject penury, and he had once more plunged into the wildest excesses. Desperately depraved, reckless, and mad, he still, at intervals, astonished his countrymen with some new proof of his genius. The literary circles of New York were always open to him in his sober hours; and even in his worst days he lacked not the self-sacrificing devotedness of woman. The mother of his dead wife clung to him, hoping against hope, caring for him, screening him, and, amid all his self-abandonment, watching over and seeking help for him. Occasionally it would seem as if this tenderness and solicitude had brought back Poe to a sense of shame. He again turned earnestly to his pen; and in 1848, produced Eureka, a work to the composition of which he brought his capacities obviously in their most complete development. It is a prose poem on the cosmogony of the universe, a work of rare power, and the effect of which in America was beyond anything that had been experienced for years. It greatly increased the number of Poe's admirers, among whom was a lady spoken of by his biographer, as "one of the most brilliant women in New England." Whether from sufficient cause or not, the name of this lady and that of the admired but wretched poet were frequently associated, and it was hoped that their expected union might have a beneficial influence upon his character. This, however, did not take place — Poe, in a fit of almost incomprehensible brutality, having obtruded himself, designedly it was thought, upon a circle of her friends, and in her own presence, in a state of wild inebriety. Another, and the last, temporary reformation followed this occurrence. He once more gave evidence of a determination of amendment — spoke with unaffected horror of his past life, and became jealous of seduction into his former courses. Temptation assailed him, however, at an unguarded moment, while on his way to accept of an honorable invitation from a literary institute, and he fell never again to rise. After days of dissipation and madness, he died in the public hospital of Baltimore, in October, 1849, at the early age of thirty-eight.

The moral of this melancholy history lies upon the surface. Dark sometimes, dreadfully dark as is the page on which are written the records of genius, we know of nothing more sad and painful than this, for never, we believe, was the poetic gift allied with so much that was essentially depraved. It is more than doubtful whether the daring recklessness, the wild license with which men like Poe sported with the responsibilities of life, have not done far more for Satan, than in their highest and purest works they have done for man. And yet the poetry of this poor inebriate is free from aught of that viciousness which marked his life; for the most part, it is a mournful wail of one whose natural endowments were never called into play without uttering unconsciously deep and touching sorrow over the wreck of the spirit of which they formed a part. It is the sad, dirge-like music of those moments which were pauses in a lawless life — a strain in which the agony of remorse seems to thrill with all its intensity, or to grasp at strange, quaint fancies, and force them to interpret things it dare not distinctly utter. And thus much that Poe has written, is autobiographical in a stricter sense than poetry of a strongly subjective character generally is. Draped in the sombre or the flaming garments with which his imagination invested them, we see the poet himself, and all his mocking or upbraiding thoughts, wandering wildly through the melancholy numbers. There is a deep and beautiful tenderness, too, in some of his lyrics, as witness the exquisite poem of Annabel Lee — the expression of his sorrow for the death of his gentle wife.

It was many and many a year ago,
In a kingdom by the sea,
That a maiden there lived, whom you may know
By the name of Annabel Lee;
And this maiden she lived with no other thought
Than to love and be loved by me.

I was a child, and she was a child,
In this kingdom by the sea,
But we loved with a love that was more than love,
I and my Annabel Lee —
With a love that the winged seraphs of heaven
Coveted her and me.

And this was the reason that, long ago,
In this kingdom by the sea,
A wind blew out of a cloud, chilling
My beautiful Annabel Lee;
So that her high-born kinsmen came
And bore her away from me,
To shut her up in a sepulchre,
In this kingdom by the sea.

But the moon never beams, without bringing me dreams
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee;
And the stars never rise, but I feel the bright eyes
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee.
And so, all the night-tide, I lie down by the side
Of my darling — my darling — my life and my bride,
In the sepulchre there by the sea —
In her tomb by the sounding sea.

This strain of sorrow is only equalled by those in which the poet mourns over the wreck of his wasted life. Amid all his wild excesses, and his self-outlawry from the amenities of social existence, he had no more severe censor than that which spoke from within his own soul. This is strikingly manifest in the poem entitled The Haunted Palace, and especially in the following stanzas of it: —

In the greenest of our valleys,
By good angels tenanted,
Once a fair and stately palace —
Radiant palace — reared its head;
In the monarch Thought's dominions,
It stood there.
Never seraph spread a pinion
Over fabric half so fair.

But evil things, in robes of sorrow,
Assailed the monarch's high estate;
Ah, let us mourn! for never morrow
Shall dawn upon him desolate!

And round about his home the glory
That blushed and bloomed,
Is but a dim-remembered story
Of the old time entombed.

And travellers, now, within that valley,
Through the red-litten windows see
Vast forms, that move fantastically,
To a discordant melody;
While, like a ghastly rapid river,
Through the pale door,
A hideous throng rush out forever,
And laugh, but smile no more.

While Poe's genius was necessarily infected by the depravity of his life to the extent of a misanthropical faithlessness in man, his poetry, from the circumstance of its being so strictly subjective, is less unhealthy than his prose. The utterance of his own self-knowledge is, moreover, always too passionate to be deemed insincere. His tales and sketches are often pervaded by the horrible, to an extent which is only saved from being repulsive by the power of imagination and the strength of the reasoning faculty displayed in them; but in his poems there are almost always glimpses afforded of a ruined beauty, and an analytic treatment of emotion, sufficient to give them a moral tone. He seems, as it were, to have preserved the latter sacred to the expression of his own sorrow; for that the phantom of the past rose up before him with awful, soul-subduing severity is clear, we think, from many of his best poems. The Raven is the most remarkable proof of this; and when we know that it was written during what might be considered the longest of those periods of sober earnestness, strong thought, and incessant labor which occurred in his brief career, we are at no loss to discover, that what seems fanciful and almost amusing to the ordinary reader, had a deep and terrible significance to the unhappy poet. This remarkable poem, which occupies, we think, the most prominent position among the originalities of American imaginative literature, is much too long to be quoted by us in its entirety, and not a little of its peculiar charm is necessarily lost by its unity of strong emotion being broken up. Suffice it to give a mere outline of the poet's reverie broken by the tapping at his chamber door, and the subsequent colloquy with the "stately Raven of the saintly days of yore" — a meet emblem of the dark shadow of his own worse than wasted life which conscience summons up before him.

Then this ebony bird beguiling my sad fancy into smiling,
By the grave and stern decorum of the countenance it wore;
"Though thy crest be shorn and shaven, thou,"
I said, "art sure no craven, Ghastly grim and ancient Raven, wandering from the night's shore —

Tell me what thy lordly name is on the night's Plutonian shore?"

Quoth the Raven: "Never more."

But the Raven sitting lonely on that placid bust, spoke only
That one word, as if his soul in that one word he did outpour —
Nothing further then he uttered; not a feather
then he fluttered;
Till I scarcely more than muttered: "Other friends have flown before:
On the morrow he will leave me, as my hopes have done before."
Then the bird said: "Never more."

Startled at the stillness broken by reply so aptly spoken —
"Doubtless," said I, "what it utters is its only stock and store,
Caught from some unhappy master, whom unmerciful disaster
Followed fast and followed faster, till his songs
one burden bore —
Till the dirges of his hope that melancholy burden bore,
Of — Never, never more."

"Prophet," said I, "king of evil — prophet still, if bird or devil!
By that heaven that bends above us — by that God we both adore,
Tell this soul, with sorrow laden, if within the distant Aiden,
It shall clasp a sainted maiden, whom the angels
name Lenore —
Clasp a rare and radiant maiden, whom the angels
name Lenore."
Quoth the Raven: "Never more."

"Be that word our sign of parting, bird or fiend," I cried upstarting;
"Get thee back into the tempest and the night's Plutonian shore;
Leave no black plume as a token of that lie thy soul hath spoken!
Leave my loneliness unbroken! quit the bust above my door —
Take thy beak from out my heart, and take thy form from off my door!"
Quoth the Raven: "Never more."

And the Raven, never flitting, still is sitting, still is sitting,
On the placid bust of Pallas, just above my chamber door;
And his eyes have all the seeming of a demon's
that is dreaming,
And the lamp-light o'er him streaming, throws
his shadow on the floor;
And my soul from out that shadow that lies floating on the floor,
Shall be lifted — Never more.

We are disposed to believe that even these verses, detached as they are from the poem, and affording only an imperfect idea of its effect as a whole, indicate more than ordinary power. It is certainly unique in American literature, as much so as the Christabel and Ancient Mariner of Coleridge are in our own; and unquestionably a poetical reputation has been earned by things that will not bear comparison with it for a moment, even in point of artistic construction merely, for there is a wonderful harmony between the feeling and the rhythmical expression. The peculiar irregular music of Poe's poetry is not the least striking proof of its original character. Style may always be imitated within the ordinary limits of mere versification, but that structure of rhythmical cadence which takes its form from the things expressed, is peculiarly the work of genius. Poe has carried this to an extreme in certain strains of inner music, so to speak — poems which have arranged themselves within the author's fancy both as to the thought or feeling and the rhyme; but the former being obscure, the latter is to a great extent unintelligible, and in some instances discordant.

Some stanzas from a piece, entitled The Bells, will suffice to illustrate the power he shows in maintaining the completeness of the harmony between the idea and its expression.

Hear the sledges with the bells —
Silver bells!
What a world of merriment their melody foretells!
How they tinkle, tinkle, tinkle
In the icy air of night!
While the stars that oversprinkle
All the heavens, seem to twinkle
With a crystalline delight;
Keeping time, time, time,
In a sort of Runic rhyme,
To the tintinnabulation that so musically swells
From the bells, bells, bells, bells,
Bells, bells, bells;
From the jangling and the tinkling of the bells.
Hear the loud alarm bells —
Brazen bells!

What a tale of terror, now, their turbulency tells!
In the startled ear of night,
How they scream out their affright!
Too much horrified to speak,
They can only shriek, shriek
Out of tune,
In a clamorous appealing to the mercy of the fire —
In a mad exostulation to the deaf and frantic fire;
Leaping higher, higher, higher,
With a desperate desire.
O the bells, bells, bells!
What a tale their terror tells
Of despair!
How they clang, and clash, and roar!
What a horror they outpour
On the bosom of the palpitating air!

This is an achievement in versification which even Southey, curious and studiously desirous of excelling in such things, has not equalled:
it greatly surpasses most of his efforts, indeed, inasmuch as the imagination evinced in the last stanzas we have quoted surpasses mere feats in rhyme.

We have already said that Poe's poetry may be regarded as in a very special sense the expression of his own self-consciousness. Wild and melancholy as is its general character, there are a few strains which show that the spirit of the wretched poet was sometimes visited by dreams of surpassing beauty — glimpses of purity — of passionate yet exalted love, and of a higher faith than that of his ordinary life even at its best. It would seem as if in these his genius vindicated itself by a protest of beauty against the gloomy broodings of a disquieted conscience or the frenzied excesses of a vicious life; and yet the beauty ever wears the hue of sadness.

The prose works of Edgar Poe are for the most part susceptible of being accounted for on the principle we have already hinted at — namely, that which places them in a completely different light as regards their author's own being from the poems. They are of two classes — those in which a strong yet gloomy imagination creates consistently with its own nature, exploring the deepest depths of the horrible; and those in which a keen, clear intellect is more predominant than imaginative power. The combination of these two characteristics in the works of a single man must ever infer no ordinary degree of intellectual strength: in the works of such a man as Poe, it is somewhat extraordinary. Let the reader turn to his singular sketch, entitled The Purloined Letter, or to some of his criticisms, after reading such things as The Fall of the House of Usher, or The Cask of Amontillado, and he will find it difficult to believe that the acumen, the clear, vigorous reasoning of the former, could ever have proceeded from a man of such a wild and morbid imagination as is evinced in the latter. Such, we are told by his biographer, was Poe's success in combining both these characteristics by admirably sustained argument on imaginary evidence, and in a supposititious case, that many of his readers could not be persuaded of its fictitious character. And yet we have seen what was the nature, the life, and death of this sad wreck alike of genius and humanity. Judging from the works he has left, Poe is unquestionably the most original imaginative writer America has yet produced. There is not a line in all his poetry which suggests the idea of imitation; and nothing in his prose — if we except his wilder tales, which are like so many refinements on the gross horrors of old German romance — to which we could adduce a strict parallel.

ICEBERGS. — A great many icebergs were seen, as the ships lay motionless in the water; and as they appeared to run together on the far distant horizon, an idea arose that they were so close, that no ships could pass between them. Some of them were in the form of large square cubes, with flat and horizontal tops; others, again, presented every variety of form — now resembling cities and villages, now ruins; and again, you might imagine one to be a solitary country church, in the modest Gothic style, rising beautifully above the level plain, on the distant horizon, and adding a sacred charm to everything around it: some appeared to be loaded with huge boulders and mud, shortly to be precipitated into the sea which bore them along; while others were yielding themselves submissively to the wasting influence of the sea, and the powerful rays of the sun. There was one iceberg which was particularly noticed, because it never shifted its position, when others, of rather larger size, were drifting to and fro with the tides. It was about two hundred feet in height, above the surface of the sea, and its perpendicular sides, which were nearly equal, were not less than two miles in length. The upper surface was horizontal, but very irregular, appearing as if it had been planted over with rough and irregularly conical eminences, packed closely together, and varying in height from twelve to twenty or thirty feet. The water-lines at the level of the ice around it were also horizontal. There seemed to be no reason for any other opinion than this, that it had never changed its centre of gravity since it descended into the sea, and had become detached from the glacier which gave it birth. The cubic contents and weight of such a floating world are truly astonishing. This berg displaced upwards of eighteen thousand millions of cubic feet of water, while its contents must have been nearly twenty-three thousand millions of cubic feet, and its weight nearly five hundred and forty millions of tons! — Dr. Sutherland's Journal.

DECLIVITY OF RIVERS. — A very slight declivity suffices to give the running motion to water. Three inches per mile, in a smooth, straight channel, gives a velocity of about three miles an hour. The Ganges, which gathers the waters of the Himalaya Mountains, the loftiest in the world, is, at eighteen hundred miles from its mouth, only about eight hundred feet above the level of the sea — about twice the height of St. Paul's, in London, or the height of Arthur's Seat, in Edinburgh — and to fall these eight hundred feet in its long course, the water requires more than a month. The great river Magdalena, in South America, running for one thousand miles between two ridges of the Andes, falls only five hundred feet in all that distance; above the commencement of the one thousand miles, it is seen descending in rapids and cataracts from the mountains. The gigantic Rio de la Plata has so gentle a descent to the ocean, that, in Paraguay, fifteen hundred miles from its mouth, large ships are seen which have sailed against the current all the way by the force of the wind alone — that is to say, which, on the beautifully inclined plane of the stream, have been gradually lifted by the soft wind, and even against the current, to an elevation greater than that of our loftiest spires — Arnott's Physics.

FACTS CONNECTED WITH THE LAST HOURS OF NAPOLEON.

BY MRS. MAJOR WARD.

On the night of the 5th of May, 1821, a young ensign of the 66th regiment, quartered at St. Helena, was wending his solitary way along the path leading from the plain of Deadwood to his barracks, situated on a patch of table-land called Francis Plain. The road was dreary, for to the left yawned a vast chasm, the remains of a crater, and known to the islanders as the "Devil's Punchbowl;" although the weather had been perfectly calm, puffs of wind occasionally issued from the neighboring valleys; and at last, one of these puffs having got into a gully, had so much ado to get out of it, that it shrieked, and moaned, and gibbered, till it burst its bonds with a roar like thunder—and dragged up in its wrath, on its passage to the sea, a few shrubs and one of those fair willows, beneath which Napoleon, first Emperor of France, had passed many a peaceful, if not a happy hour of repose, surrounded by his faithful friends in exile.

This occurrence, not uncommon at St. Helena, has given rise to an idea, adopted even by Sir Walter Scott, that the soul of Napoleon had passed to another destiny on the wings of the storm-spirit; but, so far from there being any tumult among the elements on that eventful night, the gust of wind I have alluded to was only heard by the few whose cottages dotted the green slopes of the neighboring mountains. But as that fair tree dropped, a whisper fell among the islanders that Napoleon was dead! No need to dwell upon what abler pens than mine have recorded; the eagle's wings were folded, the dauntless eyes were closed, the last words, "Tête armée," had passed the faded lips, the proud heart had ceased to beat . . . !

They arrayed the illustrious corpse in the attire identified with Napoleon even at the present day; and among the jewelled honors of earth so profusely scattered upon the breast, rested the symbol of the faith he had professed. They shaded the magnificent brow with the unsightly cocked hat,* and stretched down the beautiful hands in ungraceful fashion; every one, in fact, is familiar with the attitude I describe, as well as with a death-like cast of the imperial head, from which a fine engraving has been taken. The cast is true enough to nature, but the character of the engraving is spoiled by the addition of a laurel wreath on the lofty but insensate brow.

* The coffin being too short to admit this array in the order proposed, the hat was placed at the feet before interment.

Now about this cast there is a historiette with which it is quite time the public should become more intimately acquainted; it caused a subject of litigation, the particulars of which are detailed in the Times newspaper of 1821, but to which I have no opportunity of referring just now. Evidence, however, was unfortunately wanting at the necessary moment, and the complainant's case fell to the ground. The facts are these:—

The day after Napoleon's decease, the young officer I have alluded to, instigated by emotions which drew vast numbers to Longwood-house, found himself within the very death-chamber of Napoleon. After the first thrill of awe had subsided, he sat down, and on the fly-leaf torn from a book, and given him by General Bertrand, he took a rapid but faithful sketch of the deceased emperor. Earlier in the day, the officer had accompanied his friend Dr. Burton, of the 66th regiment, through certain paths in the island, in order to collect material for making a composition resembling plaster of Paris, for the purpose of taking the cast with as little delay after death as possible. Dr. Burton, having prepared the composition, set to work and completed the task satisfactorily. The cast being moist was not easy to remove, and, at Dr. Burton's request, a tray was brought from Madame Bertrand's apartments, madame herself holding it to receive the precious deposit. Mr. —, the ensign above alluded to, impressed with the value of such a memento, offered to take charge of it at his quarters till it was dry enough to be removed to Dr. Burton's; Madame Bertrand, however, pleaded so hard to have the care of it, that the two gentlemen, both Irishmen and soldiers, yielded to her entreaties, and she withdrew with the treasure, which she never afterwards would resign.

There can scarcely, therefore, be a question that the casts and engravings of Napoleon, now sold as emanating from the skill and reverence of Automarchi, are from the original taken by Dr. Burton. We can only rest on circumstantial evidence, which the reader will allow is most conclusive. It is to be regretted that Dr. Burton's cast and that supposed to have been taken by Automarchi were not both demanded in evidence at the trial in 1821.

The engraving I have spoken of has been Italianized by Automarchi, the name inscribed beneath being Napoleone.

So completely was the daily history of Napoleon's life at St. Helena a sealed record, that, on the arrival of papers from England, the first question asked by the islanders and the officers of the garrison, was, "What news of Bonaparte?" Under such circumstances it was natural that an intense curiosity should be felt concerning every movement of the mysterious and ill-starred exile. Our young soldier one night fairly risked his commission for the chance of a glimpse behind the curtains of the Longwood windows; and, after all, saw nothing but the imperial form, from the knees downwards. Every night, at sunset, a cordon of sentries was drawn round the Longwood plantations. Slipping between the sentinels, the venturesome youth crept, under cover of trees, to a lighted window of the mansion. The curtains were not drawn, but the blind was lowered. Between the latter, however, and the window-frame were two or three inches of space; so down knelt Mr. —! Some one was walking up and down the apartment, which was brilliantly illuminated.* The footsteps drew nearer, and Mr. — saw the diamond buckles of a pair of thin shoes; then two well-formed lower limbs, encased in silk stockings; and, lastly, the edge of a coat, lined with white silk. On a sofa, at a little distance, was seated Madame Bertrand, with her boy leaning on her knee; and some one was probably writing under Napoleon's dictation, for the Emperor was speaking slowly and distinctly. Mr. — slipped back to his guard-house, satisfied with having heard the voice of Napoleon Bonaparte.

Mr. — had an opportunity of seeing the great captive at a distance on the very last occasion that Bonaparte breathed the outer air. It was a bright morning when the sergeant of the guard at Longwood-gate informed our ensign that "General Bonaparte" was in the garden on which the guard-room looked. Mr. — seized his spy-glass, and took a breathless survey of Napoleon, who was standing in front of his house with one of his generals. Something on the ground attracted his notice; he stooped to examine — probably a colony of ants, whose movements he watched with interest — when the music of a band at a distance stirred the air on Deadwood plain, and he who once had led multitudes forth at his slightest word, now wended his melancholy way through the grounds of Longwood, to catch a distant glimpse of a British regiment under inspection.

We have in our possession a small signal-book, which was used at St. Helena during the period of Napoleon's exile. The following passages will give some idea of the system of vigilance which it was thought necessary to exercise, lest the world should again be suddenly uproused by the appearance of the French emperor on the battle-plain of Europe. It is not for me to offer any opinion on such a system, but I take leave to say that I never yet heard any British officer acknowledge that he would have accepted the authority of governor under the burden of the duties it entailed. In a word, although every one admits the difficulties and responsibilities of Sir Hudson Lowe's position, all deprecate the system to which he considered himself obliged to bend.

But the signal-book! Here are some of the passages which passed from hill to valley while Napoleon took his daily ride within the boundary prescribed:—

"General Bonaparte has left Longwood."

"General Bonaparte has passed the guards."

"General Bonaparte is at Hutt's-gate."*

"General Bonaparte is missing."

The latter paragraph resulted from General Bonaparte having, in the course of his ride, turned an angle of a hill, or descended some valley beyond the ken, for a few minutes, of the men working the telegraphs on the hills!

It was not permitted that the once Emperor of France should be designated by any other title than "General Bonaparte;" and, alas! innumerable were the squabbles that arose between the governor and his captive, because the British ministry had made this puerile order peremptory. I have now no hesitation in making known the great duke's opinion on this subject, which was transmitted to me two years ago, by one who for some months every year held daily intercourse with his grace, but who could not, while the duke was living, permit me to publish what had been expressed in private conversation.

"I would have taken care that he did not escape from St. Helena," said Wellington; "but he might have been addressed by any name he pleased."

I cannot close this paper without saying a word or two on the condition of the buildings once occupied by the most illustrious and most unfortunate of exiles.

It is well known that Napoleon never would inhabit the house which was latterly erected at Longwood for his reception; that he said, "it would serve for his tomb;" and that the slabs from the kitchen did actually form part of the vault in which he was placed, in his favorite valley beneath the willows, and near the fountain whose crystal waters had so often refreshed him. This abode, therefore, is not invested with the same interest as his real residence, well-named the "Old House at Longwood;" for a more crazy, wretched, filthy barn, it would scarcely be possible to meet with; and many painful emotions have filled my heart during nearly a four-years' sojourn on "the rock;" as I have seen French soldiers and sailors march gravely and decorously to the spot, hallowed, in their eyes, of course, by its associations with their invincible, but unforgotten idol, and degraded, it must be admitted, by the change it has undergone. Indeed, few French persons can be brought to believe that it ever was a decent abode; and no one can deny that it must outrage the feelings of a people like the French, so especially affected by associations, to see the bed-chamber of their former emperor a dirty stable, and the room in which he breathed his last sigh, appropriated to the purposes of winnowing and threshing wheat! In the last-named room are two pathetic mementos of affection. When Napoleon's remains were exhumed, in 1846, Counts Bertrand and Las Cases, carried off with them, the former a piece of the boarded floor on which the emperor's bed had rested, the latter a stone from the wall pressed by the pillow of his dying chief.

Would that I had the influence to recommend to the British government, that these ruined, and I must add, desecrated buildings should be razed to the ground; and that on their site should be erected a convalescent hospital for the sick of all ranks, of both services, and of both nations. Were the British and French governments to unite in this plan how grand a sight would it be to behold the two nations shaking hands, so to speak, over the grave of Napoleon!

On offering this suggestion, when in Paris lately, to one of the nephews of the first Emperor Napoleon, the prince replied that "the idea was nobly philanthropic, but that England would never listen to it." I must add that his highness said this "rather in sorrow than in anger;" then, addressing Count L——, one of the faithful followers of Napoleon in exile, and asking him which mausoleum he preferred — the one in which we then stood, the dome of the Invalides, or the rock of St. Helena — he answered, to my surprise, "St. Helena; for no grander monument than that can ever be raised to the emperor!"

Circumstances have made one little incident connected with this, our visit to the Invalides, most deeply interesting. Comte d'Orsay was of the party; indeed, it was in his elegant atelier we had all assembled, ere starting, to survey the mausoleum being prepared for the ashes of Napoleon. Suffering and debilitated as Comte D'Orsay was, precious, as critiques on art, were the words that fell from his lips during our progress through the work-rooms, as we stopped before the sculptures intended to adorn the vault wherein the sarcophagus is to rest. Ere leaving the works, the director, in exhibiting the solidity of the granite which is finally to encase Napoleon, struck fire with a mallet from the magnificent block; — "See," said Comte D'Orsay, "though the dome of the Invalides may fall, France may yet light a torch at the tomb of her emperor." I cannot remember the exact words, but such was their import; Comte D'Orsay died a few weeks after this.

LOVELINESS IN DEATH.

A DESCRIPTION FROM NATURE.

And we shall be changed in a moment; for this mortal must put on immortality. And when this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall death be swallowed up in victory. — Scripture.

SHE slept, but not kind Nature's sleep;
Friendship could only hope — and weep.
That hope was vain; the vital power
Was wasting with the wasting hour.

Her lids unclosed. She breathed no sound,
But calmly looked on all around,
And each in silence sweetly blest —
Then closed her eyes and sank to rest.

Gone was the life-sustaining breath;
But, oh, how beautiful was death!
Mortality had passed away,
But there a sleeping angel lay.

No voice the slumbering silence broke,
But life in every feature spoke;
For death itself appeared to be
Radiant with immortality.

The countenance a glory were,
A loveliness unknown before;
So perfect, so divinely fair,
A sainted soul seemed present there.

On that calm face were still imprinted
The last emotions of the breast;
There still the parting impress lay
Of fond affection's lingering stay.

And still did resignation speak
Serenely from the placid cheek;
And kind benevolence was there,
With humble faith and trusting prayer.

Oh! how did beauty's softest bloom —
So uncongenial to the tomb —
With love and piety unite,
And sweet repose, and calm delight!

If sleep there be in realms above,
This was the sleep that angels love;
Mortal ne'er dreamed a dream like this,
Of perfect, pure, celestial bliss!

Loved spirit! while thy friends remain
On earth, we cannot meet again;
But, ah, how blest their souls will be,
That pass through death like thine to thee!

BOZZIES.

ENGLISH literature is poor in biography. It is true we have many "Lives," but not many of them are very life-like. Biography-writing is an art little studied. The author oftener thinks of himself than of his subject. If he be rhetorically inclined, he does not so much desire to convey to the reader an accurate picture of the Life delineated, as to astonish by fine writing and beautifully-rounded periods. These rhetorical lives are not worth much. They may dazzle, astonish, and even instruct, but they do not give us what we look for in a biography—a picture of how the man lived, how he dressed and ate, what he did, and what he said. The rhetorical biography is a kind of literary clothes-horse, on which the author exhibits himself. As for life, you see little of it; the subject is only taken as a peg to hang fine sentences upon.

There are biographies of another kind—men who collect all the letters, memoranda, scraps of writing, anecdotes at second-hand, rumors, reports, birth and marriage certificates, of a distinguished personage, and stowing them away in a book, which they "edit" as the "Life and Letters" of such a one; and forthwith a big book is issued from the press. Call this a biography! It is no such thing. It is an omnium gatherum, a collezione, often a pile of rubbish, but not a Life. We have had many notable instances of this sort of manufacture lately, the most melancholy of which was the Life of Wordsworth, by his son. Southey fared rather better, but his Life too suffered in the ponderous six volumes of undigested, though admirable materials, which have recently been given to the world. Wilberforce's Life, though handsomely paid for, was another failure, originating in the same causes. For sons, even though they possess the requisite literary ability, are the last persons to write fairly and dispassionately the Lives of their parents. They draw a veil over those points of character which the world most wishes to see unveiled, and which give the chief interest to a biography. They think of their father's fair name, and aim at reconciling editorial duties with filial love. And thus, often, the pith of the memoir is allowed to escape. Sir Samuel Romilly's life, by his son, is one of the best that has appeared; but, fortunately, the father had left behind him an excellent autobiography which the son allowed to speak for itself, and there was left little more to be desired. To this, we may add the extremely interesting Life of Curran, by his son—one of the best pieces of biography which has come to light of recent years.

Another biography of a highly-celebrated writer is now in course of publication, which seems to have been prepared in the same hasty manner. We allude to the Life of Moore, edited by Lord John Russell. Here we have, not a life, but a collection of materials. His lordship, greatly to his honor, has taken the trouble of arranging the papers which the illustrious poet left behind him, and then sent them so arranged to the publisher. Mr. Panizzi, of the British Museum, whose business is to make catalogues, might have done the work as well: he could have arranged the papers for the printer. But we looked for a biography—a picture of the living, writing, thinking man, by one who knew him; and we have, instead, little more than an arrangement of his papers for publication. It is true, Moore has left behind him a fragment of a diary, fresh and sparkling, which speaks for itself; but we want more than that, and trust the noble editor will yet, before he concludes his labors, supply a portraiture, without which the biography of the poet will be incomplete, and, in many respects, only partially intelligible.

It is said that Johnson, when he heard that Boswell intended to write a Life of him, threatened that he would prevent it by taking Boswell's! This rage of Johnson was doubtless caused by the lamentable manner in which so many great English Lives have been strangled by their biographers. For, good biographies are even rarer than well-spent lives; and many great men have been strangled after death by little men, who have attempted to delineate them, but succeeded only in drawing their own pictures. Strange enough it is, that Boswell, who was so suspected by Johnson as an incompetent biographer, should have left us the most complete portraiture of a great English, living man, that is to be found in our language. And yet Boswell was no distinguished littérateur. Macaulay contemptuously calls him "a dunce, a parasite, a coxcomb"—"one of the smallest men that ever lived." And yet this despised Boswell has written the best English biography—a book that is worthy of a place beside Plutarch. How is this? Why, because Boswell related that of which he knew, and because out of the fulness of his heart and memory his mouth spoke and his pen wrote. He gave us a real Life of Johnson—told us every minute detail about him, even to the kind of coat and wig he wore—the tea, fish-sauce, and veal-pie with plums, which he loved—his rolling walk and blinking eye—his foibles, vanities, and prejudices—his trick of touching the posts as he walked, and his superstition about entering a house with the right foot first—his habit of picking up and treasuring by him scraps of orange-peel—his gruntings—his vehement "You lie, sir!"—his whirlwind eloquence—his fits of rage—his penitence—his gloomy moroseness, and sometimes his uncontrollable laughter. In fact, you have the man as he lived, written down by one who followed him like his shadow; or rather, who daguerreotyped him for us in sun-pictures which shall live forever in English biography. And not only is Johnson delineated as he lived in Boswell's pages, but by far the most characteristic traits in the life of Oliver Goldsmith—those which inform us as to the life, and character, and dress, and conversation, of that simple-minded being—are also to be found recorded there. And so of many others of Johnson's distinguished contemporaries, of whom, but for James Boswell, we should now have known comparatively little.

Carlyle, in his admirable article on Samuel Johnson, originally published in Fraser, has done much to rescue Boswell from the obloquy and contempt which recent commentators have sought to cast upon his name. True, he was a weak, vain man—something of a flunkey. Yet was he a hero-worshipper. He might not have the capacity of being a notable man himself; but he admired all such, and Samuel Johnson was the hero whom he idolized. The man who had in him this intense admiration of a character such as Johnson's could not be so utterly worthless. "It is," says Carlyle, "one of the strangest phenomena of the past century, that at a time when the old reverent feeling of discipleship (such as brought men from far countries, with rich gifts and prostrate souls to the feet of the Prophets), had passed utterly away from men's practical experience, and was no longer surmised to exist (as it does) perennial, indestructible, in man's inmost heart, James Boswell should have been the individual, of all others, predestined to recall it, in such singular guise, to the wondering, and, for a long while, laughing and unrecognized world. The worship of Johnson was his grand, ideal, voluntary business. Does not the frothy-hearted yet enthusiastic man, doffing his advocate-wig, regularly take post and hurry up to London, for the sake of his sage chiefly, as to a Feast of Tabernacles, the sabbath of his whole year? The plate-licker and wine-bibber dives into Bolt Court to sip muddy coffee with a cynical old man, and a sour-tempered, blind old woman (feeling the cups, whether they are full, with her finger), and patiently endures contradictions without end; too happy so he may but be allowed to listen and live. Nay, it does not appear that vulgar vanity could ever have been much flattered by Boswell's relation to Johnson. Mr. Croker says, Johnson was, to the last, little regarded by the great world; from which, for a vulgar vanity, all honor, as from a fountain, descends. Bozzy, even among Johnson's friends and special admirers, seems rather to have been laughed at than envied; his officious, whisking, consequential ways, the daily reproofs and rebuffs he underwent, could gain from the world no golden, but only leaden, opinions. His devout discipleship seemed nothing more than a mean spanielship in the general eye. . . . There is much lying yet undeveloped in the love of Boswell for Johnson. A cheering proof, in a time which else utterly wanted and still wants such, that living Wisdom is quite infinitely precious to man, is the symbol of the Godlike to him, which even weak eyes may discern; that loyalty, discipleship, all that was ever meant by hero-worship, lives perennially in the human bosom, and waits, even in these dead days, only for occasions to unfold it, and inspire all men with it, and again make the world alive! James Boswell we can regard as a practical witness (or real martyr) to this high, everlasting truth."

It was through this intense admiration for Johnson, that Boswell was enabled to produce his life-breathing biography; and although many great literary men have lived since his time, they have been able to produce nothing equal to it. We want more Bozzies—men with a heart and an eye to discern character and to recognize wisdom—with free insight, simple love, and childlike open-mindedness. We have more than enough of rhetorical and didactic talent, but in biography it is out of place. We want faithful delineations of character, which is nature in its highest form; and it is matter for thankfulness that brilliant powers are not needed for its true appreciation. Your Bozzies are the best historians of their age, and often teach us more than Hume or Robertson can do. Even the garrulous Samuel Pepys may tell us more of the real life of his "Own Times" than a Burnet or a Swift.

What would we not give for a Bozzy's account of Shakespeare?—Shakespeare, the man of men, of whose private life so little is known! Indeed, his only autobiography is to be found in his sonnets. But we should like to know how Shakespeare lived, how he dressed, even what kind of stockings he wore, what were his habits, his times of rising up and lying down, whether he wrote in dressing-gown and slippers, how he worked and fared, who his companions and friends were, and, above all, what was his talk and familiar conversation, what were his speculations about life and death, and wealth and poverty, and what was the daily life of the men and women about him. We have only occasional glimpses of these subjects in his noble works; but then, to have his familiar talk jotted down for us, his recollections of his boyhood and of his adventures in the woods of Charlecote; and then his struggles amid London life—how he took to the stage, what was his history there, how he worked his way up to proprietorship in the Blackfriars theatre, what was his life when he went back, full of deep-welling thoughts, to that quiet country life at Stratford-on-Avon, where he died—who would not wish to have all this related to him, as Boswell has related the story of Johnson's career! But, as it is, Shakespeare's life is written in his works; and more than they tell us we can scarcely be said to know. About all such great men there is the most natural desire to know much. The world's eyes are turned to them. We want to know their individuality and manner of existence, which may often be full of profit and instruction for us. But we are curious also as to their features, and looks, and dress, and sayings, and even their most indifferent actions—the record of which only Bozzies can duly note for our satisfaction. Your “distinguished writers” have rarely eyes for such small matter. They are so apt to make the subject of their book a mirror in which they wish to see themselves. The lives they write are not biographies, so much as the dry bones of a body, which should have been alive. It is only the loving, gossiping Bozzies who can adequately satisfy us about the matters we are most desirous to know.

Autobiographies are very instructive; indeed, Johnson has said that every man's life may be best written by himself. But those who write their own lives are apt to omit the very things in which the world takes most interest. A man is not always the best judge himself. He is disposed to paint himself en beau; otherwise he were scarcely human. Rousseau is the only writer who has been honest in this respect, and there may have been an affectation in his confession of faults, not altogether truthful. Hear Rousseau himself on this point:—

“No one can write a man's life so well as himself. His interior being, his true life, is known to himself alone; but, in writing, he disguises it; under the name of a Life he makes an apology; he shows himself as he would like to be seen, but not at all as he is. The sincere are more or less truthful in what they say, but they are more or less false through reservations; and what they conceal has such a bearing on what they avow, that, in telling only a part of the truth, they in reality say nothing. I place Montaigne at the head of these false sincere writers, who would deceive you even in relating what is true. He paints himself with his faults, but then they are only amiable ones; there is no man who has not hateful faults too. Montaigne paints himself like, but only in profile. Who knows but that some gash on the cheek, or a cast in the eye, on the side concealed from us, would not have totally altered the expression of the countenance!”

A man cannot speak freely of himself in his autobiography. As the old Highland proverb has it—“Were the best man's faults written on his forehead, he would pull his bonnet over his brow.” Could you expect him to put them in his biography? And Voltaire has observed in the same spirit, “Every man has a wild beast within him. Few know how to chain him. The greater number give him the rein except when the fear of the law holds them back.” You cannot expect men to tell you honestly how they manage with their “wild beast.” We would rather believe in the Bozzy, to the extent of his observation.

Of recent biographies, Carlyle's Life of Sterling and Disraeli's Life of Lord George Bentinck furnish apposite illustrations. The former is a real, living portrait; it lets you into the actual life of an earnest man—paints him as he lived, and thought, and worked; it is a life worthy of Plutarch. The latter—the life of Lord George Bentinck—is a political pamphlet rather than a life. There is here and there to be found a little of the biographic lath and plaster; but we will venture to say that a better idea of Lord George Bentinck as a man might be obtained from a brief conversation with one of his servants or grooms than from this so-called biography. It is a mere clothes-horse, on which Mr. Disraeli displays his collection of political wares. It is little better than réchauffée of Hansard: certainly it is not the Life of Lord George Bentinck.

The French greatly excel us in biography and memoirs; but this topic we reserve for some future number.

THE Journal des Débats, quoting from the Java Bode, a journal published at Batavia, gives an account of a recent sale of slaves at the Chinese camp. The slaves, twelve in number, having been placed upon the table of the exposition, disposed in four lots, rattled some money in their hands, and addressed a few words timidly and in low tones to the assembly. A person who acted as their agent here stepped forward, and stated that his clients, having accumulated by long and painful labors some small saving, solicited the favor of being allowed to make a bidding for the purchase of their own persons. No opposition being offered, the first lot was cried, and made an offer through their agent, of forty francs. No advance being made upon this sum, the slaves were knocked down to themselves, the next lot, encouraged by their predecessors, offered only twenty-four francs. The public preserved the same silence, and they became their own purchasers. The third lot took the hint, and were even more fortunate, picking themselves up at a decided bargain, for the modest sum of ten francs. The Java Bode sees in these facts a great advance in civilization, especially among the Chinese, who formed the great majority of the persons present.

AN OLD-FASHIONED SWEDISH WEDDING.

ST. STEPHEN'S DAY—Boxing-day as it is sometimes rudely called in England, to the infinite perplexity of foreigners, some of whom want to persuade me that it is among us made the festival of our great national art—St. Stephen's Day is, in Sweden, in one sense, a greater holiday than its predecessor; it is observed in a less religious but more festive manner than Christmas. Shops and offices of all descriptions are closed; visiting, meeting, congratulating, eating, drinking, walking, sledge-driving, smoking, and talking, may well fill up a short winter-day. My post of observation is my window, looking over my favorite Place—Carl tretons Torg. What a scene I look down upon now! the whole street, the whole Place, covered with black figures moving over the snowy ground. Everybody is going out to dinner. You may know that such is the intention of these good people, for it is between two and three o'clock, and the women wear black hoods or black silk kerchiefs on their heads. Among true Swedes, no lady, young or old, goes out to a party or public place without a hood or kerchief, which is taken off on entering. Maid-servants, and decent women of the lower ranks, wear the kerchief at all times when abroad—a bonnet would be thought by them an impropriety, a "setting up for something above them;" their entire costume is still appropriate and distinctive. May they long retain their own fashions, and scorn the tawdry bonnets, flowers, and imitative modes of a similar class among ourselves! To look out of my window on this bright day, and over this charmingly clear and snowy prospect, one might fancy that the whole of Stockholm was moving out to a great funeral. Festivities in Sweden are solemn-looking things. Black is the state-costume in every sense; only black or white can be worn at court, and black is still the state-dress of the plain and lower ranks. Formerly, it was used at every ceremonial or visit of importance; and to-day, the crowds of black figures moving in the bright sunshine, together with the always grave and quiet demeanor of the Swedes when out of doors, give one the idea of anything rather than the festive meetings to which all are hastening.

But are there no mourners left behind, no sick, no sorrowing? Are there no hidden mourners moving among them? Is the festivity of St. Stephen's Day undarkened by a memory, unalloyed by a gnawing heart-pang? Why ask the question? They look happy, speak happily, walk along contentedly, looking as if the world were satisfied with them, and they were satisfied with the world. They are not thinking whether I, perched at the double window over their heads, make an atom of that world or not; but instead of pursuing reflections which might make the good tender heart of my kind friend Frederika Bremer to ache, I will put on my cloak and a bonnet, to show I am not going out to dinner; and then I will take a walk, and distract myself, as my French friends would say, in the only way I can.

The winter air of Sweden is very exhilarating out of doors; within, it is quite the contrary; the rooms are so warm, the walls and windows so thick, the closed-up stoves so oppressively hot, that they make me stupid, heavy, indolent as a native. Now, I am on Norrbro, gazing on a scene that never tires. Here, looking at this beautiful Mälar, in its unfrozen part, sweeping between snowy boundaries, to cast itself into the Baltic, and at the widely-extended and brilliantly-white scene on either side, I get into a better humor than I was in my air-tight rooms, and forget to feel spiteful when I see fur-clad men pulling off their hats, and perhaps exposing a bald crown to the biting air, while they bow, and bow, and bow—three times is the mode—as if they were presented for the first time to the friends they salute; and then grasp them by the hand, clap them on the shoulder, or perhaps, on occasions, hug them in the arms, with all the warmth of brotherhood. And I forbear to envy the hooded women, who are constantly stopping on their way to courtesy down to the ground, and then to pull a hand from the inevitable muff, and extend it with a certain formal heartiness to meet another hand. I never have to pull out my hand from the wide sleeves of my furred cloak, which I try to persuade the Swedes answer for the muff, into which all classes, even without bonnets on their heads, must insert their hands. Voices are buzzing round me in congratulation or hopeful wishes. Perhaps even now some airy voice may syllable my name, but it does not reach me. Well, what matter? If I had to shake many hands, mine would be frozen; and if I had to say: "Hur star det till!" to all the friends I met, my breath would be congealed, as it is on the countless mustaches and beards around me.

I returned alone, as I had gone out, and alone I was to be. There was no dinner dressed in the house this day; every creature had left the immense building, servants and all; a poor old woman was, I believe, in some remote corner, sent in just to see that no one ran away with it. I was alone, and had to make the best of my solitude. My respected and kind friends at the British Embassy had illness in their family, and no one else thought of the solitary stranger on that day of reunions; but there was good in this, too, for it taught me just to do the contrary if ever it lay in my way. Well, darkness came on, the people were all housed; within some doors, all were jocund, hearty—I dare say, sufficiently noisy, for within and without makes a vast difference in Swedish manners; but everything outside was still, and having nothing to look at but the snow, with the lights here and there glittering over it; and nothing to hear, for all traffic and even motion were at an end, save the chance tinkle of a stray sledge-bell—I found it was necessary to open the mental safety-valve, and therefore I took up my pen, when, as if to reward a good child, there came a ring to our door-bell, and I heard a voice outside asking the portress if the English Fruntimmer had gone out. I ran out on the bitterly cold stone passage, and called out “Nay!”—a word which is as good in Swedish as in English, and then I had the pleasure of at last saying, “How do you do?” on St. Stephen’s Day of visiting in Sweden.

“I have come, madame,” said this good Swede, with the usual number of bows, “to bring you to a wedding. You said you would like to see a wedding in the old style—a real Swedish wedding. It is to be in the country, about four miles off. The house was once a pleasure-house of Queen Christina’s; it is thought she walks there still. The sledge is at the door, if you will come.”

A Swedish wedding, and Queen Christina’s ghost! I threw my pen away, ran into the next room, changed my dress, put on my cloak, pulled its hood over my head, and said “I am ready,” before my Swede had had time enough to finish his bows. The sledge was waiting, and this was to be my first night-sledding; the horse was very large for a Swedish one, the carriage small and low; the driver stood on the board behind, holding the long reins, like a Hansom cabman, only the Swede never sits. In the clear twilight of that northern evening he looked strikingly picturesque, and quite in keeping with the white background of the coup d’œil we had in descending. A huge cape of black wolf or dog fur descended almost to his knees; a very high cap of the same, a sort of shako, surmounted his head, and was pulled down to his eyebrows; the fur-collar rose over his mouth, so that the vacant space left by the black fur revealed only the projection of a long, turned-up nose, and a pair of small, vividly black eyes, the sole members exposed to sight or to frost.

I was dressed for a covered sledge, and found this was an open one. No matter; I preferred braving the keen air to returning up those dark, ice-cold stone stairs for more muffling. We got in; pulled the fur apron over us; I said “Go on,” in English, and my companion said “Go on,” in Swedish; the bells jingled; and we were off. The white ground, the clear calm air, the sparkling lights, were accessories to enjoyment. The sledge-bells sounded softly musical in the stilly air. “They are quite lulling,” I said; “they would incline one to sleep on a journey.”

“Yes,” said my Swede: “I can assure you, madame, that our ladies in the country are often lulled to sleep by them when they are coming home at night, perhaps twenty or thirty miles—that is, of your miles—from the balls. But that is dangerous, oh, very dangerous indeed, to sleep at night in an open sledge; and then when they awake, they may also find themselves in the ditch.”

“And do your ladies travel at night in open sledges?”

“That they must certainly do if they go to country balls; but they muffle themselves well up.”

We were soon ascending the heights of Södor, or Södormalm, the south suburb of Stockholm. It was so beautiful! the lights from the many-windowed and unevenly-situated houses, the effects of which are an unceasing pleasure to me from my windows, were now sparkling out on the snow around, before, behind us; the palace was all lighted up; the old queen dowager, I believe, entertained her royal and most amiable son that day. We passed the water, or what was the water, where now the frost-bound ships and boats stood motionless and silent; the streets were as quiet as in the dead of night, yet it was scarcely six o’clock; only the half-frozen sentinels, and a strangely isolated-looking passenger, were to be seen. We got beyond the town. I beheld, for the first time in Sweden, a winter country-scene by night. My companion, assuring me that it did not always look so dreary, thought me very polite to him or his country, while all the time the admiration and pleasure expressed were real and heartfelt. The scenery was so new and picturesque to my eyes. The snow just then lay deep, the ground was abruptly broken into hills and hollows, the moon had not risen, yet all was distinctly visible in the clear twilight, and the large stars spangled the lofty sky; our tinkling bells warned a few walkers of our otherwise noiseless approach; but no decent woman in Sweden goes without a lantern, and the only one we met had hers in a curious fashion. I thought it was a moving lamp-post at a distance; but I found she had her lantern fastened like a great brooch to her person, in order that her hands should not be benumbed by holding it. At last, we left the public road, and ascended a hilly avenue to a very retired old house, which had once been a favorite villa of that famous, and perhaps still little understood personage, Queen Christina. The Swedes, who certainly relish a bit of scandal as much as any other of their national dishes, tell all sorts of stories about the origin of this retreat, which was then further removed from what was the fashionable side of Stockholm; but if this now common-place and dilapidated old house was really the scene of such adventures as they hint at, it is no wonder that the ghost of poor Queen Christina returns to visit, by the glimpses of the moon, the theatre of earthly and perhaps repented folly.

And when we got into this old house it appeared as strange a place for a modern wedding, as for old-fashioned royal love. The hall was dark as well as ancient; and the doubting, half-frightened look of the man who opened the door might lead us to the idea of some mystery but to none akin to any ideas I could form of either of such circumstances. He led us about as if he did not in the least know where to take us, or what to do with us. At last, we got into a small and quite unfurnished den; and he held a long thin candle for our service, but seemed afraid to act as Swedish servants always do, in pulling off and on boots and shoes, and stockings and cloaks, &c. Off this naked den was a gloomy closet, from whence a faint light issued. I penetrated its recess, in hopes of meeting the shade of Queen Christina, but I only startled that of a miserable-looking old man, who, without a chair, was leaning over the top of a high chest, using it as a table to read his psalm-book. But for that book I might have been frightened, and fancied I had been led wrong, and was to be made the heroine of my own romance, and to meet with all sorts of adventures. But the Swedish psalm-book has nothing to do with romance; and as few people read a good book when meditating a bad action, I dismissed all fear of robbers. At last, a young woman of my acquaintance ran into the room, exclaiming and scolding at my having been taken there. Then the facts of the case came out. The house and its premises were now a manufactory; the men I had seen were workmen, who had nothing at all to say to the wedding, poor fellows; and hearing me speak English to my companion, they never imagined that he could speak Swedish, or I either, and so let us do just as we liked. Another point which I began to understand was, that the house was lent only for the celebration of this wedding. As the bridegroom had to come a distance of fifty English miles on one side, and the bride about thirty on the other, they had agreed to begin a good rule in married life at the starting-post, and to meet half-way even at the altar; the man, whose greatness, we think, consists in yielding, giving up nearly half the distance in honor of the weaker vessel.

Leaving the young woman of the house to complete the toilet we had suspended, I made my way alone to a large low-ceiled apartment, called, in barbarized Swedish-French, salong, where an abundant supply of wooden logs was burning in an immense old stove, covered with what we call Dutch tiles. In the centre of this large, bare, unfurnished room, and just under the glass chandelier, which hung from the low, beam-supported ceiling, was placed a curious-looking object, like a small ottoman, covered with a great pall of cotton velvet, edged with gold lace, which had that sort of suspicious look that goods hired out on stated occasions generally acquire. Two small hassocks for kneeling on stood before it. At the upper end of the apartment, a handsome youth of one-and-twenty was standing beside a robed and solemn-looking priest, who, with snuff-box in hand, was applying to it, and speaking to him alternately. What affinity have a marriage and an execution? I do not know; but certainly I entered that room expecting to see the one, and I immediately thought of the other—the block, the culprit, the priest, I saw—the executioner alone was wanting; but perhaps the priest was to be his proxy. However it was, the effect on me was anything but suitable to either occasion, for I burst into a laugh. That the singular-looking block in the centre of the floor was designed to represent the altar, never entered my thoughts until, very soon after my entrance, I heard the clergyman observe, that the low-hung chandelier might set the bride's crown on fire. "The crown! the crown!" was uttered by some voices at the door; and a few persons who were entering came forward, and, with the help of the young bridegroom, who had been standing beside the priest, removed the altar a little to one side.

This ceremony, I had been told, would take place at six o'clock, and at six I had come; but an hour or two in Swedish time makes not quite so much difference as a minute or two does in English. I spent such extra hour or two in as stupid and comfortless a manner as possible. The few persons who were in the room seemed to be awe-struck; the bridegroom behaved very properly, and showed less impatience than the priest, whose looks would have threatened a premature matrimonial reprimand if he had been the chosen spouse of the dilatory bride; the restless eyes and nervous movements of the snuff-box were indicative of impatience. At length, a crowd of guests came trooping in; the women all in large white shawls, and nearly all in black silk dresses. Then, soon after, there was a low murmur, and the priest started up, took a large pinch of snuff, used a colored handkerchief, and, returning it to his pocket, drew out a very large clean white one, and rolled one corner round his forefinger, allowing the rest to hang down to his feet. The officiating clergy of Sweden always carry a white handkerchief thus; but as it is not, I suppose, a prescribed part of the Lutheran clerical habit, its purpose is quite puzzling to me. A slight movement on the part of the bridegroom turned my eyes to the door; it opened; a large party entered; the leader was a young, slight, rather delicate-looking girl, dressed in black, with a long sash of white ribbon round her waist, and a crown of the natural narrow-leaved myrtle on her head. Next to her came three young girls in white and colored dresses; and then the relatives of the bride. The young man came forward, took the hand of the girl in black with the myrtle-crown, and silently led her up to the ottoman. The priest was already behind it, with open book and pendent handkerchief: a few minutes, and all was over. The most solemn silence prevailed. The matrons appeared to me universally to look upon their young sister with compassion, and the unaffiliated girls to behold her with something like envy: the former at least began to weep, but Swedish tears flow readily. As soon as the ceremony was over, the bride had to bestow about 150 kisses, which was the number of persons present. And then — just when, as children say, she might seem to have given all her kisses away, she suddenly turned round, and with a look of recollection, murmured: "Ack! my Alfred!" and threw herself into the bridegroom's arms. The embrace was momentary; and as I had just been presented to her, she looked at me, saying, by way, I suppose, of apology: "I have not seen him for three months — never since we were betrothed."

The company adjourned to the inner room, where a general feeling of solemnity seemed to prevail. At last, the usual libation of bad white German wine appeared, to drink the health of the young couple, and at the same time entered the clergyman, whose office was not yet over: he carried a glass of wine in one hand, and the insignia of office, the white handkerchief, hanging from his finger. He made a long speech, extolling the state of matrimony in general, and its peculiar blessedness in this particular instance, ending with advice and religious exhortation, which drew forth a renewal of tears from the married ladies. When this was ended, I began to think a Swedish wedding was about as dull a thing as an English one, and, a little discontented, I strolled back again to the salong. A lady was at the piano, and I asked her if there would be any dancing; saying I had understood it was to be such a wedding as I wanted to see — a real old-fashioned Swedish one.

"Ah!" she replied, "there is no one disposed for dancing; they think too seriously for that. Yes, it is a serious thing to be married; and the priest's talk was so good! No, they will not dance to-night." All the time her fingers were moving the keys. The bride and her husband appeared at the open folding-door; his arm was round her waist — her hand rested on his shoulder. Under the circumstances, such an attitude did not strike me as remarkable; but they flew from their post in a waltz; and in a moment almost every one but myself was whirling round the room. To understand the real labor of dancing, one should dance as the Swedes do. The English, beside them, would seem to dance in their sleep. As for the polka and gallopade, the men almost lifted their partners from the ground; and I should have thought it impossible that such slight, weak-looking creatures could sustain movements so violent, especially in airless rooms, and throughout a long winter, when dancing is almost all the amusement and life of all classes. One poor young man was a singular evidence of the excitement of the dancing mania. He came from the borders of Dalecarlia; his long light hair was worn as the men there wear it, hanging straight down the sides of his face, not two features of which seemed to have the least connection with each other; his legs were as little akin, one being some inches shorter than the other. The bridegroom good-naturedly tried to get him to dance, but for some time ineffectually. Finally, he yielded; and when once set in motion, there seemed no probability that he would ever stop of himself: the long hair flew wildly up and down, the heterogeneous features breathed the strongest excitement, the short leg pounced on the floor; one would have thought he had got Terpsichore herself for his partner.

At eleven o'clock my sledge had been ordered; and at eleven I was about to retire, when the bridegroom's men who had the charge of the entertainment, beset me with entreaties to remain to supper. Every one said they "hoped the sweet Fruntimmer would not go away;" and when the bride told me that after supper her crown was to be danced off, and she hoped I would do her the honor to stay and look at her, I felt glad to consent to do what I wished. My open sledge was dismissed, and a covered one placed at my disposal. This real desire to please and gratify a stranger was shown throughout the evening. To the whole party I was quite unknown; and I now believe that much of what was performed on that evening was performed for my gratification, such weddings being now seldom seen. As soon as an enormous supper was hastily despatched, the salong was again cleared; a grave judge sat down to the piano, and struck up the wildest, most random-sounding music; all the unmarried people caught hands; all the married ones hastened to the furthest of the three rooms, which in Swedish are almost always en suite. Before I knew what was to be done, I found myself drawn along in a line, singing and moving to this wild music, through the open doors; while another band formed at the further extremity, passed us, singing also, and capering in the same fashion. The bride and bridegroom were still in the band of the blessed single, and to keep them so there was to be a struggle. For my part, I would have let them go, if I had not wished to see the dancing fight. The poor little bride was now placed in the middle of the room, just under the chandelier; it was well she was so little; a handkerchief was tied over her eyes, and we women danced in a circle round her, while she in turns caught one and another in her arms, and swung her round and round in desperate energy; then the crown — loosened, shaking and tottering on her head — was to fall off on that of the girl who was to be next married. This movement was supposed to be accidental, the bride being blindfolded; but I happened to ask her sister beforehand if she hoped to get the crown, to which the girl rather sulkily answered: "No, it must go to the other bridemaid, who is betrothed." And so, on the head of the betrothed the myrtle-crown came down; and the choice it made was applauded by the men, who stood in an outer circle looking on, and clapped their hands when the Fastuo (betrothed) looked innocently confused at such an apropos accident. When her crown was off, I thought the play was over, but now came the struggle. The matrons made a dancing attack on the ranks of the single sisters, who enclosed the bride. The former were to take, the latter to retain her, if possible. For my part, knowing we formed a forlorn-hope, and believing that the object of our defence was a traitor in the camp, I should, perhaps, had I thought about it, have done just what I did; but I did not think, for in the confusion I mistook one party for the other, and, getting my arms round the passive bride, fairly drew her into the circle of matrons; and I dare say the captured one thanked me for putting an end to the contest.

Then the same thing was acted with the bridegroom, who had stood calmly looking on at his young wife's troubles, only his treatment was rougher and sooner over. The married men having got him, the single brethren seized him in their arms, and gave him a farewell fling towards the ceiling, which the interposition of the chandelier prevented his reaching. The horror of our poor hostess on this occasion formed the most laughable part of the scene; unable either to make herself heard or seen by the actors in it, and equally unable, I suppose, to resist the influence of the wild rattling music, she capered round the group, who were tossing the recreant, to the imminent peril of her chandelier, her arms and hands stretched out towards it, as if she fain would shelter it within them; her mouth wide open, and her eyes as full of terror as if she saw the royal ghost rattling the glass pendants, that shook and jingled at every heave of the bridegroom. At last, having fairly turned the soles of his feet to the ceiling, they turned them downward again, and set him on them, looking just as equable and pleasant as ever.

It was now three o'clock in the morning: the covered sledge was waiting, the great man of the party — there is a great man at all parties — was to leave me at home. I endeavored to express my thanks, but was met with expressions of great thankfulness for the honor I had conferred; and so I came away. I do not think that anything could give me a more favorable idea of the manners of the Swedish people than the conduct I saw on this occasion.

The company, with the exception of the one great man in a civil uniform, were all of the lower rank of the trading classes. The handsome young bridegroom was, I think, foreman to a distiller; but, so far as a foreigner could judge, their manners were as unexceptionable as any I have met in the highest circles of their country; no word, look, or movement could offend the most delicate taste. Together with the absence of all awkward restraint, there was an evidently unassumed and all-pervading observance of the strictest decorum and politeness; and with the exception of that abominable practice of spitting — in which the priest was most proficient — in the corners of the room, there was not the least appearance of coarseness or vulgarity to be observed. Their politeness and good-will to myself I shall not readily forget.

At three o'clock precisely on that December morning, we walked down the snow-covered hill to meet the sledge which waited at its foot. The poor horses would have been the better for a share in the wild dance. The driver was a powerful man, so swathed in gray fur that not a bit even of his nose was visible; an English sportsman might have shot him in mistake for a bear. But the moon was now up, and such a moon as the Swedish one is! hanging between heaven and earth, distinct in the clear atmosphere, so large, so bright, and shedding that pale white light by which I have read a psalm in my prayer-book without spectacles.

The great man of the party insisted on leaving me at home, although he passed his own house, and I had my friend still with me; and as he unhappily heard me express a dislike to cigars, he insisted on sitting beside the driver, leaving the whole of the inside of his sledge to us. These things are of not the least consequence in themselves, but they are of consequence in indicating the manners of a people.

The lantern always accompanies carriages, whether the moon shines or not, and walkers too; but the streets of Stockholm are not lighted when the almanac says the moon ought to shine. There is no gas, and oil is better spared than spent. The windows of the queen-dowager's apartments were still lighted as we passed the palace; shutters are not used in Stockholm, nor blinds commonly. They say her majesty sits up all night, but does not lie in bed all day, so that her old maids of honor have rather a waking life; they tell you she breakfasts at six in the evening, and dines at eleven at night.

I had brought a wax-taper in my pocket, and the key of the court-door. I lighted my taper at the judge's lantern, locked the court-door when he had ended his farewell bows; and having dismissed both him and the Swedish friend who had taken me to see the wedding, I mounted the hideous, dark stone stairs, and applied the key to the house-door where I lived; but, alas! it had been St. Stephen's Day, and some of the other dwellers there having come home long before me, had bolted the door inside! The idea of finishing the night of St. Stephen's Day sitting on the cold, dark, terrible-looking stone stairs, set me, I suppose, into a state of desperation; and the violent bodily exercise to which I had been subjected stimulated my powers, so that I applied to the door in a manner that caused no little terror to my ancient hostess. Not even my voice would persuade her it was I, until she examined my rooms and found them empty. "Why, madame," said she, when she let me in, "how could I think you were not sleeping, when I know that in England no one goes out on St. Stephen's Day?" and as she thinks she knows more of my country fashions than I do myself, I only replied: "Well, for once I did go out on St. Stephen's Day to see an old-fashioned Swedish wedding."

THE modelling of the statue which the friends and admirers of the late Mr. George Stephenson have subscribed to his memory, being now complete—we, and others, were some days ago invited to a private view of the work. The figure—of which Mr. Bailly is the sculptor—is to be cast to a height of ten feet; and the character of the performance has been determined—as that of every really fine work of sculpture will be—by the conditions both of the subject and of the site. In the first place, the statue has the advantage of being intended for an interior—suitable to its magnitude; and this allows it to be executed in marble—a material wholly unfitted for permanent exposure to the open air of England. Then, it has the far rarer advantage of assimilating exactly with the shrine which it is to illustrate. It gives and takes character to and from its site. Intended to be placed in the Great Hall of the "North-Western" Terminus, at Euston Grove, it will be, as it were, the very genius loci. A very peculiar grove is Euston Grove—and he who shall look there for the Dryads, will be in search of the wrong deities. The pipe of the modern Pan is the steam whistle, and the shades of this retreat resound ever with the snorting of the great steeds of Commerce. The Hippocrene of Euston Grove bubbles with perpetual steam—and there, Pegasus is an iron horse. He has the hoof of fire, but his wings are driving-wheels. In the creation and interpretation of this new mythology, the late Mr. Stephenson had a most conspicuous part. Here will his figure fitly stand, on the threshold of that vast iron network which has brought far places close together, altered the relations of time and space, changed the conditions moral and physical of the world—and which his genius and his labor helped to create. Here the great engineer will, as it were, through the generations to come, overlook his own work. We presume that, whatever differences of opinion there may be on the question of costume as applied to portrait sculpture in general, there is no difficulty about their solution in a case like this. To have dressed the modern Genius of Practical Science in a toga would be a solecism no greater than to have put classical robes on Mr. Stephenson who here represents it. The men who have made railways all wore coats and waistcoats, and a marble coat and waistcoat has Mr. Bailly given to Mr. George Stephenson. For many an age to come the thousands and hundreds of thousands who shall pour through this hall, as the vestibule to the North, will see here the man "in his armor as he lived;"—not clad in the garments of a past the very fragments of whose system he helped to break up, but in that ordinary costume of the time from beneath which his spirit breathed along the great lines on which they are about to travel. The Muse of one age is not the Muse of another. This age has a poetry most emphatically its own—to which all its accidents conform—and the true artist is he who recognizes and embodies it. For the real poet, by whatever vehicle he speaks, there are no conventions. If one man represents more than most others the peculiar poetry of our time as opposed to the classical—work-land against dream-land—it is the late George Stephenson, and to have hung around him any of the shreds of the classic system would have been so far essentially to uncharacterize him. Mr. Bailly has dealt with the poetry he found, adding no other, save so much of his own art as—allowably—just refines—slightly idealizes, without changing. They who knew the late Mr. Stephenson well, pronounce this work to be admirable as a portrait. The unpromising materials have grown plastic in the sculptor's hands, and are made to yield their own significance to the presentment. Mr. Bailly has thought that a peculiarly English genius of the nineteenth century might be expressed in the characters of the country and the time.

Demetrius the Impostor. An Episode in Russian History. By PROSPER MÉRIMÉE. Translated by Andrew R. Scoble. Bentley.

THE history of the Russian adventurer Demetrius, by M. Mérimée, has a double interest; it is one of the most stirring episodes in the annals of Russia — and it is one of the most remarkable examples on record of a species of historical illusion of which almost all parts of the world have furnished characteristic instances — but which has not yet received a sufficiently profound investigation at the hands of philosophic historians. Many places of the world have produced impostors, who, personating dead men, and laying claim to their honors, have for a time had a career of success. The Perkin Warbeck of English History is no solitary example of imposture aiming at a crown. But perhaps in no case has imposture been associated with so many circumstances disposing us partially to respect it, and even to question whether, after all, it was imposture in the strictest sense of the term, as in the case of the pseudo-Tsar, Demetrius.

Ivan the Terrible had died in 1584, leaving his elder son Feodor to succeed him on the throne, and a younger son, Demetrius, the issue of a seventh marriage, and a mere infant, as presumptive heir. Feodor, who was weak and unable to rule personally, governed by his brother-in-law, Boris Goudonof, a man of great ability, but severe, tyrannical, and unpopular. By the orders of Boris, the Tsarevitch Demetrius (the Tsar's son) was educated at Ooglitich, under the care of his mother, the Tsarina-Dowager and his uncles. He had grown up to be a mad, ferocious imp, of ten years of age, when, one day in May, 1591, he was found in the court-yard of the palace, with his throat cut. Whether he had been murdered, or whether he had accidentally fallen in an epileptic fit on a knife with which he was playing at the time, could not be ascertained. The people about the palace, however, and the populace of Ooglitich believed that he had been murdered; and a dreadful riot ensued, during which various persons were killed on suspicion. The Regent Boris, having instituted an inquiry into the case, exculpated the supposed murderer, inflicted the severest punishment on the rioters, and caused it to be declared that the Tsarevitch had died by an accident. The belief, however, that he had been murdered still remained; and it was whispered about that the murderer was no other than the Regent Bois himself, who had removed the young Tsarevitch to prepare for his own accession to the throne.

On the death of Feodor, which occurred in 1598, and which was also attributed, though without just cause, to secret violence, Boris did ascend the throne. For five years he reigned as Tsar; governing with great energy, but with such haughtiness and cruelty as to become universally hated. The Russians were exasperated, and were in a state of mind to hail any one who should promise to deliver them from the tyranny of Boris. Such a man appeared.

Suddenly a surprising rumor was brought from the frontiers of Lithuania, and spread with incredible rapidity through all the provinces of the empire. The Tsarevitch Demetrius, who was believed to have been assassinated at Ooglitich, was still living in Poland. Having been favorably received by a palatine, he had made himself known to the principal nobles of the republic, and was preparing to reclaim his hereditary throne. It was related that he had wandered for some time in Russia, concealed beneath the frock of a monk. The archimandrite of the convent of the Saviour at Novgorod-Severski had given him a lodging without recognizing him. The prince had proceeded from thence to Kief, leaving in his cell a note, in which he declared that he was Demetrius, the son of Ivan the Terrible, and that he would one day recompense the hospitality of the archimandrite. On the other hand, it was stated that persons worthy of belief had seen the Tsarevitch among the Zaporogue Cossacks, taking part in their military expeditions, and distinguishing himself by his courage and address in all warlike experiences. The name of the ataman under whose orders he had enrolled himself was also given. Other authorities declared that they had seen the same personage, at the same time, studying Latin at Huszara, a small town in Volhynia. Though reports were contradictory as to details, they all agreed on this one point — that Demetrius was still living, and that he intended to call the usurper to account for all his crimes. About the middle of the year 1603, at Brahin, in Lithuania, a young man, who had been for some time attached to the service of Prince Adam Wiszniowieki, in the capacity of equerry or valet de chambre, declared to him that he was the Tsarevitch Demetrius. He related that a physician named Simon, a Wallachian or German by birth, having become acquainted with the sinister designs of Boris, or rather having received large offers from him to destroy the life of the presumptive heir, had feigned consent, in order that he might better frustrate the plans of the tyrant. On the night fixed for the assassination, this faithful servant had placed in the bed of the Tsarevitch the child of a surf, of about the same age, who had been put to death. Feeling convinced that Feodor was so completely under the influence of Boris that it would be impossible to obtain justice from him, the physician had fled from Ooglitich with young Demetrius; and had afterwards confided him to the care of a gentleman devotedly attached to his family, who, in order to guard him more effectually from the hatred of Boris, had made him enter a convent. The physician was dead, as well as the gentleman to whom he had confided the prince. In the absence of these two witnesses, the unknown produced a Russian seal, bearing the name and arms of the Tsarevitch, and a golden cross adorned with precious stones of considerable value. This, he said, was the present which, according to Russian usage, he had received from his godfather, Prince Ivan Mstislavski, on the day of his baptism. The young man, who declared that he was the son of Ivan, appeared to be about twenty or twenty-two years of age. If Demetrius had lived he would have been twenty-two years old in 1603. He was small of stature, but broad-shouldered, and possessed of remarkable vigor and agility. His hair was sandy, indeed almost red, in color; his eyes were of a pale blue, and yet his complexion was very swarthy, as is frequently the case with the inhabitants of cold countries. It was well known that Maria Fédorovna, the mother of Demetrius, was quite a brunette, and that Ivan the Terrible was rather below the middle height. Those who remembered the Tsar Ivan perceived a family likeness in the face of the unknown; and yet, the Tsar was a handsome man, whilst the features of his pretended son were not at all prepossessing. Several of his contemporaries, who had frequent opportunities of seeing him, represented him to have had a large face, prominent cheek-bones, a flat nose, thick lips, and little or no beard; and this description corresponds almost exactly with his portrait in the Academy of St. Petersburg, and with an engraving published in Poland in 1606. We notice in it, as it were, an exaggeration of the Slavic type, associated with an expression of remarkable firmness and energy. The unknown further exhibited two warts which he had, one on his forehead and the other under his right eye. One of his arms, also, was rather longer than the other. All these signs, apparently, were well known to have been remarked in the child who had died at Ooglitich.

It was in Poland, then a more powerful country than Russia, and not well disposed towards Boris, that the young Pretender gained his first adherents and matured his scheme of invasion. His most active friend was George Mniszek, Palatine of Sendomir — with whose beautiful daughter the adventurer fell in love. The exertions of this friend won over the Papal Nuncio at the Polish court, and also Sigismund, King of Poland. Many of the adherents of Demetrius really believed in his claims as Tsarevitch; others sided with him on grounds of policy — Sigismund, for example, out of hostility to Russia, and the Papal legate out of a hope, suggested by the adventurer, that his accession to the Russian throne would be favorable to the interests of the Latin Church in that country. By one means or another, Demetrius got together a considerable force of Poles, Cossacks and Germans — and invaded Russia, where there was already an enthusiastic disposition to receive him as the lawful Tsar. Of the progress of the impostor's arms, till by the defeat of the forces of Boris, and the death of Boris himself, he was able to enter Moscow in triumph, M. Mérimée gives a succinct but clear account. Entering Moscow on the 20th of June, 1605, Demetrius immediately assumed the reins of government, and sent for his betrothed Marina, the daughter of Mniszek, to share his throne. The marriage was celebrated with feasts and ceremonies of barbaric pomp; and the only drawback to the universal rejoicing was, the discontent of some of the Russian boyards with the introduction of so many foreigners into Moscow, and with the favor shown to them and their religion by the new Tsar. The conduct of the young impostor in his capacity as ruler is thus described by M. Mérimée, who evidently regards him as a man of no ordinary character:—

His conduct and all his habits contrasted singularly with those of his predecessors. He was resolved to reign by himself, to know everything, to see everything with his own eyes. Basmanof, though always treated by him with the greatest distinction, and even with friendship, quickly perceived that it would not be easy to govern this young man of twenty-three years old, whose Mentor he had undoubtedly hoped to become. Demetrius would have neither favorite nor master. He was determined that all should bend to his will, and yet, despot though he was, he was fond of discussion, and allowed his boyards the most complete liberty to contradict him. He daily presided over his council; and his prodigious memory, his quickness of perception, and his penetration, confounded his ministers. They inquired where he could have gained such a thorough acquaintance with the state of his empire, its wants and its resources. Though tolerating and even inviting contradiction, he too frequently abused his superiority to rail pitilessly at adversaries whom he had convinced of mistake, or whom respect had reduced to silence. His pleasantries left wounds as deep as the insults of a capricious and unreasoning tyrant could have produced. Moreover, he too openly displayed a partial preference for foreign customs, which shocked the prejudices of the Muscovites. He was incessantly quoting the example of Poland, that ancient enemy of Russia, and extolling on every occasion the superiority of her laws and of her civilization. "Travel, and gain instruction," he would say to his boyards, "you are savages; you need the polish of education." These jests upon the ignorance of his subjects were never forgiven; for that ignorance, in the eyes of many persons, bore a sacred character, akin to that of the ancient religion and time-honored customs of the country. When he entered Moscow, it was still a prey to the ravages of famine, and misery prevailed throughout the city. He succeeded in promptly remedying this sad state of things by wise regulations which, by encouraging commerce and the importation of food, soon produced abundance in the place of dearth. He also applied himself, from the very outset of his reign, to reforming the administration of justice, by setting bounds to the rapacity of the judges, and prohibiting the slowness of their proceedings. Following the example of many Tsars whose memory was cherished in the traditions of the people, he appeared every Sunday and Wednesday on the threshold of his palace, and there received all petitions with his own hand. He interrogated his petitioners with kindness, listened patiently to their statements, and frequently terminated with a single word an affair which had lasted for long years. If he found it necessary to reject a request, he did it with so much consideration, that his obliging words gave almost as much satisfaction as if he had granted a favor. His indefatigable activity of mind and body astonished all his court, but the Muscovites, accustomed to the solemn etiquette of their Tsars, thought that he was sometimes wanting in dignity. For example, instead of going to church in a carriage, according to custom, he repaired thither on horseback, and frequently on a restive steed, which he took delight in managing. . . . In former times, Tsars never passed from one room into another, without being supported under the arms by several of their courtiers. They were guided and led about like children in leading-strings. All these tiresome ceremonies were now set aside. The new Tsar went out of his palace without informing any one, almost always without a guard, executing on the spur of the moment any thought that occurred to his mind. He walked on foot through the town, sometimes inspecting the works of a cannon-foundry which he had just established at Moscow, sometimes entering into the shops, chatting with the merchants, especially with foreigners, and displaying great curiosity to examine everything and become acquainted with the instruments and products of their industry. His chamberlains and body-guards frequently had to look for him in street after street, and found it extremely difficult to find him again. Whenever he heard of any new branch of industry, he immediately became desirous to introduce it into Russia, and made the most advantageous offers to skilful artisans and enlightened merchants, in order to induce them to settle in his dominions. He was fond of the arts, and particularly of music. It is said that he was the first tsar who took vocal and instrumental performers into his service. During his meals, symphonies were executed — a Polish fashion, then newly introduced, and regarded almost as scandalous by the Russians. Many persons would have preferred that he should have got drunk with his buffoons, like Ivan the Terrible, rather than that he should listen to German or Polish musicians. . . . His skill in all warlike exercises, and his dashing intrepidity, gained him the admiration of his soldiers, and especially of the Cossacks; but the mass of the nation found it difficult to reconcile this restlessness and taste for useless dangers with the idea which they had formed to themselves of a Tsar of all the Russias. Scrupulous persons, in particular, found much to complain of in his conduct, in all that regarded religious practices. He was inattentive at divine service, he frequently forgot to salute the holy images before taking his meals, and he sometimes rose abruptly from table without washing his hands. This was then considered the height of impiety. Another crime imputed to him was, that he did not go regularly to the bath on Saturdays. On the day of his coronation, one of the Polish Jesuits who had accompanied him paid him a compliment in Latin, which no one understood, and the Tsar, perhaps, as little as any one; but the devotees had no doubt that the speech contained horrid blasphemies against the national religion, for all knew that Latin was the language of the Papists. Sometimes, when speaking to Russian ecclesiastics, he used the expressions, "Your religion, your worship." It was inferred from this that he had his own particular religion, which could be nothing else than the Latin heresy. At one of the sittings of the imperial council, it was represented to him that a proposition which he had just brought forward was condemned by the seventh oecumenical council, the last whose authority is recognized by the Greek Church. "Well," he replied, "what of that? the eighth council may, very likely, come to a contrary decision on the matter."

Besides devoting his attention to internal reforms, Demetrius cherished schemes for aggrandizing Russia among the nations, and for placing her at the head of a great Pan-slavic empire. For this purpose, he broke with Sigismund, King of Poland, and made preparations for a war against him. But in the midst of his projects, and when, as yet, he had reigned but a few months, he was surprised by a conspiracy, the leaders of which were some of the Russian boyards whom he had most favored. His imprudence and confidence prevented him from taking means to protect himself; and on the night of the 28th of May, 1606, his palace was attacked, himself slain, and a vast number of Poles were massacred in the streets of Moscow. M. Mérimée thus describes the death of the impostor :—

As for Demetrius, seeing the first door of the palace broken through, and feeling convinced that all resistance was useless, he threw down his sword, ran through the apartments of the Tsarini, and made his way to the chamber most remote from the place which the rebels were assailing. He had, it is said, received a sabre wound in his leg. However, he opened a window which looked into the open space where the palace of Boris, which he had ordered to be demolished, had formerly stood; the window was more than thirty feet above the ground, but there was no one in the neighborhood, and he jumped down. In his fall he had the misfortune to break his leg, and the pain was so intense that he fainted. A moment after he recovered his consciousness, and his groans attracted the attention of a few Strelitz from a neighboring guard-house, who recognized him. Moved with compassion, these soldiers lifted him up, gave him some water to drink, and seated him on a stone which remained of the foundations of the palace of Boris. The Tsar now regained sufficient strength to speak to the soldiers, who swore to defend him. In fact, when the rebels came to demand their prey, they replied by discharging their arquebuses, and killed several of the foremost rioters. But soon the crowd increased, attracted by the tumult, and by shouts that the Tsar had at length been discovered. The Strelitz were surrounded and threatened; they were called upon to give up the impostor, or the mob would go to their suburb and massacre their wives and children, who had been left there defenceless. Then the frightened Strelitz laid down their arms, and abandoned the wounded man. With horrible acclamations of triumph, the multitude fell upon him, and dragged him, with blows and imprecations, to a room in the palace, which had been already pillaged. As Demetrius, in the power of his executioners, passed before his prisoner body-guards, he extended his hand towards them in token of farewell, but did not utter a word. One of his gentlemen, a Livonian, named Furstenberg, transported with rage, attempted though unarmed, to defend him. The rebels transixed the brave fellow with a thousand blows, whilst he was vainly endeavoring to preserve his master. If Demetrius was not instantaneously massacred, it was only because the ingenious hatred of his assassins wished to prolong his sufferings. He was stripped of his imperial robes, and the caftan of a pastrycook was thrown over him. "Look at the Tsar of all the Russias!" shouted the rebels. "He has now put on the dress which befits him." "Dog of a bastard," said a Russian gentleman, "tell us who you are, and whence you came!" Demetrius collected all his remaining strength, and, raising his voice, said: "Every one of you knows that I am your Tsar, the legitimate son of Ivan Vassilievitch. Ask my mother if it is not so; or, if you desire my death, at least give me time to confess myself." Thereupon, a trader named Valouief, breaking through the press, cried out, "Why talk so long with this dog of a heretic? This is how I'll shrive this Polish piper!" And he fired a shot from his arquebus into the breast of the Tsar, which put an end to his agony.

The death of Demetrius did not end the curious episode in Russian history of which he was the chief figure. The conspirators raised their leader, Basil Schuisky, to the throne; but the country continued in a state of commotion and revolt — partly on account of the regrets of many of the people who admired the slain usurper — partly on account of the fresh attempts of new adventurers, who pretended that Demetrius had not been slain, but escaped. With one of these, who assumed to be Demetrius himself, Marina, the wife of the slain Tsar, associated herself — though with a very bad grace. At length, order was restored by the deposition of Basil, the assassination of the second Demetrius, and the elevation to the throne, by a patriotic faction, of a native nobleman, Michael Romanov, the founder of the present Russian dynasty (March, 1613). These events, constituting a kind of appendage to the proper biography of the first Demetrius, are also narrated in considerable detail by M. Mérimée.

So far as M. Mérimée is concerned, the real origin of Demetrius, his real name, and his real antecedents, still remain involved in mystery. We are somewhat disappointed at this — though probably it was inevitable in the state of the evidence; and we are also a little disappointed that M. Mérimée has not attempted a more profound appreciation of the character and aims of the impostor, and of the function of imposture in general as illustrated by his case. The book is, nevertheless, a beautiful piece of historical writing, and a valuable contribution to our knowledge of Russian history. It appears to be well translated.

TO AN ABSENT WIFE.

BY G. D. PRENTICK.

'Tis Morn — the sea-breeze seems to bring
Joy, health, and freshness on its wing;
Bright flowers, to me all strange and new,
Are glittering in the early dew,
And perfumes rise from every grove,
As incense to the clouds that move
Like spirits o'er yon welkin clear;
But I am sad — thou art not here!

'Tis Noon — a calm, unbroken sleep
Is on the blue wave of the deep;
A soft haze, like a fairy dream,
Is floating over wood and stream,
And many a broad magnolia flower,
Within its shadowy woodland bower,
Is gleaming like a lonely star,
But I am sad — thou art afar!

'Tis Eve — on earth the sunset skies
Are printing their own Eden dyes;
The stars come down and trembling glow,
Like blossoms on the wave below,
And like an unseen spirit, the breeze
Seems lingering 'mid the orange trees,
Breathing its music round the spot;
But I am sad — I see thee not!

'Tis Midnight — with a soothing spell
The far-off tones of ocean swell —
Soft as the mother's cadence mild,
Low bending o'er her sleeping child,
And on each wandering breeze are heard
The rich notes of the mocking-bird,
In many a wild and wondrous lay;
But I am sad — thou art away!

I sink in dreams — Low, sweet and clear,
Thy own dear voice is in mine ear;
Around my cheek thy tresses twine,
Thy own loved hand is clasped in mine,
Thy own soft lip to mine is pressed,
Thy head is pillowed on my breast;
Oh, I have all my heart holds dear
And I am happy — thou art here!

From Household Words.

SEVENTY-EIGHT YEARS AGO.

As late as eight-and-twenty years since, across the open road at the great western entrance into London, between the triple archway and screen of the Park and the triumphal gateway of Constitution Hill, there stretched a turnpike with double lodges. To that turnpike, half a century earlier, I wish the reader to accompany me. An unusual number of people are collected (it is Thursday, the 3rd of August, 1775) to see the king and queen returning from the drawing-room. It is not much of a show. Not even a gilt coach figures in it, or a prancing horse, or a company of lancers or dragoons. Only a stir is perceived at the further end of the crowd, two lines are formed, and through them come two sedan chairs, each surmounted by a crown and borne by two men in the royal liveries — majesty in the one exhibiting itself in very light cloth with silver buttons; and in the other wearing lemon-colored flowered silk on a light cream-colored ground. And so, between the two lines, observing, smiling, and bowing as they pass, George the Third and Queen Charlotte move away; and the sight is over.

But even then, for one person in the crowd, the scene appears not to lose all its interest. He is a small, thin, precise-looking man, in a dress of grave, square cut, with a large bush wig, very sharp features, long nose and chin, a keen, restless eye, a step as active and firm as though it carried sixteen instead of sixty winters, and a complexion certainly not tanned by an English sun. But he speaks English; and, asking of one who stands near what that noble red-brick house is that bears the look of having sprung up quite recently at the gate of Hyde Park, is told that it has just been built by the Lord Chancellor Apsley, on ground taken out of the park, and given him for the purpose by the king.

The stranger had probably more interest in the answer than he expected when he put the question. Within that house, he could hardly fail then to remember, there lived with Chancellor Apsley his father, Lord Bathurst, the celebrated friend of Pope and Swift; from whose life, wanting now but nine years to complete its cycle of a century, Burke had drawn the happy illustration which he had thrown out six months ago in the House of Commons, in a speech already admired of all men, but to the man now standing by Apsley gate more than commonly impressive. Having to move certain resolutions for a basis of conciliation with our American colonies in the dispute at this time raging, the great orator had pointed to Lord Bathurst's venerable age, for proof that within the short period of the life of man our commercial and colonial prosperity had risen, and for warning that the same brief space might suffice for its not less rapid fall. Here was one, said Burke, who had lived in days when America served for little more than to amuse Dutch William's subjects with stories of savage men and uncouth manners; who had survived to days when as much as England had won through the civilizing conquests and settlements of seventeen hundred years, had been added to her by that very America in the course of half a century; and who yet might be spared to see these fruits of man's energy blasted by man's folly, and all this glorious prosperity withered and passed away. As merely a burst of eloquence, this was a thing to be remembered; but to the stranger of whom I speak it possessed a nearer interest. For if the resolutions with which it closed had not been contemptuously rejected, the revolution which had driven him here into exile might not in his days have begun. If concession to those American colonies of the right of taxing themselves, of the right of trial in places where offences were committed, and of the privilege of juries in admiralty courts, had found more than seventy-eight supporters in a house of three hundred and forty-eight members the peal of musketry which had broken over Lexington might not have been heard by that generation; and Mr. Samuel Curwen, prosperous merchant and judge of admiralty at Salem in New England, would not have found himself, a sudden fugitive from home, standing before Apsley House that August afternoon.

Two days after the Lexington affair he had taken flight from the port of Boston. His little native town of Salem was then in a flame. Some weeks earlier he had been pointed at and denounced for an ardent loyalist; but when the new militia bands had once crossed arms with the king's troops, this feeling broke all bounds. Everywhere men who had claimed the right to uphold opinions adverse to those of the majority of their fellow-citizens, were driven forth with ignominy. We are told to forgive our enemies, was the fierce cry which rose on all sides, but we are not told to forgive our friends. Mr. Curwen thought he might possibly escape unmolested in Philadelphia; but on arriving there, in his precipitate flight from Boston, he found the militia as eager to put shoulder to shoulder in peaceful Pennsylvania, as he had left them in puritan Massachusetts; drums were beating, colors flying; and he saw two companies of armed quakers, commanded by Friend Samuel Marshall, and Friend Thomas Miffin, parading the streets of the drab-coated city. So there was nothing left for this poor ex-colonial judge of admiralty, but to put himself on board a schooner bound for England, and try to find with us the liberty of opinion which America was then too bent on seizing for herself to have time to concede to her offspring. He was at sea nearly two months; and long before he landed at Dover, in July, the battle of Bunker's Hill had been fought, and all hopes of peaceful accommodation closed.

When Judge Curwen fled from the rebellious colonies he was sixty years old, when he went back to the triumphant young republic he was sixty-nine; and of the eventful years which formed the interval—all of them passed in England, and all with the usual penalties of exile, though some with more than its usual enjoyment—he left a curious record in a diary which his surviving representatives printed in New York a dozen years ago,* and in which those past days, with all their pains and pleasures, their hopes and their misgivings, still live for us with a vivid and singular reality. For the record was honest and genuine, as in the main the diarist himself was. He does not appear, indeed, to have been of the heroic stuff of martyrs. If the liberty of opinion he craved had been conceded to him, it would probably have involved nothing graver than the liberty to change his opinion; for he was clearly a man impressible by events, and would probably have saved himself a very long voyage, and very great inconvenience, if he could only have held his tongue till after the first few blows were struck in the war of his fellow-citizens for independence. Not that he was a time-server—far from that; his views within his line of sight were steady and unwavering; but in politics this line stretched but a little way, and took also a subsequent not dishonorable bias from his avowed liking for his native land. In other respects he was a man of fair learning, and more than average accomplishment; not at all intolerant of opinions at issue with his own; in religion a dissenter of the class still most prevalent in New England, in his tastes scholarly and refined, not ill-read in general literature, prone to social enjoyments, a reasonably good critic of what he saw—altogether an excellent example of the class of men out of whom the Fathers and Founders of that great republic sprang; and a companion not less pleasant than instructive to pass a few hours with, as I hope the reader will find.

If he also finds, as he moves in such company through some memorable scenes long past, that on all sides views are entertained of the probable results of this quarrel between Great Britain and her Colonies, which at the present day appear almost too monstrous for belief, he will not be less kindly disposed to the elderly New Englander who felt that he could only resolve by headlong flight the many awful doubts that were besetting him of what must follow a contest so unnatural. With its only practical issue, Separation, staring every one in the face at the period his diary begins—no one is bold enough to confront it. The idea is not more abhorrent to Lords North and George Germaine than it is to Chatham and to Burke. It will appear not less to the credit of Mr. Curwen's sagacity than of his humanity that he constantly urged conciliation, because he held steadily to the belief that America never would be conquered by arms; but not for an instant, till the very last, did he doubt that the downfall of both countries would follow fast on the heels of what was called "Independence." And all around him, whether favorable or not to the claims of the insurgent colonists, are not less firmly of that opinion. It was not till Mr. Curwen had been living more than two years in England, that (on the night of the 3rd September, 1777) he met one man at Bristol who held quite different views. This eccentric person will appear in our second chapter.

But whatever errors in political science might be prevalent—did the great mass of the people even on this side of the Atlantic, though much ill-blood had been violently stirred, desire other than a speedy and amicable close to this breaking out of quarrel? Mr. Curwen tells us, no. The experience of his first two months in London sufficed to prove to him that though the upper ranks, most of the capital stockholders, and the principal nobility, were for forcing at all hazards supremacy of Parliament over the insurgent colonies, yet from the middle ranks downward the people were decidedly opposed to it. He went into all kinds of coffee-houses (a better index of public opinion in those days than the club-houses since have been), and though he found the resistance of America the standing topic of dispute, and the dispute "something warm," yet it was always "without abuse or ill-nature." Indeed, in one of the very first letters he had to write out after his arrival, when he had not been five weeks in London, he mentions the surprise with which he had found "a tenderness in the minds of many here for America, even of those who disapprove of the principles of an entire independence of the British legislature, and ardently wish an effort may be made to accommodate." He went hardly anywhere into English middle class society that he did not, at the outset of this wretched quarrel, find a manly tolerance expressed for that of which he confesses he had himself in America been very far from equally tolerant. There was one house indeed, where, with the noblest echo of this better feeling, he might also have heard a noisier and more violent majority eager to welcome extremities from which the bulk of the nation recoiled; but he could not find his way into it. In the fourth month after his arrival, Burke was upholding with unabated and unrivalled eloquence another motion in that house "to compose the present troubles and quiet the minds of His Majesty's subjects in America," but Mr. Curwen in vain exerted himself to obtain admission. After another month, Lord North in a very different spirit was urging there, amid Hear him! of greater triumph and with a success of numbers more potent than Burke's reasoning or wit, his bill for absolutely prohibiting all future commercial intercourse with America; and still Mr. Curwen knocked at the gallery door in vain. He remonstrated at last; he spoke to Mr. George Hayley, M. P., whom he met in the Strand; and Mr. Hayley, an active and bustling city member in those days, now faded out of human memory, could only assure the respected ex-judge that really all strangers for the present time must be excluded, for the attendances were great, the floor of the House too small, and positively the members themselves could not get on without the gallery.

But if he must wait (it is only for a time) the unbarring of those inhospitable doors, many more genial ones have been meanwhile, and still are, opening to him. Let us go back a little, and retrace what amusements or occupations they were that relieved the first months of his exile. For this agitated time offered no exception to the law which prevails at every other, and which, in presence of the most trivial interests that can engage the individual attention, seems to dwarf the mightiest that affect the welfare of the world. It is of course not really so, as a very little reflection teaches us. We perceive it to be the result of one of the wisest of providential arrangements, that when we penetrate beneath the surface of the most wide-spread calamities that absorb the attention of history, we should find the ordinary currents of human life moving on with little suffering or disturbance; and we can afford to leave entirely to the use of jaded men of fashion such regrets as Horace Walpole was at this particular hour indulging, that so little grief should be felt by the public for the public misfortunes, and that theatres, operas, parties, dinings, merry-makings, fashionable preachings, and Sunday evening promenades, should still be in progress just as usual, though armies were surrendering, fleets showing the white feather, and an incapable ministry despoiling the Crown of what Horace protests is "its brightest jewel" — the Colonies of North America!

Judge Curwen has only been one day in London when he is to be discovered strolling about Westminster Hall, remarking it as something odd that the Master of the Rolls (then Sir Thomas Sewell) should be sitting in court with his hat on; finding the noise "much greater than would be allowed in our American courts;" thinking it unbecoming the dignity of a judge that, in place of peremptorily checking the noise and confusion, Mr. Justice Nares should actually submit to rise out of his seat, step forward, and lean down to hear; and giving other intimations of an old-world formality and love of grave precision which a modern visitor from the New World would hardly be expected to display. He saw, of course, on this and on other occasions the Chief Justice, and thought his manner very like "the late Judge Dudley of Massachusetts;" all but those peering eyes of his, which denoted a penetration and comprehension peculiarly his own. After that hard look at Mansfield, the man whose eloquence was ever loudest against his countrymen, and whose politics, admired in his tory days in America, now appear to him far less palatable in these days of exile — (an "excellent judge and mischievous politician" is the character he gives of him) — he is most anxious to get sight of Wedderburn, who only last year had flung in Benjamin Franklin's face the grossest insult that language could frame; and in Mansfield's court he discovers the indiscreet and fiery little Serjeant, but not saying anything that was worthy of remembrance. In the Common Pleas he sees Blackstone, already famous across the Atlantic as the author of the Commentaries; and, before leaving Westminster Hall, he entertains himself in the committee chamber of the House of Commons at the examination of the witnesses in the case of the Worcester election, observing the M. P.s sitting on an elevated bench looking like a court of sessions, and noting that the examination is carried on by advocates "with regularity and decency."

From the law courts to the theatres is no violent step, reflecting as they do in pretty equal proportions the passions and humors of life, alike dealing largely in fictitious pathos and purchased buffoonery, and differing mainly in the fact that the law court beats the theatre in the reality of the catastrophes witnessed or inflicted in it. Mr. Curwen being a man of some taste, of course his first attempt was to see Garrick; and on a night when he was acting Hamlet, he forced his way into Drury Lane. He found him in all respects greatly above the standard of the performers who surrounded him, yet thought him even more perfect in the expression of his face, than in the accent and pronunciation of his voice. But it is to be remembered that the great actor, now in his sixtieth year, was arrived at his last season, and after this was to be seen no more; a fact of which Mr.

Curwen had no very agreeable evidence in attempting to get into Drury Lane a few months later to see him play Archer in Farquhar's delightful comedy, when, so enormous was the crowd, that after "suffering thumps, squeezes, and almost suffocation, for two hours," he was obliged to "retire without effecting it." He attempted it with no better success a few weeks later, when the dazzling performance of Richard, which had first startled London five-and-thirty years before, was given for the last time; when their majesties both were present, the theatre was again crammed to suffocation, and Mr. Curwen again turned back a disappointed man. He had to console himself as he might with Mrs. Barry at Covent Garden, where he saw and admired her fine person in Constance; where also he saw a lady play Macheath, thinking it "a great impropriety, not to say indecency;" where he thought Quick a good actor, too; and discreetly singled out Moody for praise before the merits of that performer were publicly acknowledged. On the whole, though, this particular time was but a dull time for theatres, as the interval between the sinking of a great star and the rising of any other generally is; and there seems no reason to attribute to anything but the correctness of his taste the formal complaint of our American critic, that he has no wish to indulge a cynical or surly disposition, yet cannot help declaring that he finds great disappointment at the London theatrical performances. The bulk of the actors fell below his idea of just imitation. To his seeming they overacted, underacted, or contradicted nature; the nicest art of the stage, which is to mark the lines of separation between humors or passions bearing to each other only general resemblances, appeared to be lost altogether; the hero was a bully, the gentleman a coxcomb, the coxcomb a fool, the fine lady affected, insipid, or pert; and nothing but the lower grades of character, the gamesters, chamber-maids, or footmen, were represented to the mark of what was true. As a reward to this well-informed lover of the theatre, however, for reaching London so late as the last season of Garrick, it so befell that he did not quit London till he had assisted at the first success of Mrs. Siddons, and saw the stage as it were reawaken at the inspiration of her genius.

Nor was he, meanwhile, without other resources. He went to Vauxhall Gardens, a "most enchanting spot" in those days, with glorious gravelled walks, shrubberies, illuminated alcoves, and everywhere such myriads of variegated lamps, that the lord of Strawberry Hill was wont to protest he should never again care a button for trees that had n't red or green lamps to light themselves up with. He took boat at Temple Stairs and went to

Ranelagh, where he found infinite numbers of well-dressed people, and rubbed up against the Duke of Gloucester and the French Ambassador. At an exhibition, silly enough in itself, called Les Ombres Chinoises, a badly arranged puppet-show, he saw, among several well-dressed people of fashion, an elderly gentleman with a star on his coat, who was pointed out to him as Lord Temple and "supposed author of Junius," a notion which seems strangely to have slept from that hour till an examination of the Stowe papers reawakened it not many months ago. He went to the Royal Academy Exhibition in Pall Mall (it was its last year there), and was yet more struck by it in the year next following — its first in Somerset House. In a very full house at the Haymarket, he heard the humorous George Alexander Stevens' Lecture on Heads; and saw subsequently (of course) an imitation and attempted improvement of the same, where the heads shone forth in transparency, Captain Cooke's calling forth elaborate eulogium, and Lawrence Sterne's the accompaniment of a pathetic apostrophe; — the exhibitor passing afterwards to very surprising tricks with cards, and winding up the whole with marvellous imitations of the thrush, blackbird, skylark, nightingale, woodlark, and quail. But songs more wondrous than these, the good New Englander heard on another occasion at Covent Garden Theatre, where, in honor of Handel (the musical saint of England, he exclaims, whose performances are as much read and studied as Romish manuals of devotion by their admirers), a performance of the oratorio of Messiah was given, with an effect he can only describe by heaping epithet on epithet, as noble, grand, full, sonorous, awfully majestic. "The whole assembly as one, rising," continues the earnest old man, "added a solemnity which swelled and filled my soul with an — I know not what, that exalted it beyond itself, bringing to my raised imagination a full view of that sacred assembly of blessed spirits which surround the throne of God."

Such was the character of the amusements that our great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers patronized, and incident to which, not seldom, other sights more grave were intruded. Thus, when our American holiday maker was crossing Clerkenwell Green one day, in the hope of passing a pleasant evening in company with a fellow-refugee from New England, "Mr. Copley, the limner," and his family (among whom played a sprightly child of two years old, who was destined to become Lord High Chancellor of England), he was startled by the sight of five couple of boys chained together, going under care of tipstaves to Bridewell — an exhibition, we grieve to say, which remained common and familiar in the same quarter for more than half a century afterwards. On another occasion, in that same neighborhood, he was led, by an awful curiosity, having heard that it was "notorious for its constant supply of Tyburn," into a court called Blueberry Alley, which he found to be precisely what to our disgrace such courts remain at the present hour, "filled with small, huttish kind of houses, the habitations of filth and vice." Having occasion to cross Hounslow Heath, his attention is arrested by "three monuments of human folly and divine justice" — as many gibbets with the remains of so many wretches hanging in chains. At Tyburn itself, he sees thirteen executed in one day; in connection with which he has to note the melancholy consideration that robberies are nevertheless greatly increasing, as indeed is thieving of all kinds in the metropolis. Not long after, he beheld a similar exhibition of ten suffering in one day on the same scaffold. Quietly walking up Holborn on another day, shortly after having seen two pickpockets publicly whipped at the Old Bailey (when the assembled mob expressed much dissatisfaction with the very moderate lashing inflicted on the oldest offender, and loudly swore "he had bought off Jack Ketch"), he found a throng of ordinary people crowding round a chaise filled with young children of about seven years of age, and, inquiring what it meant, learnt to his horror that so many infants, "capable of being trained to useful employments, and becoming blessings to society," were already known for hardened young sinners, and at that instant were on their way to Newgate. What was his amazement, too, to find a clergyman of the church of England suddenly carried off to Poultry Compter on a charge of forgery — his real name Dodd, but better known by the name of the Macaroni Doctor; and to remember that this was the same reverend divine whom, not many months before, he had heard at the Magdalen preaching, from the text, These things I command you, that ye love one another, "a most elegant, sensible, serious, and pathetic discourse, enough to have warmed a heart not callous to the impressions of pity," and which did indeed warm his, until his eyes "flowed with tears of compassion."

The tears of compassion due to Doctor Dodd in the pulpit, however, were certainly not due to him in his more proper place, the prison; and Mr. Curwen's feeling, when he heard what his previous career had been, took the very different and more natural direction of surprise that such a man should have been permitted to mount the pulpit at all. But without dwelling upon this, or seeking to account for the indifferentism which at that time had crept into the church, and which the vigorous preachings of Wesley and Whitfield were rapidly driving out of it, let us accompany our New England visitor to one of those fashionable Sunday promenades, at which it was then no unusual or indecorous thing to find yourself, in the evening, crowding and pushing past the parson under whose pulpit, in the morning, you had been sitting with reverent attention — and of which the doctor of divinity so unexpectedly committed to the Poultry was a noted and constant visitor.

The Sunday evening promenade, says Mr. Curwen (and the remark may be not unworthy of attention with such a question as the Sunday admission to the Sydenham Palace still undetermined), had been invented because less objectionable places of amusement were closed by enactment. In lieu of such, the promenade had been instituted "to compensate for twelve tedious hours' interval laid under an interdict by the laws of the country, as yet unrepealed formally by the legislature, though effectually so in the houses of the great and wealthy, from whence religion and charity are but too generally banished." It was held at the house (now D'Almaine's) in Soho Square, which the Lords Carlisle occupied to within twenty years of this date, which Mrs. Cornelys had afterwards hired for her celebrated balls and masquerades, and which — on that ingenious but unsuccessful lady's retreat from it, to vend asses' milk at Knightsbridge — was fitted up with rooms à la Chinois, with variegated, lamp-lit galleries, with grottoes of natural evergreens, with wildernesses of flowering moss and grass, with dimly-lighted caves of spar and stalactite, with Egyptian recesses mysterious in hieroglyphic panellings, and with tea-rooms and tea-tables for accommodation of a thousand promenaders. The employment of the company was simply walking through the rooms, and drinking (when they could get it) tea, or coffee, or chocolate, or negus, or lemonade; for which privilege tickets were purchased at the doors, costing three shillings each. What such a place would degenerate into, the reader can easily imagine. "Though it is also resorted to by persons of irreproachable character," says our grave and elderly friend, "among the wheat will be tares; the ladies were rigged out in gaudy attire, and attended by bucks, bloods, and macaronies." Full dress he found not requisite; but respectable habiliments absolutely so; and on the night he attended, the spurs of one promenader caught carelessly in a lady's flounce, whereupon the booted individual was obliged to apologize, and take them off. Yet very difficult it must have been for anybody, spurred or not, to keep clear of the flounces, seeing that the ladies appear to have come uniformly in two divisions, of which the first swept their track by long trails, and the other by enormous hoops and petticoats. A good thousand thronged the rooms on the night when Mr. Curwen was there; and such was the jostling, interfering, and elbowing, that, for his own part, he tells us, being old and small, he received more than a score of full butt encounters with dames in full sweep, and had to admire the greater experience with which the yet more ancient Duke of Queensberry piloted his perilous way. Of the accommodation in other respects, he also enables us to judge. He made fifteen vain attempts to get a dish of tea; and when served at last, it was in a slovenly manner, on a dirty tea-stand. Of all the commoner tea resorts he had already had experience;—he knew Bagnigge Wells, White Conduit House was not strange to him, nor was he unfamiliar with the Dog and Duck;—but never, in the humblest of such places of public resort, had he seen the company treated with so little respect by servants, as here. With Ranelagh, whose vacation it pretended to supply, it was not in that respect comparable; Vauxhall was a thousand times more agreeable; and taking himself off at the early hour of twelve, it was with no small content Mr. Curwen found himself once more safe in his own lodgings.

And now, week had crept on after week, month after month, and he was in the second year of his exile. The war that had driven him here was raging more furiously than ever; his wife, Abigail, who had refused to accompany him on his flight, had been obliged to pay ten pounds in Salem to find a man for the American army in his stead; George Washington was proclaimed Lord Protector of the thirteen independent states; the hope, which even Jefferson once entertained, that England and her colonies might have been a free and a great people together, was forever gone; and nothing remained for such as held the ex-judge's moderate opinions, but to prepare for a lengthened exile. Exactly twelve months were passed since he landed at Dover, and here was a letter just come from a friend at Salem—"filled with American fancies," Heaven help them! Nothing was dwelt upon in it but their power, strength, grandeur, and prowess by land and sea; their policy, patriotism, industry; their progress in the useful arts, and their fixed determination to withstand the attacks of tyranny—"et cetera, et cetera, et cetera," adds Mr. Curwen, impatient of his correspondent's extravagance. For he feels, alas! that too soon, to their sorrow, these fanciful notions, like Ephraim's goodness, will "vanish as the morning cloud and early dew" into the land whither all such fatal delusions sooner or later pass. But, meanwhile, he may not shrink from the conclusion such letters put before him. He must no longer hope to measure his residence in England by the probabilities of weeks or months, but by the sad certainty of years.

London, then, can be no place for his continued abode. It is too expensive for the narrow means to which the necessities attendant on his flight restrict him. He must visit some of the leading country towns to ascertain whether without the cost of London, yet not wholly apart from the cultivated society to which he has been accustomed, his mode of life may be able to adapt itself to his altered circumstances. And perhaps, at some early day, the reader will not object to accompany him on this proposed ramble through the leading towns of Old England, and mark how little or how much they may still retain of what their visitor from New England observed in them Seventy-Eight Years Ago.

SPARE MY HEART FROM GROWING OLD.

BY CHARLES H. HITCHINGS.

OLD Time, I ask a boon of thee—

Thou 'st stripped my hearth of many a friend,
Ta'en half my joys and all my glee—

Be just for once, to make amend;
And, since thy hand must leave its trace,
Turn locks to gray, turn blood to cold—
Do what thou wilt with form and face,
But spare my heart from growing old.

I know thou 'st ta'en from many a mind
Its dearest wealth, its choicest store,
And only lingering left behind
O'er-wise Experience' bitter lore.

'T is sad to mark the mind's decay,
Feel wit grow dim and memory cold—
Take these, old Time, take all away,
But spare my heart from growing old.

Give me to live with Friendship still,
And Hope and Love till life be o'er—
Let be the first the final chill
That bids the bosom bound no more;

That so, when I am passed away,
And in my grave lie slumbering cold,
With fond remembrance friends may say,
"His heart, his heart grew never old."

DEATH.

METHOUGHT a change came o'er me, strange yet sweet,

As if unmanacled a captive sprung;
Lightness for dull incumbrance, wings for feet,
The heavy and the weak asunder flung;
To sink, to sail, to fly were all the same;
No weight, no weariness; unfleshed and free;

Pure and aspiring as the ethereal flame,
With the full strength of immortality;
Reason clear, passionless, serene, and bright,
Without a prejudice, without a stain,
Unmingled and immaculate delight,
Without the shadow of a fear or pain—
A whisper gentle as a zephyr's breath
Spoke in mine ear, "THIS LIBERTY IS DEATH."

THE WELL IN THE WILDERNESS.

A TALE OF THE PRAIRIE. FOUNDED ON FACT.

BY MRS. MOODIE.

AUTHOR OF "ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH."

In vain you urge me to forget
That fearful night — it haunts me yet;
And stamp't into my heart and brain,
The awful memory will remain;
Yea, e'en in sleep that ghostly sight
Returns to shake my soul each night. — S. M.

RICHARD STEEL was the son of one of those small landholders who are fast disappearing from Merry Old England. His father left him the sole possessor of twenty-five acres of arable land, and a snug little cottage, which had descended from father to son, through many generations.

The ground-plot, which had been sufficient to maintain his honest progenitors for several ages, in the palmy days of Britain's glory and independence, ere her vast resources passed into the hands of the few, and left the many to starve, was not enough to provide for the wants of our stout yeoman and his family; which consisted at that period of three sons and one daughter, a lovely, blooming girl of ten years, or thereabouts. Richard and his boys toiled with unceasing diligence; the wife was up late and early, and not one moment was left unemployed; and yet they made no headway, but every succeeding year found them in arrears.

"Jane," said the yeoman one evening, thoughtfully, to his wife, after having blessed his homely meal of skimmed milk and brown bread, "couldst thee not have given us a little treat to-night? Hast thee forgotten that it is our Annie's birthday?"

"No, Richard, I have not forgotten: how could I forget the anniversary of the day that made us all so happy! But times are bad; I could not spare the money to buy sugar and plums for the cake; and I wanted to sell all the butter, in order to scrape together enough to pay the shoemaker for making our darling's shoes. Annie knows that she is infinitely dear to us all, though we cannot give her luxuries to prove it."

"It wants no proof, dear mother," said the young girl, flinging her round, but sunburnt arms about her worthy parent's neck. "Your precious love is worth the wealth of the whole world to me. I know how fond you and dear father are of me, and I am more than satisfied."

"Annie is right," said Steel, dropping his knife and holding out his arms for a caress. "The world could not purchase such love as we feel for her; and let us bless God that, poor though we be, we are all here to-night, well and strong, ay, and rich, in spite of our homely fare, in each other's affections. What say you, my boys?" And he glanced with parental pride on the three fine lads, whose healthy and honest countenances might well be contemplated with pleasure, and afford subjects for hopeful anticipations for the future.

"We are happy, father," said the eldest, cheerfully.

"The cakes and spiced ale would have made us happier," said the second. "Mother makes such nice cakes!"

"So she does," cried the third. "It seems so dull to have nothing nice on Annie's birthday. I should not care a fig if it were Dick's birthday, or Owen's, or mine; but not to drink Annie's health seems unlucky."

"You shall drink it yet," said Annie, laughing.

"In what?" asked both the boys in a breath.

"In fine spring water!" And she filled their mugs.

"Better God never gave to his creatures. How bright it is! How it sparkles! I will never from this day ask a finer drink. Here is health to you, my brothers, and may we never know what it is to lack a draught of pure water!"

Annie nodded to her brothers, and drank off her mug of water; and the good-natured fellows, who dearly loved her, followed her example.

Oh, little did the gay-hearted girl think, in that moment of playful glee, of the price she was one day destined to pay for a drink of water!

The crops that year were a failure, and the heart of the strong man began to droop. He felt that labor in his native land would no longer give his children bread, and, unwilling to sink into the lowest class, he wisely resolved, while he retained the means of doing so, to emigrate to America. His wife made no opposition to his wishes; his sons were delighted with the prospect of any change for the better, and if Annie felt a passing pang at leaving the daisied fields, and her pretty playmates, the lambs, she hid it from her parents. The dear homestead, with its quiet rural orchard, and trim hedgerows, fell to the hammer; nor was the sunburnt cheek of the honest yeoman unmoistened with a tear, when he saw it added to the enormous possessions of the lord of the manor.

After the sale was completed, and the money it brought duly paid, Steel lost no time in preparing for his emigration. In less than a fortnight he had secured their passage to New York, and they were already on their voyage across the Atlantic. Favored by wind and weather, after the first effects of the sea had worn off, they were comfortable enough. The steerage passengers were poor, but respectable English emigrants, and they made several pleasant acquaintances among them. One family especially attracted their attention, and so far engaged their affections during the tedious voyage, that they entered into an agreement to settle in the same neighborhood. Mr. Atkins was a widower, with two sons, the ages of Richard and Owen, and an elder sister, a primitive, gentle old woman, who had been once both wife and mother, but had outlived all her family. Abigail Winchester (for so she was called) took an especial fancy to our Annie, in whom she fancied that she recognized a strong resemblance to a daughter whom she had lost. Her affection was warmly returned by the kind girl, who, by a thousand little attentions, strove to evince her gratitude to Abigail for her good opinion.

They had not completed half their voyage before the scarlet fever broke out among the passengers, and made dreadful havoc among the younger portion. Steel's whole family were down with it at the same time, and, in spite of the constant nursing of himself and his devoted partner, and the unremitting attentions of Abigail Winchester, who never left the sick ward for many nights and days, the two youngest boys died, and were committed to the waters of the great deep before Annie and Richard recovered to a consciousness of their dreadful loss. This threw a sad gloom over the whole party. Steel said nothing, but he often retired to some corner of the ship to bewail his loss in secret. His wife was wasted and worn to a shadow, and poor Annie looked the ghost of her former self.

"Had we never left England," she thought, "my brothers had not died." But she was wrong; God, who watches with parental love over all his creatures, knows the best season in which to reclaim His own; but human love in its vain yearnings is slow in receiving this great truth. It lives in the present, lingers over the past, and cannot bear to give up that which now is for the promise of that which shall be. The future separated from the things of time has always an awful aspect. A perfect and childlike reliance upon God can alone divest it of those thrilling doubts and fears which at times shake the firmest mind, and urge the proud, unyielding spirit of man to cleave so strongly to kindred dust.

The sight of the American shores, that the poor lads had desired so eagerly to see, seemed to renew their grief, and a sadder party never set foot upon a foreign strand than our emigrant and his family.

Steel had brought letters of introduction to a respectable merchant in the city; who advised him to purchase a tract of land in the then new State of Illinois. The beauty of the country, the fine climate, and fruitful soil, were urged upon him in the strongest manner. The merchant had scrip to dispose of in that remote settlement, and, as is usual in such cases, he consulted his own interest in the matter.

Steel thought that the merchant, who was a native of the country, must know best what would suit him; and he not only became a purchaser of land in Illinois, but induced his new friends to follow his example.

We will pass over their journey to the Far West. The novelty of the scenes through which they passed contributed not a little to raise their drooping spirits. Richard had recovered his health, and amused the party not a little by his lively anticipations of the future. They were to have the most comfortable log-house, and the neatest farm in the district. He would raise the finest cattle the largest crops, and the best garden stuff in the neighborhood. Frugal and industrious habits would soon render them wealthy and independent.

His mother listened to these sallies with a delighted smile; and even the grave yeoman's brow relaxed from its habitual frown. Annie entered warmly into all her brother's plans; and if he laid the foundation of his fine castle in the air, she certainly provided the cement and all the lighter materials.

As their long route led them further from the habitations of men, and deeper and deeper into the wilderness, the stern realities of their solitary locality became hourly more apparent to the poor emigrants. They began to think that they had acted too precipitately in going so far back into the woods, unacquainted as they were with the usages of the country. But repentance came too late; and, when at length they reached their destination, they found themselves upon the edge of a vast forest, with a noble open prairie stretching away as far as the eye could reach in front of them, and no human habitation in sight, or indeed existing for miles around them.

In a moment the yeoman comprehended all the difficulties and dangers of his situation; but his was a stout heart, not easily daunted by circumstances. He possessed a vigorous constitution and a strong arm; and he was not alone. Richard was an active, energetic lad, and his friend Atkins, and his two sons, were a host in themselves. Having settled with his guides, and ascertained by the maps, that he had received at Mr. —'s office, the extent and situation of his new estate, he set about unyoking the cattle which he had purchased, and securing them, while Atkins and his sons pitched a tent for the night, and collected wood for their fire. The young people were in raptures with the ocean of verdure, redolent with blossoms, that lay smiling in the last rays of the sun before them; never did garden appear to them so lovely, as that vast wilderness of sweets, planted by the munificent hand of Nature with such profuse magnificence. Annie could scarcely tear herself away from the enchanting scene, to assist her mother in preparing their evening meal.

"Mother, where shall we get water?" asked Annie, glancing wistfully toward their empty cask; "I have seen no indications of water for the last three miles."

"Annie has raised a startling doubt," said Steel; "I can perceive no appearance of stream or creek in any direction."

"Hist! father, do you hear that?" cried Richard. "The croaking of those frogs is music to me just now, for I am dying with thirst;" and, seizing the can, he ran off in the direction of the discordant sounds.

It was near dark when he returned with his painful of clear cold water; with which the whole of the party slaked their thirst, before asking any questions.

"What delicious water—as clear as crystal—as cold as ice! How fortunate to obtain it so near at hand!" exclaimed several in a breath.

"Ay, but it is an ugly place," said Richard thoughtfully. "I should not like to go to that well at early day, or after night-fall."

"Why not, my boy?"

"It is in the heart of a dark swamp, just about a hundred yards within the forest; and the water trickles from beneath the roots of an old tree into a natural stone tank; but all around is involved in frightful gloom; I fancied I heard a low growl as I stooped to fill my pail, while a horrid speckled snake glided from between my feet, and darted hissing and rattling its tail into the brake. Father, you must never let any of the people go alone to that well."

The yeoman laughed at his son's fears, and shortly after the party retired into the tent, and, overcome with fatigue, were soon asleep.

The first thing that engaged the attention of our emigrants was the erection of a log shanty for the reception of their respective families. This important task was soon accomplished. Atkins preferred the open prairie for the site of his; but Steel, for the nearer proximity of wood and water, chose the edge of the forest, but the habitations of the pioneers were so near that they were within call of each other.

To fence in a piece of land for their cattle, and prepare a plot for wheat and corn for the ensuing year, was the next thing to be accomplished; and by the time these preparations were completed the long bright summer had passed away, and the fall was at hand. Up to this period both families had enjoyed excellent health, but in the month of September, Annie, and then Richard, fell sick with intermittent fever, and old Abigail kindly came across to help Mrs. Steel to nurse her suffering children. Medical aid was not to be had in that remote place, and beyond simple remedies, which were perfectly inefficacious in their situation, the poor children's only chance for life was their youth, a good sound constitution, and the merciful interposition of a benevolent and overruling Providence.

It was towards the close of a sultry day that Annie, burning with fever, implored the faithful Abigail to give her a drink of cold water. Hastening to the water-cask, the old woman was disappointed by finding it exhausted, Richard having drunk the last drop, who was still raving in the delirium of fever for more drink.

"My dear child, there is no water."

"Oh! I am burning—dying with thirst! Give me but one drop, dear Abigail—one drop of cold water!"

Just then Mrs. Steel returned from milking the cows, and Abigail proffered to the lips of the child a bowl of new milk, but she shrank from it with disgust, and, sinking back on her pillow, murmured, "Water! water! for the love of God! give me a drink of water!"

"Where is the pail?" said Mrs. Steel. "I don't much like going alone to that well; but it is still broad day, and I know that in reality there is nothing to fear; I cannot bear to hear the child moan for drink in that terrible way."

"Dear mother," said Richard, faintly, "don't go; father will be in soon; we can wait till then."

"Oh! the poor dear child is burning!" cried Abigail; "she cannot wait till then; do, neighbor, go for the water; I will stay with the children, and put out the milk while you are away."

Mrs. Steel left the shanty, and a few minutes after, the patients, exhausted by suffering, fell into a profound sleep. Abigail busied herself scalding the milk-pans, and, in her joy at the young people's cessation from pain, forgot the mother altogether. About half an hour had elapsed, and the mellow light of evening had faded into night, when Steel returned with his oxen from the field.

The moment he entered the shanty he went up to the bed which contained his sick children, and, satisfied that the fever was abating, he looked round for his supper, surprised that it was not, as usual, ready for him upon the table.

"No water!" he cried, "in the cask, and supper not ready. After working all day in the burning sun, a man wants to have things made comfortable for him at night. Mrs. Winchester, are you here? Where is my wife?"

"Merciful goodness!" exclaimed the old woman, turning as pale as death, "is she not back from the well?"

"The well!" cried Steel, grasping her arm; "how long has she been gone?"

"This half hour, or more."

Steel made no answer — his cheek was as pale as her own; and, taking his gun from the beam to which it was slung, he carefully loaded it with ball; and, without uttering a word, left the house.

Day still lingered upon the open prairie, but the moment he entered the bush it was deep night. He had crossed the plain with rapid strides, but as he approached the swamp, his step became slow and cautious. The well was in the centre of a jungle, from the front of which Richard had cleared away the brush to facilitate their access to the water; as he drew near the spot, his ears were chilled by a low deep growling, and the crunching of teeth, as if some wild animal was devouring the bones of its prey. The dreadful truth, with all its shocking, heart-revolting reality, flashed upon the mind of the yeoman, and for a moment paralyzed him. The precincts of the well were within range of his rifle, and dropping down upon his hands and knees, and nerving his arm for a clear aim, he directed his gaze to the spot from whence the fatal sounds proceeded. A little on one side of the well, a pair of luminous eyes glared like green lamps at the edge of the dark wood; and the horrid sounds which curdled the blood of the yeoman became more distinctly audible.

Slowly Steel raised the rifle to his shoulder, and setting his teeth, and holding his breath, he steadily aimed at a space between those glowing balls of fire. The sharp report of the rifle awoke the far echoes of the forest. The deer leaped up from his lair, the wolf howled and fled into the depths of the wood, and the panther, for such it was, uttering a hoarse growl, sprang several feet into the air, then fell across the mangled remains of his victim.

Richard Steel rose from the ground; the perspiration was streaming from his brow; his limbs trembled and shook, his lips moved convulsively, and he pressed his hands upon his heaving breast to keep down the violent throbbings of his agitated heart. It was not fear that chained him to the spot, and hindered him from approaching his dead enemy. It was horror. He dared not look upon the mangled remains of his wife — the dear partner of his joys and sorrows — the companion of his boyhood — the love of his youth — the friend and counsellor of his middle age — the beloved mother of his children. How could he recognize in that crushed and defiled heap his poor Jane? The pang was too great for his agonized mind to bear. Sense and sight alike forsook him, and, staggering a few paces forward, he fell insensible across the path.

Alarmed by the report of the rifle, Atkins and his sons proceeded with torches to the spot, followed by Abigail, who, unconscious of the extent of the calamity, was yet sufficiently convinced that something dreadful had occurred. When the full horrors of the scene were presented to the sight of the terror-stricken group, their grief burst forth in tears and lamentations. Atkins alone retained his presence of mind. Dragging the panther from the remains of the unfortunate Mrs. Steel, he beckoned to one of his sons, and suggested to him the propriety of instantly burying the disfigured and mutilated body before the feelings of her husband and children were agonized by the sight.

First removing the insensible husband to his own dwelling, Atkins and his sons returned to the fatal spot, and conveying the body to the edge of the prairie, they selected a quiet, lovely spot beneath the wide-spreading boughs of a magnificent chestnut-tree, and wrapping all that remained of the wife of Richard Steel in a sheet, they committed it to the earth in solemn silence; nor were prayers or tears wanting in that lonely hour to consecrate the nameless grave where the English mother slept.

Annie and Richard recovered to mourn their irreparable loss — to feel that their mother's life had been sacrificed to her maternal love. Time, as it ever does, softened the deep anguish of the bereaved husband. During the ensuing summer, their little colony was joined by a hardy band of British and American pioneers. The little settlement grew into a prosperous village, and Richard Steel died a wealthy man, and was buried by the side of his wife, in the centre of the village churchyard, that spot having been chosen for the first temple in which the emigrants met to worship in his own house the God of their fathers.

DAWN.

Dawn cometh; and the weary stars wax pale
With watching through the lonely hours of Night,
And o'er the fathomless, deep, azure veil
A sweet, uncertain smile of infant light
Spreads softly, rippling up the starry height;
Chasing the mists that like dark spirits flee
Before the breath of Morn; and now more bright
It mantles o'er the unrepining sea,

As when on sorrowing brows first gleams the birth
Of joy for years estranged; then as a child,
That, through the solemn woods at eve beguiled,
Steals with light foot-fall, 'mid the leaves
scarce heard,
Upon a bough where rests some slumbering
bird —
So steals the silent Dawn upon the sleeping Earth!

From Household Words.

A WALK THROUGH A MOUNTAIN.

I took a walk last year through the sub-tain of a mountain, entering at the top, and coming out at the bottom, after a two or three mile journey underground. Perhaps the story of this trip is worth narrating. The mountain was part of an extensive property belonging to the Emperor of Austria, in his character of salt merchant, and contained the famous salt mine of Hallein.

The whole salt district of Upper Austria, called the Salzkammergut, forms part of a range of rocks that extends from Halle in the Tyrol, passes through Reichenthal in Bavaria, and continues by way of Hallein in Salzburg, to end at Ausse in Styria. The Austrian part of the range is now included in what is called the district of Salzburg, and that district abounds, as might be expected, in salt springs, hot and cold, which form in fact the baths of Gastein, Ischl, and some other places. The names of Salzburg (Saltborough), the capital, and of the Salzack (Saltbrook), on the left bank of which that pleasant city stands, indicate clearly enough the character of the surrounding country. Hallein is a small town eight miles to the south-east of Salzburg, and it was to the mine of Hallein, as before said, that I paid my visit.

On the way thither I passed through much delightful rock and water scenery. From Linz, the capital of Upper Austria, I got through Wells and Laimbach to the river Traun, and trudged afoot beside its winding waters till I reached the point of its junction with the Traunsee, or Lake of Traun. From the village on the opposite shore, I followed the same stream again upon its wanderings by mountain steep, and wooded bank, along the valley called after the river's name, until I came to Gmunden, where the Traun flows through another lake. At Gmunden I stopped to look over the Imperial Salt Warehouses. The Emperor of Austria, as most people know, is the only dealer in salt and tobacco with whom his subjects are allowed to trade. His salt warehouses, therefore, must needs be extensive. They are situated at Gmunden to the left of the landing-place, from which a little steamer plies across the lake; and they are so built as to afford every facility for the unloading of boats that bring salt barrels from the mine by the highway of the Traun. The warehouses consisted simply of a large number of sheds piled with the salt in barrels, a few offices, and a low but spacious hall, filled, in a confused way, with dusty models. There were models of river-boats and salt moulds, mining tools, and tram-ways, hydraulic models of all kinds, miniature furnaces, wooden troughs, and seething pans. I looked through these until the bell from the adjacent pier warned me, at five o'clock in the evening, to go on board the steamer that was quite ready to puff and splash its way across the beautiful green lake. We went under the shadow of the black and lofty Traunstein, and among pine-covered rocks, of which the reflections were mingled in the water with a ruddy glow, that streamed across a low shore from some fires towards which we were steering.

The glow proceeded from the fires of the Imperial Saltern, erected at Ebensee. I paid a short visit to the works, which have been erected at great cost; and display all the most recent improvements in the art of getting the best marketable salt from saline water. I found that the water, heavily impregnated, is conducted from the distant mines by wooden troughs into the drying-pan. The pan is a large shallow vessel of metal, supported by small piles of brick, and a low brick wall about three feet high, extending round two thirds of its circumference, and leaving one third, as the mouth of the furnace, open to the air. Among the brick columns, and within the wall, the fire flashed and curled under the seething pan. Ascending next into the house over the great pan, and looking down upon the surface and its contents, through sliding doors upon the floor, I saw the white salt crustling like a coat of snow over the boiling water, and being raked as it is formed by workmen stationed at each of the trap-doors in the floor above me. As the water evaporated, the salt was stirred and turned from rake to rake; and, finally, when quite dry, raked into the neighborhood of a long-handled spade, with which one workman was shovelling among the dried salt, and filling a long row of wooden moulds, placed ready to his hand. These moulds are sugar-loaf shaped, and perforated at the bottom like a sugar mould, in order that any remaining moisture may drain out of them. The moulds will be placed finally in a heated room before the salt will be considered dry enough for storage as a manufactured article.

The brine that pours with an equable flow into the seething-pan at Ebensee, is brought by wooden troughs from the salt mine at Hallein, a distance of thirty miles in a direct line. It comes by way of mountains and along a portion of the valley of the Traun, through which I continued my journey the same evening from Ebensee, until the darkness compelled me to rest for the night at a small inn on a hill side. The next day I went through Ischl and Wolfgang, and spent three hours of afternoon in climbing up the Scharfberg, which is more than a thousand feet higher than Snowdon, to see the sunset and the sunrise. There was sleeping accommodation on the top: so there is on the top of Snowdon.

On the Scharfberg I had a hay-litter in a wooden shed and ate goat's cheese and bread and butter. I saw no sunset or sunrise, but had a night of wind and rain, and came down in the morning through white mist within a rugged gully ploughed up by the rain, to get a wholesome breakfast at St. Gilgen on the lake. More I need not say about the journey than that, on the fifth day after leaving Ebensee, having rested a little in the very beautiful city of Salzburg, I marched into the town of Hallein, at the foot of the Dürrnberg, the famous salt mountain, called Tumul by old chroniclers, and known for a salt mountain seven hundred and thirty years ago.

After a night's rest in the town, I was astir by five o'clock in the morning, and went forward on my visit to the mines. In the case of the Dürrnberg salt mine, as I have already said, the miner enters at the top and comes out at the bottom. My first business, therefore, was to walk up the mountain, the approach to which is by a long slope of about four English miles.

I met few miners by the way, and noticed in them few peculiarities of manners or costume. The national dress about these regions is a sort of cross between the Swiss Alpine costume and a common peasant dress of the lowlands. I saw indications of the sugar-loafed hat; jackets were worn almost by all, with knee-breeches and colored leggings. The clothing was always neat and sound, and the clothed bodies looked reasonably healthy, except that they had all remarkably pale faces. The miners did not seem bodily to suffer from their occupation.

As I approached the summit of the Dürrnberg, the dry, brownish limestone showed its bare front to the morning sun. I entered the offices, partly contained in the rock, and applied for admission into the dominion of the gnomes. My arrival was quite in the nick of time, for I had not to be kept waiting, as I happened to complete the party of twelve, without which the two guides do not start. It was a Tower of London business; and, as at the Tower, the demand upon our purses was not very heavy. One gulden-schein—about tenpence—is the regulated fee. Our full titles having been duly put down in the register, each of us was furnished with a miner's costume, and, so habited, off we set.

We started from a point that is called the Obersteinberghauptstollen; our guides only having candles, one in advance, the other in the rear.

We were sensible of a pleasant coldness in the air when we had gone a little way into the sloping tunnel. The tunnel was lofty, wide, and dry. Having walked downwards on a gentle decline for a distance of nearly three thousand feet through the half gloom and among the echoes, we arrived at the mouth of the first shaft, named Freudenberg. The method of descent is called the "Rolle." It is both simple and efficacious. Down the steep slope of the shaft, and at an angle, in this case, of forty-one and a half degrees, run two smooth railways parallel with each other, and each of about the thickness of a scaffold pole; they are twelve inches apart, and run together down the shaft like two sides of a thick ladder without the intervening rounds. Following the directions and example of the foremost guide, we sat astride one behind the other on this wooden tramway, and slid very comfortably to the bottom, regulating our speed with our hands. The shaft itself was only of the width necessary to allow room for our passage. In this way we descended to the next chamber in the mountain, at a depth of a hundred and forty feet (perpendicular) from the top of the long slide.

We then stood in a low-roofed chamber, small enough to be lighted throughout by the dusky glare of our two candles. The walls and roof sparkled with brown and purple colors, showing the unworked stratum of rock-salt. We stood then at the head of the Untersteinberghauptstulm, and after a glance back at the narrow slit in the solid limestone through which we had just descended, we pursued our way along a narrow gallery of irregular level for a further distance of six hundred and sixty feet. A second shaft there opened us a passage into the deeper regions of the mine. With a boyish pleasure we all seated ourselves again upon a "Rolle"—this time upon the Johann-Jacob-berg-rolle, which is laid at an angle of forty-five and a half degrees—and away we slipped to the next level, which is at the perpendicular depth of another couple of hundred feet.

We alighted in another chamber, where our candles made the same half gloom, with their ruddy glare into the darkness, where there was the same sombre glittering upon the walls and ceiling. We pursued our track along a devious cutting, haunted by confused and giant shadows, suddenly passing black cavernous sideways that startled us as we came upon them, and I began to expect mummies, for I thought myself for one minute within an old Egyptian catacomb. After traversing a further distance of two thousand seven hundred feet we halted at the top of the third slide, the Königs-rolle. That shot us fifty-four feet deeper into the heart of the mountain. We had become quite expert at our exercise, and had left off considering, amid all these descents and traverses, what might be our real position in the bowels of the earth. Perhaps we might get down to Aladdin's garden and find trees loaded with emerald and ruby fruits. It was quite possible, for there was something very cabalistic, very strong of enchantment, in the word Konhauserankersbachtricht, the name given to the portion of the mine which we were then descending. Konhauser-return-shaft is, I think, however, about the meaning of that compound word.

So far I had felt nothing like real cold, although I had been promised a wintry atmosphere. Possibly with a miner's dress over my ordinary clothing, and with plenty of exercise, there was enough to counteract the effects of the chill air. But our eyes began to ache at the uncertain light, and we all straggled irregularly along the smooth cut shaft level for another sixty feet, and so reached the Konhauser-rolle, the fourth slide we had encountered in our progress.

That cheered us up a little, as it shot us down another one hundred and eight feet perpendicular depth to the Soolererzeugungswerk-Konhauser—surely a place nearer than ever to the magic regions of Abracadabra. If not Aladdin's garden, something wonderful ought surely by this time to have been reached. I was alive to any sight or sound, and was excited by the earnest whispering of my fellow-adventurers, and the careful directions as to our progress given by the guides and light-bearers.

With eager rapidity we fitted among the black shadows of the cavern, till we reached a winding flight of giant steps. We mounted them with desperate excitement, and at the summit halted, for we felt that there was space before our faces, and had been told that those stairs led to a mid-mountain lake, nine hundred and sixty feet below the mountain's top; two hundred and forty feet above its base. Presently, through the darkness, we perceived at an apparently interminable distance a few dots of light, that shed no lustre, and could help us in no way to pierce the pitchy gloom of the great cavern. The lights were not interminably distant, for they were upon the other shore, and this gnome lake is but a mere drop of water in the mountain mass, its length being three hundred and thirty, and its breadth one hundred and sixty feet.

Our guides lighted more candles, and we began to see their rays reflected from the water; we could hear too the dull splashing of the boat, which we could not see, as old Charon slowly ferried to our shore. More lights were used; they flashed and flickered from the opposite ferry station, and we began to have an indistinct sense of a spangled dome, and of an undulating surface of thick, black water, through which the coming boat loomed darkly. More candles were lighted on both sides of the Konhauser lake, a very Styx, defying all the illuminating force of candles, dead and dark in its dim cave, even the limits of which all our lights did not serve to define. The boat reached the place for embarkation, and we, wandering ghosts, half walked and were half carried into its broad clumsy hulk, and took each his allotted seat in ghostly silence. There was something really terrible in it all; in the slow funereal pace at which we floated across the subterranean lake; in the dead quiet among us, only interrupted by the slow plunge of the oar into the sickly waters. In spite of all the lights that had been kindled we were still in a thick vapor of darkness, and could form but a dreamy notion of the beauty and the grandeur of the crystal dome within which we men from the upper earth were hidden from our fellows. The lights were flared aloft as we crept sluggishly across the lake, and now and then were flashed back from a hanging stalactite, but that was all. The misty darkness about us brought to the fancy at the same time fearful images, and none of us were sorry when we reached the other shore in safety. There a rich glow of light awaited us, and there we were told a famous tale about the last archducal visit to these salt mines, when some thousands of lighted tapers glittered and flashed about him, and exhibited the vaulted roof and spangled lake in all their beauty. As we were not archdukes, we had our Hades lighted only by a pound of short sixteens.

We left the lake behind us, and then, traversing a further distance of seventy feet along the Wehrschachtricht, arrived at the mouth of the Konhauser Stiege. Another rapid descent of forty-five feet at an angle of fifty degrees, and we then reached Rupertschachtricht, a long cavern of the extent of five hundred and sixty feet, through which we toiled with a growing sense of weariness. We had now come to the top of the last and longest "slide" in the whole Dürrnberg. It is called the Wolfdietrichberg-rolle, and is four hundred and sixty-eight feet long, carrying us two hundred and forty feet lower down into the mountain. We went down this "slide" with the alacrity of school-boys, one after another keeping the pot boiling, and all regulating our movements with great circumspection, for we knew that we had far to go and we could never see more than a few yards before us.

Having gained the ground beneath in safety, our attention was drawn to a fresh water well or spring, sunk in this spot at great cost by order of the archduke, and blessed among miners. Amid all the stone and salt and brine, a gush of pure fresh water at our feet was very welcome to us all. The well was sunk, however, to get water that was necessary for the mining operations. We did not see any of these operations underground, for they are not exhibited; the show-trip underground is only among the ventilating shafts and galleries. Through the dark openings by which we had passed, we should have found our way (had we been permitted) to the miners. I have seen them working in the Tyrol, and their labors are extremely simple. Some of the rock-salt is quarried in transparent crystals, that undergo only the process of crushing before they are sent into the market as an article of commerce. Very little of this grain salt is seen in England, but on the continent it may be found in some of the first hotels, and on the tables of most families. It is cheaper than the loaf salt, and is known in Germany under the title of salzkorn, and in France, as selle de cuisine. In order to obtain a finer grained and better salt, it is necessary that the original salt-crystals should be dissolved, and for this purpose parallel galleries are run into the rock, and there is dug in each of them a dyke or cistern. These dykes are then flushed with water, which is allowed to remain in them undisturbed for the space of from five to twelve months, according to the richness of the soil; and, being then thoroughly saturated with the salt that it has taken up, the brine is drawn off through wooden pipes from Hallein over hill and dale into the evaporating pans.

We had traversed the last level, and had reached what is generally called the end of the salt-mine; but we were still a long way distant from the pure air and the sunshine. We had travelled through seven galleries of an aggregate length of nearly two miles: we had floated across an earthy piece of water; had followed one another down six slides, and had penetrated to the depth of twelve hundred feet into the substance of the mountain limestone, gypsum, and marl. Having done all this, there we were in the very heart of the Dürrenberg, left by our guides, and entrusted to the care of two lank lads with haggard faces. We stood together in a spacious cavern, poorly lighted by our candles: there was a line of tram-rail running through the middle of it and we soon saw the carriage that was to take us out of the mountain emerging from a dark nook in the distance. It was a truck with seats upon it, economically arranged after the fashion of an Irish jaunting car. The two lads were to be our horses, and our way lay through a black hollow in one side of the cavern, into which the tram-rail ran.

We took our seats, instructed to sit perfectly still, and to restrain our legs and arms from any straggling. There was no room to spare in the shaft we were about to traverse. Our car was run on to the tram-line, and the two lads, with a sickly smile, and a broad hint at their expected gratuity, began to pull, and promised us a rapid journey. In another minute, and we were whirling down an incline with a rush and a rattle, through the subterranean passage tunnelled into solid limestone which runs to the outer edge of the Dürrenberg. The length of this tunnel is considerably more than an English mile.

The reverberation and the want of light were nothing, but we were disagreeably sensible of a cloud of fine stone dust, and knew well that we should come out not only stone deaf, but as white as millers. Clinging to our seats with a cowardly instinct, down we went through a hurricane of sound and dust. At length we were sensible of a diminution in our speed, and the confusion of noises so far ceased, that we could hear the panting of our biped cattle. Then, straight before us, shining in the centre of the pitchy darkness, there was a bright blue star suddenly apparent. One of the poor lads in the whisper of exhaustion, and between his broken pantings for breath, told us that they always know when they have got half way by the blue star, for that is the daylight shining in.

A little necessary rest, and we were off again, the blue star before us growing gradually paler, and expanding and still growing whiter, till with an uncontrollable dash, and a concussion, we are thrown within a few feet of the broad incomparable daylight. With how much contempt of candles did I look up at the noonday sun! The two lads, streaming with perspiration, who had dragged us down the long incline were made happy by the payment we all gladly offered for their services. Then, as we passed out of the mouth of the shaft, by a rude chamber cut out of the rock, we were induced to pause and purchase from a family of miners who reside there a little box of salt crystals, as a memento of our visit. Truly we must have been among the gnomes, for when I had reached the inn I spread the brilliant crystals I had brought home with me on my bedroom window sill, and there they sparkled in the sun and twinkled rainbows, changing and shifting their bright colors as though there were a living imp at work within. But when I got up next morning and looked for my crystals, in the place where each had stood, I found only a little slop of brine. That fact may, I have no doubt, be accounted for by the philosophers; but I prefer to think that it was something wondrous strange, and that I fared marvellously like people of whom I had read in German tales, how they received gifts from the good people who live in the bowels of the earth, and what became of them. I have had my experiences, and I do not choose to be sure whether those tales are altogether founded upon fancy.

THE LAW ABOUT BETTING ON PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

SIR, — Will you allow me to draw the attention of your readers and yourselves to a few evidences that show how careful our law has ever been to discountenance such silly and mischievous wagers as that which Mr. Cobden is making with General Brotherton!

Before quoting a case, I may mention that in the seventh year of Queen Anne's reign, so general do wagers of this kind appear to have become, and the mischief of them so apparent, that an act was passed actually prohibiting them under a penalty.

This act, it appears, only applied to the then existing war, and, after reciting that "Whereas several persons have of late years laid wagers and executed policies for payment of great sums of money upon contingencies relating to the present war, which practice has been found inconvenient to the public," it was enacted that after a certain day in 1709, all wagers relating to the war, and all policies of assurance for payment thereof, should be void, and all persons making such wagers should forfeit double the sum of such wager, one half to the Queen, the other to the prosecutor. This act expired with the war.

Perhaps the best known case in which a gambling agreement of the present kind was held void as contrary to sound public policy is the case of "Gilbert v. Sykes." This case is to be found in the 16th volume of East's Reports, and bears the following marginal note—"A wager by which the defendant received from the plaintiff 100 guineas on the 31st of May, 1802, in consideration of paying the plaintiff a guinea a day as long as Napoleon Bonaparte (then First Consul of the Republic) should live, which bet arose out of a conversation upon the probability of his coming to a violent death by assassination or otherwise, is void on the grounds of immorality and impolicy."

Lord Ellenborough, in his judgment, comments, on the one hand, on the adverse interest which the loss of an annuity of 365 guineas a year, dependent upon the French ruler's life, might arouse in the mind of a subject of this country to the performance of his duty in case of an invasion by that ruler; and, on the other hand, upon the temptation to encourage so foul a crime as assassination, or, at all events, to countenance the idea of it. And he says, "Is it to be allowed to a subject to say that the moral duties which bind man to man are in no hazard of being neglected when put in competition with individual interest?"

This general objection, sir, I think, may well be applied to the case before us. As I think you said in your article of this morning, a soldier of high rank in the service has in some measure in his own power means of provocation and opportunities of giving offence, which might be made matters of excuse for that very attempt at an invasion which is the subject of his bet. He has no right to put himself before the public in such a position as to make it possible that the faintest shade of such a suspicion should attach to him; and however upright, highminded, and honorable (as, thank God, we know them to be) our soldiers are, it is not the less public policy and public duty to restrain them from placing themselves wantonly in the way of temptation. It is not to the public advantage that any subject, be he civil or military, should have a large direct pecuniary interest in the invasion of his country being attempted.

There is another case of still closer analogy, in which, although no judgment was given, the majority of the judges were against the validity of the wager. It is that of "Forster v. Thackeray," cited in "Allen v. Hearn," 1 Term Reports. That was "a wager that war would be declared against France within three months. The opinion of the twelve judges was taken on the point whether the wager were void. The Courts of B. R. and C. P. were of opinion that it was, and the Court of Exchequer contra. No judgment was given."

Such wagers, then, appear to have been at one time prohibited by a penalty, and if, when occurring after that prohibition was removed, they were not always put a stop to, they were, at least, always questioned, and mostly discouraged.

I am, Sir, yours,
A BARRISTER.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Observer objects to the title Reverend being applied to women. He says:—

"Where is the scriptural or ecclesiastical authority for licensing and ordaining women to preach the gospel? I have endeavored to examine the Bible prayerfully on this subject; I can find no authority or warrant for any such order of ministers or bishops; and, as far as I have examined ecclesiastical history, I still remain in the dark. I need more information, before I can fellowship any such order of licentiate, ministers, or bishops. It causes me to feel very unpleasant when I meet with such characters."

The Observer adds: "We are not enough in advance of our friend to give him any information. But there is one of the qualifications of the approved bishop, enumerated by Paul, which we do not see how these feminine licentiates are to acquire—viz., that a 'bishop must be the husband of one wife.'" We fear this text was not duly considered by the association that licensed the candidates referred to.—Er. Post.

AN EVENING CONTEMPLATION IN A COLLEGE.

BY JOHN DUNCOMBE.

THE curfew tolls the hour of closing gates ;
With jarring sound the porter turns the key,
Then in his dreary mansion slumbering waits,
And slowly, sternly, quits it, though for me.

Now shine the spires beneath the paly moon,
And through the cloisters peace and silence reign ;

Save where some fiddler scrapes a drowsy tune,
Or copious bowls inspire a jovial strain ;

Save that in yonder cobweb-mantled room,
Where sleeps a student in profound repose, Oppressed with ale, wide echoes through the gloom
The droning music of his vocal nose.

Within those walls, where through the glimmering shade

Appear the pamphlets in a mouldering heap,
Each in his narrow bed till morning laid,
The peaceful fellows of the college sleep.

The tinkling bell proclaiming early prayers,
The noisy servants rattling o'er their head,
The calls of business, and domestic cares,
Ne'er rouse these sleepers from their downy bed.

No chatting females crowd their social fire,
No dread have they of discord and of strife,
Unknown the names of husband and of sire,
Unfelt the plagues of matrimonial life.

Oft have they basked beneath the sunny walls,
Oft have the benches bowed beneath their weight ;

CCCLXVI. LIVING AGE. VOL. I. 13

How jocund are their looks when dinner calls !
How smoke the outlets on their crowded plate !

Oh ! let not Temperance, too disdainful, hear
How long their feasts, how long their dinners, last :

Nor let the fair, with a contemptuous sneer,
On these unmarried men reflections cast !

The splendid fortune, and the beauteous face
(Themselves confess it, and their sires bemoan)
Too soon are caught by scarlet and by lace ;
These sons of science shine in black alone.

Forgive, ye fair, th' involuntary fault,
If these no feats of gayety display,
Where through proud Ranelagh's wide-echoing vault
Melodious Frasi trills her quavering lay.

Say, is the sword well suited to the band ?
Does 'broidered coat agree with sable gown ?
Can Mechlin laces shade a churchman's hand ?
Or Learning's votaries ape the beaux of town ?

Perhaps in these time-tottering walls reside
Some who were once the darlings of the fair,
Some who of old could tastes and fashions guide,
Control the manager, and awe the player.

But Science now has filled their vacant mind
With Rome's rich spoils, and Truth's exalted views,
Fired them with transports of a nobler kind,
And bade them slight all females — but the muse.

Full many a lark, high towering to the sky Unheard, unheeded, greets the approach of
light ;
Full many a star, unseen by mortal eye,
With twinkling lustre glimmers through the night.

Some future Herring, who, with dauntless breast,
 Rebellion's torrent shall, like him, oppose,
 Some mute, unconscious Hardwicke here may rest,

Some Pelham dreadful to his country's foes,
 From prince and people to command applause,
 'Midst ermined peers to guide the high debate,
 To shield Britannia's and Religion's laws,
 And steer with steady course the helm of state,

Fate yet forbids ; nor circumscribes alone
 Their growing virtues, but their crimes confines,

Forbids in Freedom's veil to insult the throne,
 Beneath her masque to hide the worst designs ;

To fill the madding crowd's perverted mind,
 With "pensions, taxes, marriages, and Jews,"
 Or shut the gates of heaven on lost mankind,
 And wrest their darling hopes, their future views.

Far from the giddy town's tumultuous strife,
 Their wishes yet have never learned to stray ;
 Content and happy in a single life,
 They keep the noiseless tenor of their way.

E'en now, their books from cobwebs to protect,
 Inclosed by doors of glass in Doric style,
 On polished pillars raised with bronzes deckt,
 They claim the passing tribute of a smile :

Oft are the authors' names, though richly bound,
 Misspelt by blundering binders' want of care,
 And many a catalogue is strewed around,
 To tell the admiring guest what books are there.

For who, to thoughtless ignorance a prey,
 Neglects to hold short dalliance with a book ?
 Who there but wishes to prolong his stay,
 And on those cases casts a lingering look ?

Reports attract the Lawyer's parting eyes,
 Novels Lord Fopling and Sir Plume require,
 For Songs and Plays the voice of Beauty cries,
 And Sense and Nature Grandison desire.

For thee, who, mindful of thy loved compeers,
 Dost in these lines their artless tale relate,
 If chance, with prying search, in future years,
 Some antiquarian should inquire thy fate ;

Haply some friend may shake his hoary head,
 And say, " Each morn unchilled by frosts he ran,

With those ungartered o'er yon turfy bed,
 To reach the chapel ere the psalms began ;

" There, in the arms of that lethargic chair,
 Which rears its old moth-eaten back so high,
 At noon he quaffed three glasses to the fair,
 And pored upon the news with curious eye :

" Now by the fire engaged in serious talk,
 Or mirthful converse would he loitering stand,
 Then in the garden chose a sunny walk,
 Or launched the polished bowl with steady hand.

" One morn we missed him at the hour of prayer,
 Nor in the hall, nor on his favorite green ;
 Another came ; nor yet within the chair,
 Nor yet at bowls or chapel was he seen.

" The next we heard that in a neighboring shire,
 That day to church he led a blushing bride,
 A nymph whose snowy vest and maiden fear
 Improved her beauty while the knot was tied.

" Now, by his patron's bounteous care removed,
 He roves enraptured through the fields of Kent,
 Yet, ever mindful of the place he loved,
 Read here the letter which he lately sent."

THE LETTER.

In rural innocence secure I dwell,
 Alike to fortune and to fame unknown ;
 Approving conscience cheers my humble cell,
 And social quiet marks me for her own.

Next to the blessings of religious truth,
 Two gifts my endless gratitude engage,
 A wife — the jey and transport of my youth,
 Now with a son — the comfort of my age.

Seek not to draw me from this kind retreat,
 In loftier spheres unfit, untaught to move,
 Content with calm domestic life, where meet
 The sweets of friendship and the smiles of love.

SIBERIAN COLD.—A traveller in Siberia during the winter is so enveloped in furs, that he can scarcely move ; and, under the thick fur hood, which is fastened to the bear-skin collar, and covers the whole face, one can only draw in, as it were, by stealth, a little of the external air, which is so keen that it causes a very peculiar and painful feeling in the throat and lungs. The distance from one halting-place to another takes about ten hours, during which time the traveller must always continue on horseback, as the cumbersome dress makes it insupportable to wade through the snow. The poor horses suffer at least as much as their riders, for, besides the general effect of the cold, they are tormented by ice forming in their nostrils, and stopping their breathing. When they intamate this by a distressed snort, and a convulsive shaking of the head, the driver relieves them by taking out the piece of ice, to save them from being suffocated. When the icy ground is not covered by snow, their hoofs often burst from the effects of the cold.

The caravan is always surrounded by a thick cloud of vapor ; it is not only living bodies which produce this effect, but even the snow smokes. These evaporations are instantly changed into millions of needles of ice, which fill the air, and cause a constant slight noise, resembling the sound of torn satin or thick silk. Even the reindeer seeks the forest to protect himself from the intensity of the cold. In the Tundras, where there is no shelter to be found, the whole herd crowd together as close as possible, to gain a little warmth from each other, and may be seen standing in this way quite motionless. Only the dark bird of winter, the raven, still cleaves the icy air with slow and heavy wing, leaving behind him a long line of thin vapor, marking the track of his solitary flight.

1. Poesie Complete di Giuseppe Giusti. Bastia. 1849.
2. Giuseppe Giusti. Cenni di P.L.D.E. Croce di Savoia.

THE writings of the Tuscan poet whose name we have placed at the head of this article are not generally known in England, even among the readers of Italian. To many of our readers we can believe that the very name is not equally familiar with that of authors in every respect his inferior; but in Italy the reputation of Giusti is great and universal. No modern writer has more deeply impressed his countrymen. Believing that the impression is just and will be permanent, we are anxious to contribute something towards making known to English readers the name at least, and if possible something of the peculiar merit and style, of a most genuine Italian poet.

By one of those general theories to which many speculators have a fancy for adapting facts, it has been maintained that every great and marked era in the life of a nation will have its great writer or set of writers, to inspire, to guide, or to celebrate, its movement. Either the great man creates the great impulse, or the great impulse stirs up and discovers to the world the great man. We will not discuss this theory: it is sufficient to say, as illustrating the light in which Giusti is regarded by his countrymen, that the recent Italian movement claims him as its poet. Nor is the claim unfounded. There can be no doubt that posterity, as well as his countrymen and contemporaries, will connect the name of Giusti with that movement in an especial sense, and more than that of any other poet.

As a social and political satirist, he, for a series of years, roused and directed indignation against those oppressions, corruptions, and crimes, which thousands of true and brave Italians, under, alas! more than one banner, struggled and died in the field to overthrow.

His countrymen may overrate the immediate consequences upon action of these utterances, but we cannot be mistaken in regarding them upon their authority as exponents, stimulants, and in part creators, of a general feeling. In that view alone they would be important enough to merit examination. Even for those who believe that the present re-established tyrannies of Italy are to be permanent, these poems should have a historic interest, as illustrating the tone of mind which prompted the struggle. For those who still believe that Italy has a future, the words of Giusti retain a deeper interest. The indignation is still merited, and the anticipations are not falsified; they are but prophecies of which the fulfilment is deferred.

The following passage of Gualterio will illustrate the position and character of Giusti among contemporary authors. The historian is tracing the causes of the Italian movement, and among its causes, designating the men who did most to originate it. From prose writers, Gioberti, Balbo, D'Azeglio, and others, he passes to the poets; and naming first the illustrious veteran Niccolini, author of Arnaldo di Brescia, he distinguishes four others from the mass, Giuseppe Giusti, Toscano; Giovanni Prato, Veneto; Gabriello Roselli, Napolitano; Giovanni Berchet, Lombardo. He then goes on:—

Giuseppe Giusti was endowed by nature with that uncommon insight which dissects the thoughts, opinions, bias, manners, lives, and hearts of men, and the forms and substance of society; which distinguishes truth from falsehood, possibility from chimera; and combats all exaggerations, knowing the weak point of each, and reducing it to its natural proportions, so as to annihilate it by making it ridiculous instead of sublime, as it had appeared to common eyes. Never was a sharper assailant of tyranny and its slaves or interested sycophants. No one with equal force or greater truth scourged that herd which supported the relics of the old system, only because no ray of hope shone for them in the new; no one struck so deeply at the ignorance of the nobility, the pride of upstarts, or the follies of the populace. His sternness towards princes and men in power gave him the reputation of a republican in the sense now attached to the word:—i. e., a lover of the most comprehensive forms of democracy, and the demagogues hoped to see arise in him at the full time a zealous tribune. These, however, while pulling down the high, habitually flatter the low; and them Giusti never flattered; he held up to scorn and condemnation the weakness of the one side, as he did the insolence of the other. Italy was the end of every thought with him, and dear above all, and he was truly grieved to see the divisions of parties which arose before the revolution, and foretold to an observant eye the dissensions to come.

He was more prone to faith than to illusions; I mean, that he had greater trust in principle than in men, of whom he knew thoroughly the defects and weaknesses; yet he was not what you would call a pessimist, nor even a political exclusive. His verses will live as the best picture of the manners of his times; of the political passions, and, so to speak, the inflammatory humors, of the society in which he moved. The setts (secret societies) and their followers he hated, hoping no good from them, but only misfortune for the country. He knew intuitively their incapacity to produce anything, and painted them truly, when he called them mules for their obstinacy and barrenness.

His satire never descended to personalities, except when aimed at the occupants of high places, and then not from envy of their power, but so far as their public station brought them within the jurisdiction of general criticism. . . . His verses aided not a little in preparing the Italian movement, and became popular in spite of the censorship. Of this there were proofs even in the bosom of Lombardy, notwithstanding the anxious precautions of the Austrian police. . . . His death was not one of the least misfortunes which accompanied or followed close upon the memorable defeat of Italy. — Gualterio, part ii., chap. 44.

This sketch, which many of his admirers would consider as scarcely doing justice to the Tuscan poet, will give the English reader an idea of his general scope and characteristic qualities.

It is not, however, very easy to classify him as a writer, or to give a notion of his poems by description or designation. When their popularity as circulated in manuscript, the publication of the foreign spurious editions, and some relaxation of the rules in the censorship, led him first to print a collection, he gave them no other than the modest name of "Verses." We may call them lyrical satires.

The class to which these poems belong is one which has not, at least of late years, been common in England. Attempts, indeed, have not been wanting, but some time has passed since real poetic genius has cared to manifest itself in this form. An admirable facility and humor characterize the versified politics of the author of the Two-penny Post Bag, and some of these assume the lyric form; but they do not come up to the idea of lyrical nature, either in depth of feeling, in passion, in ironic force, or in beauty. The only political verses which have of late years excited much attention, were those contributed to the cause of disorder by the patriots of the Nation. Like their authors, these poems met with somewhat more indulgence than they merited. They were indifferent enough, though decidedly more successful than the rebellion to which they incited. In fact, in a really free country, all the multiplied shapes of free discussion supersede the necessity, without exactly performing the functions of a satirical poet. A song can be remembered and can circulate even where the censorship leaves blanks in the journal, or where a stricter inspection prohibits not only speech, but even such evidence of silenced speech. There is indeed a degree of tyranny, under which verse and prose, the speech of the debates, and the mot of the saloons, are alike silenced by an impartial because all-reaching terrorism. But the state of things in which society is, and the leading article is not, has often been regarded as the very state in which the epigram of conversation is most in demand, and consequently most fully supplied. The commercial principle is verified even in the airy manufacture of witticisms, and a similar principle may in some degree apply to the yet subtler essence of poetry. A poet, indeed, is born, and it is fortunately as impossible as it would be undesirable, to prescribe rules for the birth of this or that kind of poet or poetry. The spirit does not always come when it is called for; you cannot create it by calling; but if it is there, it is the more likely to come because it is called for.

Accordingly, it is not in England that we can look for any parallel to Giusti in any writings which may seem, by comparison, to illustrate his style and character as a poet. The two contemporary writers who most nearly resemble him, are Béranger in France, and Heine in Germany. To Béranger in particular he has been compared, not only as to a similar writer, but as to his prototype and model. Yet he would form a most incorrect conception of Giusti who should attempt to create one to himself out of his recollections of Béranger or of Heine. These names are mentioned, not so much to illustrate his individual character as to express the class to which he belongs. Of the two, widely as they differ, he approaches more nearly in form and style to Béranger; yet no view can be more incorrect than that which regards him as having made the French poet his model. Italian critics disclaim even the similarity; we concur with them in rejecting altogether the idea of plagiarism or copying. Giusti is thoroughly Italian; far too emphatically Italian to be regarded as an Italianized Béranger. He had undoubtedly read Béranger; and the influence of a great contemporary writer is necessarily felt more or less by men of genius, and sometimes manifested in their works. It will be most directly and naturally displayed, of course, by those whom similarity of genius or circumstances directs into the same line of composition, unless they should, as is sometimes the case, studiously avoid any likeness, however natural, and so perhaps sacrifice some real beauty to the possible suspicion of plagiarism. To this extent, and no more, does Giusti remind us of Béranger. The two have indeed common to them this consequence of their genuine worth as poets — that many of their simplest verses, though devoted only to subjects of contemporary interest, will outlive the more ambitious efforts on higher themes of most or all their poetic rivals. But Béranger in no way bears to Giusti the relation of the master in a school in which Giusti is a pupil.

The real master, the constant study, we will not say the model, of the Tuscan poet, was a far greater than Béranger; the bitterness of political satirists, the greatest perhaps, save one, of European poets — the Florentine Dante.

We shall not be misunderstood as advancing for him a claim which he would have himself treated as sacrilege — a claim to any station on that level, where the voice of mankind has throned almost unapproached L'Altissimo Poeta. But this much may be truly said, that the devoted student of Dante was a learner from Dante; and in particular that he had learnt from him that great merit, almost lost among his countrymen of modern times — the merit of condensation. In him, more than in any recent Italian writer, do we find the short description, which, as it were, emphatically outlives the object, the single line which brands, the single indelible epithet which recalls, and seems to comprise, the character.

It must not, however, be supposed that Giusti is a personal satirist. His satire, as is observed by Gualterio, in the passage which we have quoted, never assailed individuals, except such as by their high place were necessarily public characters, and therefore proper objects for criticism. And “to them, as to the people, he was more liberal of censure than of praise.” Let these italicized words be noted. Giusti, as we shall hereafter see more fully, flattered no one. The triumph of the popular cause raised up for him no idol. A demagogue in his eyes might be as hateful as a vigorous tyrant, as ridiculous as an effete despot, and would meet with similar or sharper treatment.

His poetry, simple and even severe in its form, yet constructed with the most careful selection of words and attention to versification, assuming, when possible, the plainest and most popular expressions of the Tuscan dialect, condensed, vivid, familiar, was, in the strongest sense of the word, original. The novelty of the means which he employed consistently enforced the directly practical character of his object. Attacking falsehood and conventions, he used no conventional language. In the strongest language of common life, he told his countrymen how base, how hateful, was much of the life around them. Perhaps we might truly describe him by saying that very few poets have been less of “versifiers.” Nothing is ever put in for mere ornament; the exact words are used for the exact thought; thought and language are not separable; they are interfused and one. This union in its various degrees characterizes all poetry worth the name; in perfection, it is found only in the highest; its presence, or absence, is the easiest and most infallible test by which to distinguish versified commonplace from genuine poetry; it is certainly among the prominent characteristics of Giusti. He was not a careless writer, because he was natural; he was a consummate, all the more because not a conventional, artist.

Holding that Italian had been corrupted by recent writers through the intermixture of foreign terms, he used, whenever it was possible, the spoken or vernacular phrase and idiom in preference to book language. “Others,” as he said, “put on their dress coats whenever they sit down to write; I take off my frock coat and put on a blouse.” His consequently frequent use of purely Tuscan words and idioms, combined with the necessarily allusive nature of satirical writing, makes him for foreign readers a singularly difficult author. This character is the main cause of the hitherto limited circulation of his works in England; and it will probably continue to prevent them from becoming, so to speak, popular out of Italy. Of the leading peculiarity of his style of thought, the deep seriousness which underlies his hearty ridicule, his biographer gives, in a passage which we translate, perhaps as good an idea as can be given by mere description.

Giusti laughs indeed, and that so powerfully, that woe be to him who is smitten by that immortal ridicule; but in the midst of the song rushing clothed in gladness from the soul of the poet, ever and anon one word of profound melancholy slips involuntarily over the chords of his lyre, and draws a momentary veil of sadness over the brilliant gleam of his smile, with such effect that the reader, utterly lost in the fresh sentiment which he experiences, without being able to explain it to himself, can only exclaim, in this intoxication of his feelings, That is sublime! Giusti weeps and laughs at once; his smile is born of his melancholy; and through that alone can it be explained and rendered intelligible and plain.

All earnest irony is born of this conflict of deep feelings; the smile may in part express contempt perhaps, or a sense of the vanity of things, but the root of it is sadness and indignation which can find no adequate direct expression. In his own beautiful words —

In quanta guerra di pensier mi pone
Questo che par sorriso ed è dolore!

It was not among mere laughers that Giusti sought his audience; he wished them to be more fit, though they might therefore be few. “If your tendency is only to amusement,” he says to his reader, in a short and most characteristic preface to one edition of his works, “do not go beyond this page; for a laugh springing from melancholy might possibly stick in your throat; and I should be sorry for that, both on your account and my own.”

This depth of feeling it was, which at once sharpened the edge of that trenchant ridicule, and raised the poet into the element of true lyric passion. This, combined with the singular force of his expressions and brief vividness of his imagery, renders Giusti not less superior to all modern Italian writers as a lyric poet, than he is unique as a satirist : if we are not to admit one doubtful exception in the single poem " Il Cinque Maggio."

It will be seen, from what has been said, how intimately connected are the peculiar character of this poet and the circumstances of his time. The more naturally will our notice of his works blend itself with some account of his life, and of the Italy in which he was born. For the former the biography named at the head of our article furnishes some, though hardly satisfactory, materials.

It is somewhat meagre as to facts, and deficient in traits or anecdotes, and in those life-like touches which bring in real presence the subject of a narrative before us, and make us know the man, or at least form the idea of him, as he lives in the memory of his friends. He was born in May, 1809, at a castle in the Val di Nievole, near the high road from Florence to Pescia, with which place his family were connected as rich proprietors. Among them was at least one man of considerable eminence — his grandfather Giuseppe Giusti, the friend and minister of justice to the reforming Archduke Leopold, one of the princes who, at the head of small states, have achieved something like greatness.

We catch glimpses of a lively, clever, spirited boy, difficult to manage, " di spirito irrequieto e vivacissimo," growing happily up into youth ; learning not too much of Latin, and no Greek — a neglect of opportunities which (he it observed) he afterwards regretted, and tried to repair by earnest study of the Latin classics. Finally, he is sent to the University of Pisa with the object of studying law — an object which, in his case, as in that of other Italian poets, from the time of Petrarca downwards, was destined to merge in other aspirations. He was, we fear, no very steady student of the Pandects ; he " crammed" (" beccava," is his own word, as good an Italian as English college-phrase) for his examination in a fortnight. But he has left us in the verses entitled " Memorie di Pisa," those happy touches and records of his college life, which prove that to him, as to many others, its indirect were worth more than its direct influences. Every one who has himself been a collegian, must read these verses with a pleasure more than half melancholy. " I too was once in Arcadia." There is a deep truth and tenderness in the tone in which Giusti recalls those four happy years spent without care ; the days, the nights, " smoked away" in free gladness, in laughter, in uninterrupted talk, the aspirations, the free, open-hearted converse, as it was then, of some who are not now disguised as formal worldlings ; all the delights of that life, whether at Cambridge or at Pisa, which comes not again. All that was to be had, all that was to be enjoyed from converse with the world around him, Giusti made his own ; and if he somewhat neglected the Pandects, he familiarized himself with the classical writers whose value he was now more capable of appreciating. Virgil, Horace, and Dante were his most familiar studies. After the usual course, he left Pisa, and settled himself in the capital, Florence, as a law-student in the chambers of Capoquidi, a noted advocate, since Minister of Grace and Justice.

One can fancy that his relations hoped to see another Giuseppe Giusti great in jurisprudence, under another Leopold ; but he had a different destiny before him. We can suppose him entering into the world with at least a fair allowance of the common youthful disposition to quarrel with much of its cold formalism and smooth-faced quackery. And the Italian world, as he saw it, contained more than the ordinary proportion of iniquities against which such a spirit could not but rebel. Of the Italy of Giusti's opening manhood — the Italy of Gregory XVI. — so much has lately been said, that it is unnecessary to dwell more than summarily on the subject now.

The great wave of the French revolution passed over Italy as over the rest of Europe, burying the old landmarks. It subsided, and they generally reappeared, so far as territorial divisions were concerned. The shadow of a King of Rome vanished, and the States of the Church passed again under the worst of human governments. The Austrians held Lombardy, with the addition of Venice ; in several other states, modified by a certain amount of cutting and carving, the old Houses reentered untaught and unimproved. The people had not, any more than their rulers, learnt to correct some of their most characteristic faults ; but the great deluge had destroyed much, and had left something behind it. The Italians had borne their share in historic events, if not as freemen, yet as the subjects of an energetic will. They had shown that under good leading they could be good soldiers ; and they saw, with the feeling which might be expected, that the first act of liberated Europe was to fling them back into the old dull servitude. They remonstrated vainly : they acquiesced in a resistless necessity. But, from 1815 onwards, ideas not conducive to the permanence of such governments as Italy saw restored, were fermenting in many minds. On the other hand, the weakest and worst of the restored governments could adopt so much of modern progress as consisted in a keener and more extensive spy-system, and in a greatly increased political activity of the police. The old veneration, even the old acquiescence, were gone, mutual distrust and hatred remained. Bad governors and disaffected subjects were the staple of the Peninsula.

In 1820, as in 1830, attempts were made in various States of Italy to right themselves against their governments. These movements, in general the original work of "sects," or secret societies, met, and indeed merited, far less universal response from the people than the movement of 1848; neither had the Italians, as a mass, been familiarized then, as now, with the ideas of freedom. Still they were, to a certain extent, successful. Naples and the Romagna showed themselves at least able to obtain some concessions against their governments, and possibly to maintain them, had the matter been left to themselves, as in mere justice it ought to have been. But Austria, encamped in Lombardy, cannot afford to be just, and therefore Austria stepped in. She, "the sword, of which the Pope is the cross," once and again struck down Italian freedom. She sanctioned, by restoring, the local tyrannies; she justly identified her name with the great or petty oppressions she upheld. The subjects submitted because they could not resist; except in the crowd of officials, the governments had no supporters, no real friends. All that authority and power of government which, in a well-arranged community, men have a natural tendency to respect and venerate, became included for the educated Italian in two words of bitter hatred and contempt. At home was the "birro," and over the frontier was the "Tedesco." To those alone who forget what Austria has done, in various instances, for Italy, can the now universal anti-Austrian sentiment appear unfounded or unreasonable. The bare statement of historical facts conveys a charge which admits of no answer.

Those English readers who wish to see the indictment, article by article, drawn and served up with irresistible force, will find the task performed for them in Mazzini's celebrated letter to Sir James Graham; and will find, too, that, on this point at least, the republican and the constitutionalist are one. According to Gualterio, and all other Italian writers, it was not until after 1830 that the idea of independence took any real hold, that is, not until after it had been practically found that Austrian rule in Lombardy meant force at hand to overwhelm any effort at improving the local governments. The cry of "Independence" in Italy was anything but a factitious clamor, a fancy got up by bookmen; it was the expression of a want, taught by a bitter experience. Unfortunately, the apprehension of a truth does not necessarily give the strength or virtue required to put it into practice. That takes a further schooling; but that, too, may be perfected with time.

In the general quiescence of the Peninsula between 1830 and 1845, an interval was given to its rulers which might have been a precious one. How they used it, not to remove, but to aggravate, the causes of complaint, all readers of Farini know. They too know that the grotesque absurdities and exceeding pettinesses of such misgovernment were almost as marked as its iniquities. The social and political fabric was something, as Giusti's biographer says, with some point, between a babyhouse and a bastille. On this state of things Giusti's Italian critics picture him to us as looking with deliberate regard. He saw, say they, that it was irremediable, except by destruction, and accepting the principle, "Destroy in order to rebuild," he looked round for a weapon to aid in the work of overthrowing, and found one which he adapted carefully to that end, in his peculiar form of satire.

No man, we may observe, really lays out his career for himself as those who, after the events, speculate on his life, lay it out for him. Nor did Giusti, probably, more than others, foresee from the beginning, and resolve upon the course in which circumstances and his genius conducted him. The young student of Pisa did not say to himself, "I will be what Niccolini is not, what Farini is not; I will be, and that in a new and untried way, the poet of my generation, the voice of liberal Italy." But he felt towards the evil which he saw as Dante felt, and as all men ought to feel, but as too many of the countrymen of Dante have yet to learn to feel; that is, as towards a thing which ought to be attacked and destroyed; and that instinct of truth, that preference for reality over convention which is one of the indications of a masculine genius, led him, when he wished to write on modern politics, to do so directly and without disguise. He did not attempt to remove his subject to a distance, either of place or time; he did not attempt to idealize it. Thus he has not produced an Arnaldo di Brescia; but he has produced, in the "Coronation," in "Gingellino," in the "Terra dei Morti," verses which will outlast and outweigh a score of Arnaldos.

Among the great variety of Giusti's compositions, we are necessarily led to select, for more special notice, such as from the nature of the subject have the most general interest, and are most calculated for appreciation by others than the countrymen of the writer. Our attention will be thus directed rather to the properly political than to the social specimens of his satire. Emphatically characteristic, and invaluable alike as poems and as pictures of society as are, for instance, "I Brindisi" and "La Scritta," they appeal less feelingly and immediately to transalpine readers than do the odes dealing with the wider events and passions which create the history of the world.

Reluctantly, therefore, with these few words of commendation and apology to Italians, who might otherwise think that one of their poet's varieties had escaped due recognition, we pass by the poems of the social class, although they combine a curious accuracy of costume and interior — painting with bursts of high lyrical tone, and a grave, bitter, Dantesque irony. One especial example only of the last quality we must name in the concluding passage of the "Scritta," where the profligate and ruined noble, who has just signed the marriage contract (scritta) with the uninviting daughter of the low-born usurer, while half disposed to repent of and recede from the bargain which he has made of titles against gold, falls into a dream, in which he sees his own family tree, and far back in the middle ages its real founder, a usurer of the lowest and vilest kind, surpassing in iniquity and harshness his destined father-in-law, by far more than all the superiority of old times over new. This worthy describes, in verses which really read like a portion of a suppressed canto of the Inferno devoted to plebeian iniquities and punishments, what he was, through what stupendous deeds of cheating and extortion he rose from vile need to viler wealth, and how his descendants bought from a ducal or vice-regal tyrant the quarters which, through a line of slothful profligates, have come down to their worthy representative, the dreamer. The final moral, of course, is rather of the cynical than the sentimental kind. "Take her, blockhead that you are, and be thankful; she is as good as you any day."

Perchi ti penti, o bestia cortigiana?
Prendi dell' usurier, prendi la figlia,
Che siam tutti d'un pelo e d'una lana.

The powers of Giusti as a writer of occasional verses were naturally known to his friends both at the university and in the capital, long before he had attained the age of six and twenty. The verses, however, on the death of the Emperor Francis, which took place in 1845, appear to have been the first of his political compositions generally circulated with a certain restricted publicity, not in print, but in manuscript. They are those entitled, from the two commencing words, "Dies Irae." In spite of the solemn name and introduction, this poem is by no means of a dirgelike or wailing, much less of a panegyric character. It is bitter and strong enough, conveying, in language neither very courtly nor very reverent, the various sentiments with which different individuals and classes might be expected to receive the dispensation. Kings and princes mourn, at least with their hats; court, army, church, and police are ready for a new oath; the court orator (an Italian is named) bleats out his panegyric; but those rascals, the Carbonari, exult — nor does the Pole weep for the death of the Cossack's ally:

But the greedy Scythian savage
Turns an eye of hungry ravage
On the gorgeous obsequies;
As a gaunt hyena prowling
Scents afar, with long-drawn howling,
Where a brother's carcass lies.

The signs of the times are shortly reviewed, as favorable to freedom. England has her share; she is turning out her tories.

Sir John Bull, propagatore
Delle macchine a vapore,
Manda i tory a rotoli.

From an anticipation in this tone, half ironic, of a liberal millennium over the world, the poet passes to the sad and true conclusion: "For us Italians nothing is changed, except the name of our master; nothing new, except the personal identity of the wearer of the crown." A conclusion clenchingly expressed by a reference to the habitual form of announcement that Pope has succeeded Pope in the immutable sovereignty of St. Peter.

Ma silenzio, odo il cannone —
Non è nulla — altro Padrone — Habemus Pontificem.

This, though far from equal to many of his later poems, contains lines not unworthy of being ranked with them. But the sensation which it produced is in part to be attributed to the novel diction and style in which the unknown author presented to his countrymen his thoughts on political matters. Here was a poem on modern politics, calling things and persons by their every-day names; not presenting in a scholar-like disguise, only to be penetrated by the aid of some scholarship and historical knowledge, the hopes and fears of the nineteenth century, under names and costumes borrowed from the thirteenth or sixteenth, but speaking of contemporary events in contemporary language. The style, moreover, was studious as little of ornament as of disguise, plain, short, strong, and emphatically popular; ironical, rather than abusive; brief and bitter, rather than eloquent and prolix; condensing, not expanding passion. In all these respects the verses differed from what Italians were used to meet with; and we can guess, without being told it, the kind of timid admiration, the hesitating recognition, both of the patriotism and the poetry, with which the first verses of Giusti were received by the literary circles of Italy, the followers of Niccolini and Manzoni. It was not long, however, before the claim of the poet to the attention of his countrymen was to be put forth in a stronger and more undeniable form.

The Stivale, or "Boot," was among those which attracted most early attention. It is a humorous and pointed sketch of the fortunes of Italy. The poor boot relates how it has passed from leg to leg, through a series of larcenous wearers; how much misuse, patching, unprofitable wear and tear it has undergone in the service of these unrighteous owners.

Worst of all are the priests, who have worn me spitefully and without discretion; and great is my grudge at certain blockheads of poets who have countenanced their manner of walk; as if the decretals did not especially forbid their wearing boots (i. e., possession of temporal dominion). Wretched, worm-eaten, mouldy as I am, long I needed some fitting leg to wear me and have right done to me:

No German's leg or Frenchman's — understand — I would be worn by one of my own land.

Once there was a great chief, "un certo Sere," who might have boasted that he had in me the strongest and best boot within the world's map; if he had not been so bent on rambling too far; as he would do,* until —

Alas! that snow-storm caught him far astray,
And froze his limbs, and stopped his walk midway.

The expense of mending me will be great; the repair must be total; for Heaven's sake take care to whom you entrust it, not as now, to artists who work into it all manner of colors; Imperial, Neapolitan, &c.

And look — this bit of blue — how ill it matches
With red-and-white, and black-and-yellow there; I'm a mere Harlequin of shreds and patches;
If you would really put me in repair,
Make me, with loving zeal and sense to aid,
All of one piece and one prevailing shade.

In that case it is finely intimated that the kick of the boot will be a serious matter to any insolent provoker of the same.

We have named the Boot, because with Italians generally it appears to be a favorite. There are intrinsic defects in an allegory of this nature, which perhaps, rather than any want of skill in the execution, prevent our rating it very high among Giusti's poems. Far superior to it, and inferior to nothing with which it can be compared, is another poem, of we believe about the same date, the "Girella." The name, and the dedication, "To the blessed soul of Signor Talleyrand," explain the subject of this singular, most effective, and most bitter satire. It is a sketch, as proceeding from his own mouth, in an after-dinner song, when the heart was opened by wine, of the ideal "Girella" or weathercock of modern politics on a grand scale. Those to whom Giusti is a sealed book, must imagine to themselves such a string as never was put together before of creeds and causes, and leaders, all faithfully followed while strong, all in turn betrayed when weak; of professions made, recanted, and remade, with equal satisfaction and profit; in fine, of all the possible proteiform transformations of an absolute and impartial egotism, true to itself always, and to no thing or person else in the world.

We dare not attempt to translate it; no translation could give even a faint reflection of the force and simplicity of the short, sharp, pointed, stinging verses, in which is described the career of the alternate enthusiast of the revolution, and the loyalist of the restoration, the irreligious church-robber, the pious Christian, the impartial eulogist of "Pitt, Robespierre, Napoleone, Pio Sesto e Settimo, Murat, Fra Diavolo, Il Re Nasone, Mosca e Marengo:" in fine, the man who, come what will, falls ever on his legs, and upright.

Mangiando i frutti
Del mal di tutti.

Every country has had its Vicars of Bray, and celebrated them probably in some form or other, but this poem is the perfection of its kind. It is not to be taken as personal, beyond what is necessarily implied in its dedication to the most notoriously versatile of modern politicians. It would be equally good were the absolute consistency of Prince Talleyrand, through the score of governments which he served, demonstrated and admitted; or had he never existed. It is not a satire on an eminent Frenchman, it is a passionate address to the countrymen and contemporaries of the writer, against the prevalent vices of the age, cold indifference to principle, and the worship of selfish gain. Even its moral is more direct than that of most satires, and Giusti, had he written the "Girella" only, would have stood as a teacher above many lengthier moralists. A figure, self-clothed with the bitterest contempt and ridicule, is held up by the poet to his hearers, addressing to the conscience of each some such appeal as the following: — "This, where truth and honor are ignored, and principle put aside from interest, this is success. Be base enough, wicked enough, unprincipled enough, and you too may succeed. Such is the world, and such is the time. But do you wish to succeed at the price of being like this?"

No country and no time is above the need of such lessons, but in this, as in other cases, Giusti wrote in the main for Italy. She too had — what misgoverned country has not! — no lack of minor "Girellas" (the waiters on Providence of ill-administered bureaucracies), whom this satire lashed in general, and the result is said by his, we fear, too sanguine biographer to have been a practical improvement; at any rate, he does a service now and hereafter, who makes us hate vice by making us see it as it is.

* Bonaparte he would set out, &c.

In a graver, though scarcely in truth more serious tone, is one of his most famous odes, that on the Coronation of the Emperor Ferdinand, in Milan, in the year 1838. The event itself, and the manner of its celebration, are sternly noted by the historian Gualterio, under a title appropriately coupling "La Corruzione Lombarda e l'Incoronazione." Amid a profuse expenditure caused by the rivalry of splendor between the Viennese court and the wealthy nobles of Milan, amid shows of every kind, military and civic, aided and colored by an exercise of cheap clemency, a kind of profitable frenzy of local loyalty, or at least what served for such, was got up for the time. Such stage effects of pompous worship, such effervescences of prostration before crowned or uncrowned tyrants, on whichever side of the Alps, whether at Milan or at Grenoble, are easily got up; and perhaps of all the forms of human baseness there is none which it is so hard for a sterner virtue to regard with forgiving charity. Giusti perhaps did not try to do so. With the oppressors he felt that he did well to be angry, even to death, and he would have made his countrymen feel with him. Accordingly, says Gualterio, "this delirium of the Milanese inspired Giuseppe Giusti with perhaps the noblest satire that ever flowed from that pen, alas! too soon lost to his country." In whatever Italian there existed a relic of the nobleness of the past, a smouldering hope for the future, his feelings, on viewing this combination of false splendor and real degradation, found a perfect utterance in these verses.

Of some part of the "Coronation" we have attempted to give an English version, in which, it is right to observe, the metre has not been exactly followed. In the original, the sketches of the various princes of Italy who are supposed to bow before the Imperial throne, are singularly pointed and condensed. Such lines as that which describes the King of Naples,

Il Lazzarone Paladino infermo, cling where they are thrown, and become proverbial. Mental character and outward form are seized and dashed off with one stroke. Every word hits, and every word enhances the effect of the others, and the emphatic exactness of the unflattering portrait. It will be seen that the sketch of Charles Albert naturally delineates that prince as he appeared to Italian liberals between 1830 and 1840; as the presumed betrayer of the liberal cause in 1820, earning his pardon from the Holy Alliance, first by serving it as a soldier in Spain at the storming of the Trocadero, and next by persecuting liberals at home. Charles Albert lived to merit and to receive from Giusti, as from other wise and good Italians, a different judgment. We are bound to note, since the historian Gualterio has thought it necessary to defend his hero the king against the implied charge of servility, that the poet's second-sight misled him when it showed the King of Sardinia bending before the Imperial footstool. Charles Albert actually absented himself from the coronation at Milan, a step of somewhat marked character, which attracted notice at the time. The commencement reminds us of one of the rough old wood-cut frontispieces so dear to childhood, representing a full parliament of the beasts, at the head of some of Æsop's fables.

THE CORONATION.

The Lion King, who keeps us slaves — to him
May God preserve sound stomach, claws, and limb:

The herd of meaner crowned ones — sleek, dissembling,

 Foxes and conies trembling —
Around him cluster, and with low-drooped locks,
Cry to the sovereign shearer of the flocks,
"We, Father, in thy name, at second hand,

 Will closely clip the land."
Lo, first to soil in dust his servile knees
The yellow conscience-jaundiced Piedmontese;
Who purged the short mistake that made him hero
So well at Trocadero.

O Carbonari, yours, ye knew him well,
Your Prince, who dragged you to the block, the cell,

He now maintains in the true king-like tone
The oaths of Twenty-one.

With trailing cloak behind sweeps blustering in
The feeble Lazzarone Paladin.

This year Palermo knew in him again
The old and cruel strain.

The satirist does not forget to notice in the case of the "Sacripant" of Naples, two characteristic accompaniments of Legitimist Absolutism, the martinet passion for drilling, and the popular piece of scandal which attributes to a "Zoccolante," or begging friar, the doubtful honor of a parental relation to the monarch.

What wouldst, King Sacripant, with arms and thunder?

With that great fist wouldst smite the heavens
asunder?

Have done, thou ape of heroes, in thy jowl

We read the friar-like soul.

The Tuscan Morpheus follows slack and slow,
With poppy-wreaths and lettuce on his brow,
Who in pursuit of immortality

Drains bogs and pockets dry.

With law and land statistics without number,
He lulls his languid people into slumber;
And when his grandsire most he imitates

Scrapes something from his States.

The comparative indulgence shown in the preceding stanzas to the well-meaning statistial and marsh-draining archduke, contrasts well with the grave and bitter censure bestowed on Maria Louisa of Parma, and with the light but exquisite felicity of the stroke with which is hit off the gay intruder amid serious despots, "Di Lucca il Protestante Don Giovanni." This, like the "Lazzarone-Paladin" above, recalls the comprehensive and exhaustive compound names given by Mirabeau — the "Grandison Cromwell," for instance, of which Mr. Carlyle truly says, "Write a volume on the man, and, if you can, say more."

To whispered scoffs, that fill the guilty place,
She, the degraded, turns her shameless face —
She, who consoled, in true Vienna style,
The Corsican's exile.

Gay 'midst the grave contrivers of our ruin,
Trips in our Lucca's Protestant Don Juan;
In the long carte of tyrants, lo, a dish
That's neither flesh nor fish.

Here we omit a few stanzas. The representative of Modena, of course, is not wanting. "The ill-conditioned Joshua, of the House of Este," who, between cruelty and crude logic, thinks he can stop the sun in heaven. The only one absent is Pope Gregory, and to him, after a satirical notice of the falling off in the Purgatorial revenues, the poet turns with a serious appeal; the very appeal which, some years later, events addressed to his successor, and to which for a time the world hoped Pius was capable of worthily responding. "Speak the word; if you do not, others will." It is hardly necessary to remind our readers that the iron crown of Lombardy is popularly said to be made of the nails of the true cross. In the passionate exhortation to the Lombards which follows, Legnano, the great battle in which the Lombard cities overthrew the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa, appropriately finds a place.

O destined thou to keep alive and free
The sacred stem of Christ's most holy tree,
Bring back in peace, what was so rich and great,
The Gospel's poor estate.

Thy doubting, wretched children — give them rest
Beneath thy garments, meek and humbly drest:
First from thyself, then from our tyrants, tear
The mask of fraud ye wear.

Or if thy wish be still but as of old,
To drink Power's cup, and curse her foes for gold,
Then through these crowds a stronger voice shall ring:

"This crown, which makes your king,
Not from those nails of holiest renown,
As wild tales tell, was forged this iron crown;
Christ gave not to be tools of wrongs and lies
His Passion's mystic ties.

Not from the ploughshare blest, whose peaceful birth

Made demigods the patriarchs of our earth —
This crown was twisted from the robber-swords
Of ruthless Northern hordes.

O Latin race! for whom those low-bent knees?
Your Lord is heir to those old tyrannies;
Around your feet are clanking chains of shame —
Their iron is the same.

Lo, you are here — look around upon your numbers!

Rush on the hirelings: — waken from your slumbers;

Flash in your tyrant's eyes with fearless band

A different-tempered brand —
Steel of that furnace whence Legnano's swords
Reaped the full harvest of barbaric hordes,
Even as the cycle on the autumn plain
Reaps the full sheaves of grain."

Ah me — the people hears — yet looks askance:
Turns to mock fights its glad and foolish glance:
And gives the German columns, rushing, firing,
Its stupid cheers admiring.

The people — no — the giddy guilty swarms,
Nursed and corrupted in luxurious harms,
The scum of nations that from Europe drains

Down to the Lombard plains:
Hired actors, decked with servile diadems,
Sham wreaths of laurel, and sham sets of gems;
And liveried hounds, that smirch their gilt attire
With fawning in the mire;

And Folly's slaves in fashionable hosts,
Worn by false pleasure to the ghosts of ghosts;
And padded grandires, with galvanic grins
Aping their children's sins;

All like the madman, who in brainless craze
Laughs while the clothes upon his shoulders blaze,

And murders with his fist, in frenzied ire,
Him who would quench the fire.

With this bitter description and frightfully forcible simile the poem concludes. Throughout, as in the last stanza, it will be observed that Giusti speaks not merely as a mouth-piece of popular feeling. He has to stir up or even to create the passions to which he appeals. It was the "delirio Milanese" which provoked his anger; and he does not assail the wearer of the iron crown so much as the slaves who applaud him. Foreign dominion is denounced; but the indifference, lukewarmness, or cowardice of many Italians is not less openly and bitterly noted. "You who stupidly and basely admire the shows with which your foreign lords would conciliate you, the military displays with which they warn you to submit — you are not Italians."

The poet is a proclaimer of a truth not unrecognized, and as yet not thoroughly felt and acknowledged. What his influence was, who can tell? Who can tell how many youthful hearts were thrilled by these verses among those who but ten years later raised and manned the barricades of Milan, bequeathing to their countrymen, if not a permanent deliverance, yet the memory at least of a victory over their oppressors? We know at any rate that many hearts were thrilled. The verses made their way wherever the language of the writer was spoken; and it was felt that Italy, whatever else she might want, had at least another poet to grace her fallen condition.

In the eyes of many, especially of those who look at it from afar, Italy is a land of the past only; a land crowded with great memories, with the proofs and relics of a double dominion, with the sculptured and painted marbles of classic and Christian art, with ancient ruins and mediæval churches, and with scenes of natural beauty, almost defying the power of art to render them; but not to be regarded as a land of living modern interests, sharing in modern conflict and progress, a portion of the civilization of to-day, a nation among the European nations. Few things can be conceived more calculated to gull an Italian than the unconsciously contemptuous judgment thus thoughtlessly passed upon his people. He knows it to be untrue, yet he feels that it has much apparent and some real truth. The partial truth makes the implied slight more bitter, and calls for a deeper resentment against those who, by foreign tyranny or by indigenous baseness, crush or paralyze the life of Italy.

LA TERRA DEI MORTI.

A noi larve d'Italia,
Mummie dalla matrice,
E becchino la balla
Anzi la levatrice;
Con noi sciupa il Priore
L'acqua battesimale
E quando si rimuore
Ci ruba il funerale.

Eccoci qui confitti
Coll' effigie d'Adamo,
Sì par di carne, e siamo
Costole e stinche ritti
O anime ingannate,
Che ci fate quassù?
Rassegnatevi, andate
Nel numero dei più.

Ah d'una gente morta
Non si giova la Storia;
Di Libertà, di Gloria,
Scheletri, che v' importa?
A che serve un' esequie
Di ghirlande o di torsi?
Brontoliamoci un requie
Senza tanti discorsi.

Ecco, su tutti i punti
Della tomba funesta
Vagar di testa in testa
Ai miseri defunti
Il pensiero abbrunato
D'un panno mortuario.
L'artistico, il togato
Il regno letterario

E tutta una moria.
Niccolini è spedito,
Manzoni è seppellito
Co' morti in libreria.
E tu giunto a compieta
Lorenzo, come mai

This common opinion, embodied by Lamartine in a probably chance expression, "La Terra des Morts," drew from Giusti the poem entitled "La Terra dei Morti." A grave and sometimes grim humor, relieved with touches of melancholy beauty, is its prevalent tone. "We are dead, it seems; it is true we lived once and to some purpose; but we are quite dead now. Our life, or rather this our present pseudo-life, is a mere fiction and impertinent intrusion among the living; you of this generation, you Frenchmen who are so thoroughly alive, say so, and you must be right; yet from some things, one would almost think we were still really living; who knows? perhaps it will turn out so." This is the theme of the poem. With this explanation perhaps even a most imperfect translation of some of the stanzas of this remarkable ode may give some idea of the deep strain of melancholy irony with which the poet accepts and applies the designation in behalf of the land of which he is sadly proud, and of the people whose life and right to live he indicates.

THE DEAD MEN'S LAND.

To us poor ghosts of Italy,
Us, mummies from the womb,
Our nurse is sexton, and our birth
But opens us the tomb.
On us the curates waste in vain
The holy font's expenses,
And charge our burial fees again
On purely false pretences.

Made up like Adam's sons
In human likeness fair,
True flesh you'd think us, yet we are
Mere ribs and long shin bones.
What do you here, poor souls misled,
Strayed from your place of slumber?
Oh, be resigned, go join the dead,
The nation without number.

For a departed nation
There is no place in story,
What is Liberty or Glory
To this corpse-generation?
Garlands on graves? What good to them?
They're just as well without it.
Let's mumble off their requiem,
And make less talk about it.

Behold, wide wandering over
This cemetery ground,
Dreamily flit and hover
From skull to skull all round.
Thoughts by the funeral pall,
Shrouded in hues of mourning.
The sphere of art, and all
The realm of law and learning,

Are only burial places.
Niccolini's doom is sped,
Manzoni with the dead
Is heaped in old bookcases.
And, young Lorenzo, say,
By what enchantment rare

Infondi nella oreta
La vita che non hai ?

Thou breathest into clay
The life thou dost not share ?

The allusion is to Lorenzo Bartolini, the sculptor, among other works, of the statue "La Fiducia in Dio," exquisitely described by Giusti in a sonnet with that title, the only sonnet we find in his works.

Romagnosi, too, what was he! a ghost—

yet a ghost who could think, and whose thoughts stirred the living. However, dead we are, and all of them, too, are dead. So you Freuchmen say; and you show that you think so from the way in which you borrow from us.

Dei morti nuovi e vecchi
L'eredità giacenti
Arrichiron parecchi
In terra di viventi.
Campando in buona fede
Sull'asse ereditario
Lo scrupoloso erede
Ci fa l'anniversario.

Our dead of old, and of to-day—
Their unclaimed heritages
Shall furnish yet a golden prey
For lively, living sages.
Most unconscientiously they prize
The riches they inherit,
And drink our solemn memories,
And spend our goods with spirit.

As for you, our censors of the church and the police, you may lay down your scissors; why so careful to emasculate the dead!

Perche ci stanno addosso
Selve di baionette,
E s'ungono a quest osso
Le nordiche basette?
Come! guardate i morti
Con tanta gelosia?
Studiate anatomia
Che il diavolo vi porti.

Why hedge us round, poor church-yard folk,
With bayonet plantations?
Why prying, Northmen, past and poke,
'Mid bones and exhumations?
What! watch and spy so jealously
Among the poor dead bodies?
Oh—you would learn anatomy—
The devil aid your studies!

Ma il libro di natura
Ha l'entrata e l'uscita;
Tocca a loro la vita,
E a noi la sepoltura.
E poi se lo domandi
Assai siamo campati.
Gino, eravamo grandi
E là non eran nati.

The register of time is rife
With welcomes and farewells;
Their turn is come for busy life,
Ours for the silent cells.
And after all, we've had our day,
And done perhaps our share;
For we were great of old, ere they
Were born yet, over there.

O mura cittadine,
Sepolcri maestosi,
Fin le vostre ruine
Sono un apoteosi.
Cancella anco la fosse,
O barbaro inquieto,
Chè temerarie l'osse
Sentono il sepolcreto.

O ancient city towers,
Majestic sepulchres,
Even in your ruin stirs
A life of nobler powers.
Lay level ditch and mound,
Rude and suspicious stranger,
Lest from their very burial ground
Dead bones learn thoughts of danger.

Veglia sul monumento
Perpetuo lume il sole
E fa da torcia a vento;
Le rose, le viole,
I pampani, gli olivi,
Son simboli di pianto.
Oh, che bel Camposanto
Da fare invidia ai vivi!

In place of torchlit gloom,
Perpetual sun reposes
Upon that favored tomb,
And violets and roses
And vine and olive wreath,
Are all its signs of sorrow.
Oh, well may life be fain from Death
So bright a home to borrow!

In the last stanza the thin mask of irony is almost thrown off, and the repressed passion breaks through with fierce and undisguised menaces, as the poet passes from the fair image of the dead land, to that of the "Dies Irae," and Day of Judgment yet waiting the oppressors. We give it in the original only:—

Cadaveri, alle corte Tra i salmi dell' Ufficio
Lasciamoli cantare, C'è anco il Dies ira:
E vediam questa morte O che non ha a venire
Dov' anderà a cascare. Il giorno del giudizio?

Some idea of the intellectual and moral state of a nation will ever be found in the average character of its governing men, not so much in that of the one or two leading ministers as of the more numerous officials who administer its resources. Between their character and that of the government they serve, there is a yet closer relation; and, considering the degree and extent of moral influence exercised over masses of mankind even by the satellites of power, it may be said that one of the most pernicious consequences of a base government is the individual baseness which it creates or requires in those who serve it. This is an evil clearly distinguishable from, and perhaps exceeding in amount, all the actual harm caused by misgovernment in detail. It is a canker at the very heart of the social body. In a centralized and bureau-governed country, the existence of a corrupt class of officials is a curse scarcely less all-penetrating than that of a corrupt priesthood. In the eyes of Giusti, this evil, which may be abridged into "Scoundrelism in office," was one of the heaviest curses of Italy; one which the reformer must destroy, and which could not escape the lash of the reforming poet. In his "Gingillino," he has given us what may be called the epic of such scoundrelism; a picture, as his biographer truly says, "squalidly sublime," of the training, progress, success, and final triumph, as of a pupil and master in this school of abject vileness.

A satire more fiercely definite, alike in object and execution, was never penned; and we can easily believe, as we are told, that its effect was tremendous. Here is no allegorical beating about the bush; the form and the drift of the poem are singularly direct and plain. An essay on the subject would have been scarcely less perspicuous, probably far less downright in its language. In a prologue addressed to his friend, Alessandro Manzoni, son of the celebrated novelist, the poet simply declares a fact, and his wonder at it.

"Our rulers," says he, "are always in the habit of picking out the worst and lowest of men to serve them and the state; and then they wonder that in time of trouble these rabble are merely in the way. O royal and imperial highnesses, descendants of Gothic robber-heroes, when you call yourselves We instead of I, is it that you may include those wolves, your trenchermen, with you?" He advises a thorough clearance of the whole tribe, and proceeds to back his recommendation by a picture of one. Beginning at the beginning, he introduces us to his hero-scoundrel, fit to be Mr. Carlyle's ideal arch-scoundrel, in the cradle, under the auspices of appropriate gossips — the deities eponymi of all the servile vices — apostasy, knavery, servility, greed, &c. These, like attendant Parcæ or gift-bestowing fairies, assembled round the cradle, and pouring the leprous disfigurement of the precepts which are to model his future fate into the ears of the infant on whom they are about to fling with full hands such blessings as they can confer —

Chorus'd for lullaby this nursery rhyme,
Most worthy of themselves and of the time.

We have attempted to give some idea of this fatal chant; but the short, sententious flow of Giusti's dactylic measure can hardly be represented in English. The sustained and bitter irony needs neither comment nor explanation:

Hush, baby, don't cry,
You were naked when born;
Would you learn how to die
Not so bare and forlorn?

Come list to our maxims,
Which ever hold good,
And will float you like cork
To the top of the flood.

With a back early bent,
And a pliable marrow,
Cringe, crush yourself under
The pedagogue's harrow.

With strangers and friends
Be it ever your plan,
To become a mere nothing
As far as you can.

The brilliant, the daring,
By you be forsworn,
If you would not die naked
As when you were born.

Keep your head and your heart
Undisturbed by old story,
By weak dreams of honor,
Dim spectres of glory.

And carefully seeking
To limit your learning,
To know how to read
What will help you in earning.

Shun genius, forever
A curse and a scorn,
If you would not die naked
As when you were born.

Grow up, and remember,
That blundering by chance
With an honest intention
More hurts your advance

Than the perfidy cool:
And complete as a friar's,
Wrought by line and by rule
Of your well-balanced liars.

An error confessed
By the heart in its fulness,
Hold the surest of signs
Of the arrantest dulness.

On the dirtiest fingers
Clean gloves can be worn;
Do this — or die naked
As when you were born.

In soul and in body
Be slave to the Real,
Nor get yourself lost
In some airy Ideal.

Let the fables which Reason
Has told to your youth,
Still yield to the Dollar's
Plain practical truth.

Let no noble disdain
Touch you with the folly
Of that simple poetic,
Half-mad melancholy.

Which would tell you the tatters
That honesty brings,
Are not the most wretched
Nor basest of things.

A great and old proverb,
To power well-known,
Has told us that Being
And Having are one.

Hold you by that oracle,
Never outworn ;
If you would not die naked
As when you were born.

Twenty years later we find the protégé of these goddesses taking his degree at the university, a process given with much humorous reality. He is presented by the Public Orator, as we should say, to the assembled heads, in a speech crammed with eulogies on the most regular, most obedient, most decorous of pupils—one who has ever been marked for abstaining from pipes, billiards, taverns, beards, and other disorderly proceedings, for never doing anything without leave,

Sempre abbassando la ragione e l'estro,
Sempre pensando a modo del maestro.

Confident expectations are expressed of his success in life, as a defender of things as they are. Leaving the senate-house in glory, Gingillino is met at the door by a knot of honest scapegrace students (we greatly fear that one Giuseppe Giusti was conspicuous among the number), who, saluting with mock respect the newly-made Doctor of Laws, followed after him, chanting in a tone less complimentary than the orator's, a few verses which convey their impression of the character and prospects of the model pupil.

Tibi quoque, tibi quoque
Is the faculty consigned :
Duly thou "in jure utroque"
Authorized to gall mankind.
All that sea of knavish troubling
There within thy cranium bubbling,
From thy skull in full relief
Raises high the bump of thief.

What is left from all you've read :
Crudest studies, bumped and hurried
In that nutshell of a head,
Urn in which the mind is buried ?
Scantiest lore is yet enough
For that soul of coarsest stuff :
Yea, the slightest tincture of it
Will fit you for touching profit.

Don the gown of learned brother
Or attorney, which you will :
One name fits you like another
While it pays your baker's bill :

Born a hound and hireling wary,
Born Cossack or Janissary,
With bowed neck and crooked shrinking
Making up for want of thinking.

Hypocrite, the laws to wrench
From your face, whoever sees ye,
Knows you travel to the bench
By the way that's broad and easy.
And they say, too, you for hire
Play the spy that blows the fire,
Follower strict and devotee
Of the apostle of the tree.

Poor Iscariot, however,
Was a miserable creature :
You, past paragon more clever,
You with hard unflinching feature,
You can sell a life that's holy Without thinking of the folly
Of being hanged and burst asunder,
Or of giving back the plunder.

The highly approved graduate of the university has next to become the graduate of the world. For this purpose Giusti conducts him to the capital (apparently Rome), and at this point the poet pauses for a moment, and leaves the sharp ringing measures of his bitter satire, to express in slow-moving Dantean verses, of singular melancholy and untranslatable sweetness, how the contrast of ancient glories and modern degradation strikes upon the soul of him who, wandering at night through the moonlit city—

Malinconico pazzo che si giova
Del casto amplesso della tua beltà
Sempre a tutti presente e sempre nova ;

Lento s'inoltra per le mute strade
Ove più lunge è il morbo delle gente
Ed ove l'ombra più rimota cade.

But the pause is but momentary. With an indignant zest, mixed with disgust, he plunges his hero (a lawyer, be it remembered) into what, if we understand it rightly, is a kind of Old Bailey society—a réunion of the practitioners in every kind, on and off the bench, of every legal rascality ; and hence, by a slight transition to the somewhat wider club, including the lower orders of "Birrocraatici," heads and directors of "police," in the continental sense of the word. Crowded with allusions and difficult expressions as this part of the poem is, it is hard for any but an Italian—we might probably say for any but a Tuscan—to appreciate it altogether. Its spirit and flow commend themselves to all : but these it would be hopeless to attempt to reproduce in English.

Standing thus amid a crowd of emulous rogues, with his foot on the lowest steps of the ladder of officialty, and looking upwards with admiring envy, "L'Eccellentissimo Dottor Gingilla" asks and receives the lesson how to climb. Most great men, it is said, owe their rise to feminine influence, and Giusti's hero is no exception. As a young man of promise, he is taken into filial favor by a lady, described in very direct and uncomplimentary verses as the worthy lady patroness of such a society, from whose mouth he receives what might be called the "Official Scoundrel's Manual." Sententiously and gravely are introduced the requirements of the career to which the aspirant has devoted himself. He is already perfect on the negative side; the chapter of "What to Avoid"—

Shun liberals, of all denominations,
All clever fellows with the mark of danger;
Talk not of journals, books, or publications,
But seem to all such things the merest stranger;
Shut close your soul to all, and be alone :—
This lore, I trow, full well to thee is known.

This falls within the great art of omission,
In which I've known you long, complete and clever;
To teach you that, were waste, and mere addition;
Wood to a forest, water to a river.
Well entered thus, for you is still remaining
The active half of your novice training.

Then follow the precepts of base things to be done; how to choose a patron; how to treat him when chosen; what services to render obtrusively, what inobtrusively; in short, the whole duty of the crawler, set forth with a calm and scientific accuracy, an absence of exaggeration or obvious irony, in itself most ironical. It is, in fact, a collection in clear, forcible, emphatic verse, of directions which would be felt to be, if regarded as means to an end, singularly applicable and true. Giusti has done for the low placeman, who would rise to be perhaps even a Peccheneda, what Machiavelli has done for the "Principe." The object of Giusti's picture, at least, will not be a subject of dispute. Gingillino, of course, earns, by zealous adoption of the precepts, the rewards to which they are intended to conduct; and we leave him a prosperous official, already honored with marks of his prince's favor, looking forward with devout confidence to his future admission into the higher official heaven of grand crosses and stars, and reciting every morning and evening with the deepest reverence before his commission of office, as the symbol to him most sacred, a kind of creed to the effect, I believe in Mammon—a creed which, with its tone of bitter and meaning parody, might be considered irreverent in England. Many among us hold that belief devoutly enough, who would be shocked at its plain expression, and for this, as for other reasons, we shall not attempt to translate it.

Such is one of the most celebrated among those poems from which, as Giusti's biographer observes, posterity will draw a living idea of his time—of one side of it, that is to say. There was, perhaps, little hope of immediate amendment in the corruptions so bitterly denounced amid universal assent and applause. But there was dealt to the whole system of government which supported itself on such agency, a heavy and far-resounding blow; and of the many thoughts which would pass through the minds of the Italian reader or hearer (for these poems, circulating in manuscript, were, we believe, read in companies), the last would be—it cannot—it shall not stand. This was the thought which, more or less, consciously lay ever at the bottom of the poet's verses, and the thought which he would have stereotyped, if possible, in the heart of every auditor.

"Gingillino" was written late in 1844. It was the first-fruits of the poet's partial recovery from an illness which had greatly alarmed his friends; of the same kind with that which afterwards proved fatal to him, and its celebrity, perhaps, surpassed that of his former works. His name, as that of the "Anonymous Tuscan," was by this time bruited through Italy with that kind of underhand mysterious celebrity which perhaps is the most flattering and emphatic of all the forms of fame. He was known as an equal to the great writers of his nation; he had many and devoted friends; he was, as his biographer tells us, loved by all who knew him. The praise which came to him from all parts of Italy must have gratified a higher susceptibility than that of poetic vanity. It could not fail to make him feel that his words were something, that he, too, had a lever in his hand, and that there was already felt a tremulous response to the efforts of himself and others vibrating through the fabric which they wished to overthrow.

Few years yet remained for him, but much was reserved for those few. He was to see all but won more than he had ever expected, more than he can have hoped, and see it all lost again; in part by misfortune, as we call it; in part, too, by visible errors and crimes which he keenly denounced, and which would have been impossible, had the Italians been such as he would have wished to see, and potently aided to make them.

At this point, in the year 1845, the last year of Gregory XVI., while from every part of the Peninsula comes a kind of response to the voices of those who, like Giusti in verse, or like Gioberti, Azeglio, and others in prose, point the way to a better future—the dim murmur of a coming change—let us pause for a moment before the portrait of the poet of the movement:—

Those who conversed with him at this time (says his biographer), and also until a few days before his death, would have seen a man tall and well-made, with a countenance full of vivacity and amiability, with black hair, eyes and whiskers; and at first might have thought him a person made, as the saying is, to live forever; but after more careful examination of his countenance would have perceived a kind of slight yellow tinge, like that of one whose liver is affected, and especially a shade of profound melancholy, which seemed to veil over his smile, and shed around him an air of scarcely definable sadness.

A fanciful parallel might perhaps be traced between the poet and the coming fortunes of the Italy which he loved, in the flashing smile so sadly and readily veiled, the fair appearance of strength with death already at the heart. It is more to the purpose of criticism to observe, that this look of melancholy is thoroughly characteristic, for (as already observed), as in the case of almost all genuine irony, a deep sadness is the ground-work of all the laughing satire of Giusti.

Of the private life of Giusti during these years of early manhood his biographer tells us little enough. Over many years of it, as over the life of so many eminent men, there lay the shadow of a great sorrow, in the form of a disappointed affection. A love returned, and then a broken pledge — this is all we see of an event which colored his whole life, and even in his biographer's opinion contributed in some degree to create or strengthen in his mind the tendency to look on the dark and censurable side of things. Often is it the case, and often rightly so, though we cannot but regret it, that the leading incident of an individual's life, that which in his own eyes occupied most space in his mental history, fills but a few lines in his biography. Some beautiful and tender personal poems, necessarily less broadly marked by his peculiar manner than his greater works, but the more interesting through a likeness which the difference of subject does but veil — are the memorials for the world of probably the most important incident in the life of Giusti.

An anecdote of a lighter kind has reached us on uncertain authority; how the Grand Duke himself, on some occasion, sent for the suspected author of the keen satires in everybody's mouth, and remonstrated with him in the usual paternal tone, and probably with a really kind intention. "You are a young man of great talents; you will get into trouble if you go on in this way; you might employ yourself better for your own advantage, &c." And now Giusti, not being able to afford, however thin was the veil, to lose his anonymous character, calmly answered, "that his Royal Highness was extremely good, that he had no pretensions of that kind; he regretted to say, he was an indolent young man who was very fond of fishing, and thought little of other matters."

It is scarcely necessary to observe that no deception was either conveyed or intended by such an answer. It simply amounted to a polite negative, a form of saying — I decline letting out my Pegasus — always supposing I have one, a fact which your censorship does not allow me to admit, to be put into court-harness. We do not, however, answer for the story. Of Giusti's having been subjected to sharp police supervision and censure, his poems contain a characteristic record in the verses entitled, "Rassegnazione e proponimento di cambiar vita." They are an ironical recantation and repentance of former offences, for which he has been severely rebuked, of course amounting to a very pointed repetition of them. Another, entitled "My New Friend," is an admirably witty sketch of the gentlemanlike and pleasing person, only rather extravagant in his liberalism, and given to underbreath confessions of conspiracy, who had lately pressed his flattering society on the poet; being of course a police spy.

Giusti's abstract politics may or may not have been generally identical with those of the illustrious men whom we have named as the leaders and representatives, or teachers, of moderate liberalism. It is right to observe that he agreed with them on the most important point of all, on that fatal point, on which difference of opinion has ruined the hopes of Italy. With the best and wisest, he said, let us have no secret societies, no conspiracies. All that is gone by, in nine cases out of ten, it never was more than an imposture of the "birri" spies and informers, who get up such articles to sell them in retail; and it is mere cast-off rubbish to-day:

Oggi si tratta d'una certa razza
Che vuole Storia, e che lo dice in piazza.

The poem from which these lines are taken is a kind of confession of political faith, with the significant title "Delenda Cartago."

We necessarily pass over much unnoticed, but among the poems of this period of hope, there is one which for its singular beauty and unusual tenderness of thought and expression, demands especial notice, that entitled Sant' Ambrogio. It is an instance of what the simplest of incidents may become in the hands of a real poet.

Giusti finds himself one morning near the altar in the church of St. Ambrogio, near Milan, and, as it happens, in the middle of a whole troop of Austrian soldiers — Bohemians, Croats, and others, "the stakes of our vineyard," standing up stiffly in truth, as if they were so many stakes, with

Blank faces, and tow whiskers fit to kindle,
Upright before the Lord, each like a spindle.

Moreover, the poor fellows had breakfasted on garlic, and between moral and physical shrinking, he admits that he felt a certain shock, a rush of feelings not proper to the time and place. But while he was looking on, there arose from the band near the altar a slow strain of mournful music

D'una gente che gema in duri stenti
E de' perduti beni si rammenti.

The music was Italian, that chorus from Verdi's Lombardi:—

Quello "O Signore, dal tetto natio,"
Che tanti petti ha scossi e inebriati.

Its beauty carried him away, and united him in feeling with the foreign worshippers. It ceased, and he was recovering with the thought, "it is our music after all, and very fairly played," when the music began again, this time a German hymn, chanted by the soldiers, half prayer, half lament, a "bitter sweet" strain, telling of the recollections of infancy, of those home songs, which, learnt at the mother's knee, come back to the heart in the days of sorrow, of the sad longings of exile, so beautiful, so tender, so imploring, so melancholy, that it enchanted him in delight and wonder, that those wooden figures were capable of such exquisite harmonies.

Un cantico tedesco lento lento
Per l'aer sacro a Dio mosse le penne;
Era preghiera, e mi pareva lamento,
D'un suono grave, flebile, solenne,
Tal, che sempre nell'anima lo sento;
E mi stupisco che in quelle cottenne,
In que' fantocci esotici di legno,
Potesse l'armonia fino a quel segno.

Sentia nell'inno la dolcezza amara
De' canti uditi da fanciullo; il core
Che da voce domestica gl'impara
Ce li ripete i giorni del dolore;
Un pensier mesto della madre cara,
Un desiderio di pace e di amore,
Uno sgomento di lontano esilio,
Che mi faceva andare in visibilo.

It left the poet full of deeper and kinder thoughts, and earnest compassion for those poor fellows, blind instruments of a tyranny which they do not understand, dragged from their home, harshly disciplined, solitary and disliked, among people of another race and speech, sent here by the politic despotism which finds in the opposition of races the instrument of its supremacy, slaves keeping down slaves,

From far Bohemia and the Ban's command,
Like droves to winter in our fat marsh land.

A thought arises in his mind, a thought of kindly brotherhood of the subject peoples, "and had I not run away, I really must have embraced a corporal, standing there with his cane as stiff as a clothes-peg."

"Your excellency," says the poet to some minister of police probably, "why do you send that stupid, deaf fellow to follow me, and make out what I and others are about? It is mere waste of money; I am perfectly ready to tell you. Take notes—is your pencil ready? First, understand that the world really is in movement, and aspires to freedom. Listen but to the bell of the Campanile, each time it tolls, 'For burial or for baptism in the morn, A tory* dies, a liberal is born.' Change, therefore, we desire; but we are no conspirators or destructives; no pseudo Gracchi or 'Robespierri'—neither do we wish absolute lords—'Padroni'—you may put that down 'Padroni no,' and to proceed. To republics, tyrants, slaves, all those convulsive and stimulating names, I have nothing to say; I can tell you in two words what we do want."

Scriva—Vogliamo che ogni filio d'Adamo
Conti per uomo; e non vogliam Tedeschi;
Vogliamo i Capi col capo; vogliam
Leggi e Governi, e non vogliam Tedeschi.
Scriva, Vogliam, tutti, quanti siamo
L'Italia, Italia, e non vogliam Tedeschi;
Vogliamo pagar di borsa e di cervello,
E non vogliam Tedeschi; arrivedello.

Respect for rights, real laws, real government, Italy; honest payment for these blessings; and above all no Germans; Delenda Cartago.

There is the mot d'enigme, pointedly enough given. This poem was dated December, 1846. A little more than another year, and the dream was all but realized; the time thought distant was at the very doors. As is so often the case in such things, the Revolution of Italy came, not without warnings indeed, but still like a thief in the night. Pius had succeeded Gregory, and the distant shock was already given.

There is a deep and most natural sadness in the tone with which, now that all is past, the Italian writers refer to those days of 1847, days of almost intoxicating promise and gladness, when hope after hope, as it arose, seemed to lead to its own fulfilment; when the cause of freedom, sanctioned by authority, and blest by religion, seemed, if to-day ever were to be trusted as a prophet of to-morrow, destined to a success, speedy, complete, and unstained. Unfortunately it is not so that the world is changed, and all that seemed to be won so easily without labor or tears, was yet to be struggled for and lost with tears of blood. Much undoubtedly of the excitement which prevailed was of that transitory kind, no better calculated than the flower-garlands of a popular fêtes to survive the storm of adversity and war. Many frivolous and many wicked follies were committed, both perhaps in rather more than usual proportion in times of great popular excitement. It is the distinction of writers of the Macfarlane school to make the most of both, and to ignore altogether the efforts made, and the sufferings undergone, by the true friends and supporters of a cause to which only victory was wanting.

We will not attempt to retrace here the history of that great failure which came so near to being the most blessed and glorious of successes. From the brilliant and transitory heroism of Milan, to the nobler perseverance of Venice—from the blessing of the Crusading banners by the Pope, to the slaughter of his subjects on the breach of Sant' Pancrazio by the French, in the name and interest of the Holy Father; all are familiar with the leading events of the eighteen months during which Italy was more than a geographical appellation. The part individually taken in these events by one of the noblest sons of Italy is all that we are now dealing with.

Towards the end of 1847 Giusti published a small volume of poems, with his name for the first time openly attached to them, and took the opportunity of expressing what may be called a hope that, in the changed relation of things, his voice, as it had been heard hitherto, might be needed and heard no longer.

I feel (said he) that this style of verse is becoming a fruit out of season, and I would gladly raise myself to the level of the new facts which are unfolding themselves before our eyes with such majesty of motion; but who can say whether the spirit accustomed to confine itself within the narrow circle of the "No," will have the vigor to break the bounds of its old pasture, and range over a wider and more productive field? If I should feel the courage and power to try it, I certainly shall not stand idle; should I, however, find myself not strong enough, I shall not be so obstinately foolish as to persist in tolling the passing bell, at a time when all others are ringing the peal for a new birth.

These words are worth noting, as showing not only how deeply Giusti felt the accomplishment of his desire for Italy, but how distinct and definite his purpose as a writer had become. His weapon had done its work—it might be laid aside. His language indicates, too, a sense not always possessed by those whose especial vocation, from nature or circumstances, has been to utter and reiterate the No—that there is a Yes as well. Giusti, feeling this, was fit and qualified to defend good as well as to attack evil. But the time was not yet come, nor likely to come, when the satirist could be spared. Forms of evil were rife, both new and old; and a combatant for truth and right was not likely to find rest.

In the period of the short-lived union between princes and people, there was one class who saw their own calamity in the general rejoicing, that class who, at Naples and elsewhere, have since repaid themselves with interest so abundant for the temporary suspension of their system of government.

The efforts of the "birrocracy" to clutch back the sceptre which was passing from them, are celebrated by Giusti in the poem entitled "Congresso dei Birri." All who have seen and see, or who have learnt from Mr. Gladstone's letters to appreciate, the venom and force of this revived serpent—the boa constrictor which strangles out the life of Italy—may also appreciate the value of a blow which paralyzed those efforts for the time.

The poem, as its title implies, is an admirably humorous and sustained parody, so to speak, of the parties and forms of deliberative assemblies. Still there are the three shades of opinion—right, centre, and left—ultras, moderates, and a third section which guides and governs the others, as we shall see, all bent to consider what course becomes them in the present threatening aspect of affairs; when the actions of the governors are, so far have things gone, certainly criticized by the governed, and there is even talk of giving the people some voice in the management of their own affairs.

The Birri are met in solemn parliament, or rather, the object and interest of all the members being the same, we may regard it as what the Americans call, or used to call, for their political nomenclature is of rapid and transitory invention, a caucus—let us say a meeting to concert rapid measures for the protection of the great Birro interest.

The first speaker naturally is one of the "corabiato," an ultra conservative, or, as we say, tory "birro." Like other less strictly professional conservatives, this honorable member cannot see that in fact there is any difficulty in the case, except what arises from fearing to act upon the wisdom of our ancestors. We have left the old ways; the remedy is to return to them. Our business is simple repression. What need of talk? "Seize, imprison, and hang."

Ecco la Massima Would you a maxim?

Spedita e vera,	Two words will comprise one.
Galera e Boia	Imprison and hang 'em,
Boia e Galera.	Hang and imprison.

This savagely emphatic "bear" of a birro, be it observed, does but follow in the very steps, and almost the very words, of the ten times illustrious Duke of Modena, with his famous autographic despatch, as laconic as if it had been sent by electric telegraph. "An.

insurrection took place last night. The conspirators are in my hands. Send me the hangman."

Fiction is ever short of truth, and Giusti's birro is scarcely equal to the Prince — to the descendant of all the D'Estes. Simple and impressive as is this view, it does not, in the opinion of the next orator, altogether meet what he asserts to be the really dangerous position of affairs. You cannot stop the world by threats of hanging. Such simple methods are behind the age.

Collega riformatevi;
Siete antediluviano.

My honored colleague deems we live
Still in those blessed times
When none e'er spoke of Italy,
Save lettered men in rhymes.

My friends, to-day that name is taught
To children by their nurses,
To-day 't is in the peasant's mouth,
Not in Arcadian verses.

No doubt the peoples will come to perdition: but there is no use in trying to stop a runaway horse, which only pulls the harder. Suppose the princes were thrown first, why should we sacrifice ourselves for them? Let us watch and see what turn things take, with an eye to the permanency of our own pay, rather than to any other result.

This reasonable advice of the "juste milieu" partisan meets with a good deal of acceptance; but the climax of the discussion is still reserved for the third orator, at whose rising a hush of expectation silences and thrills the assembly.

Hush! Silence! Hear, hear!
Ran through all the Consistory:
Hear him give us the word
Of the Birrian mystery!

The solution of the problem, we see, has till now but "loomed in the distance;" it has now passed into the hands of the consummate artist who leads the house; and the true end and interest of the "Birrocacy" are to be explained.

He states calmly and impressively his differences from his honorable friends who have preceded him. They have, he respectfully submits, missed the true point at issue, in misapprehending the real scope of the great institution of which they are members. Our business is not to save the state — to coax favor out of either the people or the court, to secure a little pay. It is to have power, and be ourselves. ("Vivian Grey" condensed into a line.)

The brilliant orator proceeds to explain his position as regards the abstract theories laid down as the articles of belief of the party.

I hold not strict as items of my creed,
Far less reject, your block and thumbscrew fancies:

I say strength aims to stand, and to succeed:
The how depends on time and circumstances:
The truly wise no stubborn systems heed,
But take the task that suits, as the wind chances;
Look to the end: be that your constant rule:
Who sticks at means, is a pedantic fool.*

And now for the application of their principles to the case in hand. Regarded thus philosophically, the present position of affairs, alarming as a superficial view may represent it, is in fact the most desirable of all positions — the one state of things best adapted to promote the power and interests of our order. Only let the question be thoroughly apprehended. We are not here to prevent evil. A pretty trade that would be. Conceive a really good and happy government. What need would there be of us! What place, what importance have we in a well-ordered and contented community? To keep up a good misunderstanding between governors and governed; to prevent their agreeing; to blow the flames which we are needed to quench; to make the princes hated by the people, and ourselves necessary to the princes, is the way to remain, as we are, supreme; to pass, as we have passed, from being slaves of slaves, to being lords of our lords! Padroni dei Padroni. The word of the "Birrian" mystery is this — "Dividete e regnate." At this point there breaks in upon the assembly, from the neighboring piazza, the shout which tells that the people and the prince are united in hope and will; the genius of the illuminated orator is quenched on his lips; and the congress for the protection of the birro interest vanishes despairing from our sight, into the limbo of past iniquities.

The aspect of things in 1847 justified such a conclusion. This, too, has passed, with so many other hopes; yet the "Congress dei Birri" was well-meant and effective in its day. In any case it remains, in verse which will not soon perish, an unmistakable embodiment of a hideous social and political evil; and it may yet aid in realizing the anticipations with which it concludes.

But there was another evil which threatened the prospects of Italy — a canker at the heart of her newly-born liberty; this, too, Giusti was one of the earliest to perceive and denounce. In verses of almost prophetic exactness and singular force, he exposed those pernicious and cowardly demagogues who sprang up in the cities of Italy, rank weeds in the midst of so much noble growth; the men who successfully labored to bring discredit abroad and ruin at home upon the movement, which, generally speaking, they had done little to originate, and did less to support in the field. We refer especially to the poem "Agli Spettri del 4to Sept." ("To the Ghosts of the 4th Sept., 1847"), of which the key-note is given by the first line,

Su Don Abbondio! è morto Don Rodrigo;

a line, hitting with a force of concentrated contempt, which needs no explanation to the readers of Manzoni's novel. It is difficult not to think that the objects of this fierce ridicule and heartfelt indignation must have blushed at the picture of themselves. So vivid is the unflattering daguerreotype of these coffee-house brawlers, amid flasks and cigars, the submissive slaves of yesterday, the extreme republicans of to-day, in whose hands liberty changed itself into license, aspirations after independence into calumny of the most effective champions of that cause, the "sacred war" in Lombardy, into safe sedition at home.

Bravo! Take courage; yet with calculation;
Take counsel from the time and the occasion;
Now that the conies' feeble folk can dare
The lion's hide to wear.

Now take your side, and as the people stand
Wondering at you, who live by second-hand;
Roar that you were, yea, ere the world began,
A staunch republican.

This poem is enough to show that the changed state of things would have presented themes for the sarcasm as well as for the enthusiasm of the poet. In the mean time, it opened to him another field, in which he had the opportunity of showing that his vocation was not censure alone, and that practical good sense was not wanting to his genius. Tuscany, like the other States of Italy, entered with all fair hopes and promises into a course of constitutional freedom. An assembly was elected, and to this assembly, by the constituency of his native district, the illustrious poet was returned. The unhappy differences and errors which contributed so much to the destruction of the Italian cause in the field, were not wanting in the Tuscan assembly. Giusti seems to have been an uniform adherent of prudent and moderate counsels.

The assailant of absolutism, whether paternal or not, he had already, in his Ode to Leopold II., held out to the constitutional prince the hand of frank reconciliation. With a poet's misleading enthusiasm, he placed some trust in the compact between prince and people, which he had himself seen sealed with oaths taken amid tears.

Not the less as an honest politician and citizen did he bind himself to make easy the preservation of that compact. To cement the unhoped-for alliance between prince and people; to keep things as steady as possible during the transition from absolute to constitutional government; to avoid distrust and the causes of distrust, even in show; this was his wish. It is almost superfluous to say, that in following this course he did not escape the attacks of the Don Abbondios of politics.

Under the excitement of the times, and the sudden liberation of all tongues and pens, a crop of scurrilous papers grew up in Florence, calumniating the best of the Italians, by way of forwarding the interests of Italy. Giusti, too, was in this form to feel the ingratitude of the base; and if we may judge from the tone of his letters, he felt, with some of the sensitiveness of a poet's nature, the attacks upon him, but without the least shrinking; they had no effect upon his conduct. "Those who abuse me now," said he, "might reflect that I spoke when others were silent." A scheme for a paper or periodical, to be conducted under his directions, to neutralize the effect of these publications, was set on foot. But the failing health of Giusti—not to add his strict and high ideas of what the tone of such a periodical ought to be—caused the scheme to be deferred, and finally dropped. In the chamber he spoke seldom; when he did speak, it was with point and vigor, and in a style resembling, to a certain extent, his poetry. Very probably every deep feeling with him took, with scarce an effort, the form which he had so sedulously cultivated. He would often meet his friends, after a sitting, with some epigram upon his lips, or slight versified sketch of some absurdity which had marked the day; but he never took the trouble, it is supposed, to write them down.

After the first defeat of Charles Albert had given strength to the more violent and unreflecting party, the first Tuscan assembly, a body of moderate and sensible, but not sufficiently energetic character, was dissolved, and another named. In spite of his own wish to avoid reflection, on the ground of his failing health, Giusti's constituents would vote for no other candidate; and from a sense of duty, though with the certainty of injury to himself, he accepted the mandate, in words of some solemnity—

Fint voluntas vestra.

In the second chamber, his conduct remained unaltered; but on the flight of the Grand Duke, in February, 1849, this chamber, too, was dissolved, and a convention summoned. The revolutionary party, left by the desertion of the prince in unchecked power, did all they could to exclude Giusti. The election took place by universal suffrage; but once more his constituents of the Val de Borgo sent back, by an unanimous vote, the name which they valued highest. In legislative chamber or in constituent assembly they would have no other representative than their illustrious countryman.

Giusti took no part in the proceedings of this short-lived convention. In a few weeks' time, its existence and that of the provisional government was terminated without a struggle, by the spontaneous and general movement which invited the Grand Duke to return from his voluntary exile, and administer the constitution which he had sworn to maintain.

Meanwhile the history of Italy went on. The sword of her independence was broken at Novara; the heroic resistance of solitary Venice, leaving to future times an invaluable example and memory, could for the present only defer the inevitable restoration of Austrian dominion in Lombardy—and the French, ever emulous of Austrian glory beyond the Alps, seized at the opportunity of restoring to the peninsula the second of its curses, in reëstablishing the priestly government of Rome.

The end of 1849 saw scarcely a trace remaining of the hopes which made glorious the beginning of 1848.

A melancholy destiny permitted the poet to survive the disappointment of all his expectations as a patriot, to survive it, and no more. He did not lose his hopes for the better future; but he knew that it would come too late for him. His health had ever been precarious, and the agitation, first of hope, and then of regret over the calamities and errors which he saw, so truly, had contributed to its rapid decline.

On the last day on which his biographer saw him, he conversed at some length on the state of Italy; the mistakes of the past, the hopes of the future; the contrast between the bright dawn of their revolution, and the darkening gloom of their present political horizon; and quoting, with a sigh, the words of Dante:

O buon principio
A che vil fine convien che tu caschi!

may God grant (he added) that at least the lesson may be profitable. When the time comes again, I shall be here no longer; do you and others, who will be here, and who have seen the causes that have ruined us, proclaim them aloud, and avoid dissensions. Thus alone can Italy rise again, and soon.

Yet he thought something had been gained, for Tuscany at least. "They can hardly," said he, "ever take away from us our constitutional forms again."

It seems he gave the Grand Duke credit for some degree of good feeling and justice; the Austrians, for that degree of foresight which would make one or both parties shrink from setting up among an easily ruled and affectionate people a mere despotic throne supported by foreign bayonets.

Possibly he thought, unreasonable as it must appear to those to whom the millions are ciphers and the units all, that though there had been offences on both sides, yet between the prince who absconded unnecessarily from his states and his duties, and the people who, after a short period of confusion, unanimously and earnestly invited him back, by-gones might with some degree of equity be held by-gones, and some restoration of confidence be possible. He was wrong; he overrated, as we trust it will prove, the prudence of the Austrian cabinet; he overrated, also, as poets are apt to overrate, the generosity of a prince.

He saw the Tuscan restoration, as an English poetess saw it, from the Casa Guidi windows, and as she has described it for us in the best pages of her volume under that title. He saw the return of the paternal ruler, who had given his subjects the voluntary assurance, "Before all things, I am an Italian prince," preceded, followed, and symbolized, by the steady tramp of Austrian troops and the slow roll of Austrian cannon, through the streets of the fairest city of Italy.

Giusti has left us no record of the feelings with which he viewed the ignominy of that restoration, an ignominy gratuitously incurred for himself, and inflicted on his people, by a prince of whom better things had been hoped. But he could have expressed no other feelings than those expressed by the English poetess; the shame, the sadness, the bitter blame of all alike, who by thoughtless folly, by deliberate wickedness, or by the mere braggart hollowiness and cowardice of weak hearts and heads, had falsified hopes so fair and so well founded.

Bitter things I write
Because my soul is bitter for your sake,
Oh Freedom! Oh my Florence!

Yes—let the bitter lesson be taken to heart, even as Giusti would have wished his countrymen, the countrymen of Dante, to take it; but never let our anger against those who betrayed or weakly defended the right, pervert us into forgetting on which side the right lay, or incapacitate us from doing justice to those whose conduct was worthy of their cause. It is an old saying, "The blood of martyrs is the seed of the Church," and like every similar struggle for right, the Italian struggle had its martyrs too. One died at Oporto, others on the battle-fields of Lombardy or Piedmont, others at Brescia, others at Rome.

The winter of 1849–50, the last of Giusti's life, he spent in the house of Gino Capponi, whose admiration for the poet was joined with a paternal affection for the man; and there, on March 25th, 1850, he died, having for some time calmly foreseen the end. The Austrianized government of Florence offered some mean, however natural, opposition to the public funeral with which the Florentines desired to honor their anti-German poet. The opposition, however, on second thoughts, was withdrawn, and on April, 1850, crowds accompanied to the grave, on the hill of San Miniato, the remains of the last and not the least illustrious of the many great men who have added an accumulated glory to the city of Dante.

We have already, to the best of our ability, characterized the peculiar style and manner, both of thought and of expression, if these two can ever be distinguished in a poet, of this emphatically original writer. We have also pointed out how close a relation his short career bore to the circumstances of his time, and how he sought to modify those circumstances; and we know, on the authority of his compatriots, how potent an influence his writings exercised. Of the man himself we could have wished to give a more living picture, but the materials before us are scarcely sufficient for the purpose. It is always pleasant, however, to feel towards those whose writings have delighted or instructed us, that we could have wished to have known them. The biographer has enabled us, with the aid of the poet himself, to feel this towards Giuste. Here is a description of a man worthy to be remembered:

All loved him who knew him. Leaving apart his genius, and the admirable sagacity and steadiness of his politics, he was, in the converse of domestic life, of manners so gentle, and of temper so sweet and open, that it was impossible not to love him after having been even but once brought together with him. Sad, both by nature and habit, but serene and tranquil in his sadness, he had a spirit open to every noble and elevated feeling. Generally he was rather silent; but when, in a rare moment of gladness, he gave free course to his laughter, he enchanted you with delight. He was a worshipper of beauty and goodness; he adored virtue, and abhorred the vices which polluted the society in which he was born, to such a degree that in this horror it was that he found the will and the strength to become a poet. Constant in his friendships, careless of inquiries which affected only himself, kindly helpful, modest, devoid of envy or jealous ambition, without false glitter or polish, he would have been a model of a citizen for his private merits, even if his genius had not raised him to the height which he attained as a poet.

Such was Giuseppe Giusti, a poet, a thoughtful patriot, a man worthy to be added to the long roll of great Italian names. Much of what he might have done has been lost by his comparatively early death; yet he can scarcely be counted among the "inheritors of unfulfilled renown." There is nothing incomplete in what he has left, nothing in which however imperfect in itself, you recognize a promise which may or may not be verified. He had perfected the style of composition which he may be almost said to have introduced as a novelty into Italy; he has a distinct place of his own as a poet. He felt most deeply and bitterly the social evils and political degradation of his country; he did what one man could do to expose them, with a view to their removal. His verses will illustrate the history of this time, while they preserve his own name and character in the memory of men. He was not vain, but he claimed for himself, with truth, the rarest of praises for a satirist, when he said, as he more than once did — "Credo di non aver mai derisa la virtù, ne burlati gl' affetti gentili." — "I believe that I have never scoffed at virtue, or cast ridicule on the gentle affections." A thorough reformer, and alive, as few others have been, to the extent of evil operated on the national character by base and oppressive institutions, he yet felt that it was little to change the institutions unless you could reform the men also. With this end he aimed at the vices of a corrupt and trifling society his bitter ridicule inter-fused with so deep a seriousness.

Shaming some and stirring others, he who began as "Vox clamantis in deserto," lived to hear one responsive cry in answer to his words, and among the names of those to whom Italy will yet owe the renewal and recognition of her bound and sleeping life, she will place few, if any, above that of the author of the "Terra dei Morti."

FRIEND SORROW.

Do not cheat thy heart and tell her,
Grief will pass away —
"Hope for fairer times in future,
And forget to-day."
Tell her, if you will, that sorrow
Need not come in vain;
Tell her that the lesson taught her
Far outweighs the pain.

Cheat her not with the old comfort,
"Soon she will forget" —
Bitter truth, alas, but matter
Rather for regret;
Bid her not "Seek other pleasures,
Turn to other things;" —
Rather nurse her caged sorrow
'Till the captive sings.

Rather bid her go forth bravely,
And the stranger greet;
Not as foe, with shield and buckler,
But as dear friends meet;
Bid her with a strong clasp hold her,
By her dusky wings;
And she'll whisper low and gently
Blessings that she brings.

SHORT CUT ACROSS THE HIGHLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

Monday, August 9, 1852.

THIS morning, before the door of the Gairloch Inn, stood a dog-cart, which was to take away as many of the party as could be got into it. The party consisted of a veteran and Right Honorable Statesman, his daughter-in-law and her sister, and myself. He had been persuaded to go out on a cruise in his son's yacht. The ladies went because they "supposed they must," and I went because I had no alternative but to go, or be left behind by myself. We had met with nothing but inconvenient winds ever since we sailed from the dark jaws of Loch Houra. We had managed to beat up the ragged and picturesque coast of Skye, by Kylaken, Port Ren, Rona, and Scalpa. Here we were on the fourth day wind-bound in the Gairloch, with what Hugh, the sailing-master, described as "a nice breeze dead against us." We had mutinied and deserted the yacht, resolving to make our way home by terra firma as best we could. A conveyance had been sent on for, over night—this dog-cart had come, and, at the conjuncture with which my narrative opens, the driver was being severely reprimanded for bringing a vehicle so unfit to carry ladies. The ladies, on the other hand, declared they were delighted with it, and only wished it had been a common farm-cart so as to be even more reduced to the true adventuresque level.

Fit, or unfit for ladies, it evidently contained no place for me. The landlord luckily had a pony. He was brought out, caparisoned in a bran-new saddle and bridle, and shaking a very shaggy, long, blacky-brown mane. I had gone down stairs uncertain of my destiny, and half-undecided whether to stick to the yacht after all. However, there was the pony, and I was recommended to lose no time; but canter away to Ochnashin (a distance of thirty miles), and take the mail down to Kylaken, where the yacht would call for me when it came by. My plans had been laid out for me by wiser heads the night before; but though I did not argue about it, I entertained a modest preference for a plan of my own, which had been formed upon the map during the discussion of my fate. This was to go across the country in as straight a line as lakes and mountains would permit.

Away I rode, as the first eighteen miles coincided with my own devices. Rising from the pine-clad glens of Gairloch, I came upon fine, craggy, hill-top scenery, among which one giant mountain-head, rising in the distance, and overlooking his fellows, arrested my attention. I cantered up, and trotted down, the uneven, winding road, by moss and crag and tarn, till I came in sight of the beautiful Loch Maree, studded with wood-crowned islands—a rare and striking ornament for a sea-loch. Here, too, was revealed at full length the horned giant peak rising boldly from the water, a very fine mountain. But, some way, when one saw the whole of him, he did not seem so majestic as when his preëminent brow alone appeared. So I stowed him away in my memory as a metaphor on this wise:—

"As a mountain-summit afar off, dimly seen towering above his peers, is a great name in the misty perspective of history. As a great mountain near at hand, which fills the view; and whose magnitude, leaving nothing to the imagination, grows familiar to our eyes, and therefore less imposing, is a great character to his contemporaries."

This familiarity, however, did not breed in my mind contempt enough to destroy a curiosity to know the name of my great contemporary; and so, overtaking a pretty lassie, with a great tub on her shoulder, I pointed to him, and asked her what he was called.

"Yes," said she.

"But what's his name?"

"Yes."

"Good gracious! the mountain! the ben!" pointing up to the very peak of it. She here began to talk Gaelic with much volubility, at which I shook my head, and kept on saying "ben," and pointing at the hill-top, till she caught my idea and said, "Yes—Ghléach."

As she had beautiful smiling eyes, and seemed of an affirmative disposition, by way of changing the conversation to a more familiar topic, I asked her if she would give me a kiss, performing that little pantomime on the tip of my finger and pointing to her lips. This time, however, though she smiled yet more pleasantly than before, showing a very perfect range of pearly teeth, she said, "No," kissing her hand very gracefully over her shoulder, as she turned to resume her tub, which had been set on the wall in the stream of conversation under difficulties.

So I rode on, stowing away the smiling maiden of Loch Maree and her tub in my memory, as a pleasant recollection of a bright and simple countenance, and a happier tub than that of Dean Swift or Diogenes.

Opposite Ghléach (which was on the other side of the lake) I passed a showery gorge, through which looked down two remarkable mountains shaped like tents. If any of my readers happen to go that way, they will see what I mean—otherwise, I fear that this will not give them a very clear idea—let them be satisfied that they reminded me strongly of tents.

The long loch at last came to an end, and two miles more brought me to Kinlochewe inn. To go on to catch the mail, I should have to ride ten miles further, and this canter of eighteen had already rather whipped the froth off my little pony. As I came to the spot, I saw a steep and stony path slanting away to the right up a great hill. This, it struck me, by my ideas gathered from the map, might lead to Craig Inn, and so, by inquiry, I found it did.

I now resolved to throw up the mail and the yacht at one double-barreled vomit, and trust to my legs and stick to terra firma; for, in confidence, I was very sick in the yacht. Some porridge and cream fortified me against the hunger and fatigue of a dozen mountain miles, and away I trudged in a heavy shower: for I was afraid to wait, for fear the dog-cart should overtake me with an ungetoverable reinforcement of good advice as to the really prudent thing to do.

However, I had now made up my mind to do the really imprudent thing for once—to leave the beaten track of convenience for the rough scrambles of romance. Warm in the fresh sublimity of this idea, I plodded through the rain, wrapped in my streaming plaid. I had unluckily taken the hill about two miles before the path began to slope up from the valley, and being too obstinate to come down easy, I persevered, crossing an inconvenient number of mountain-spurs with ravines between them. In one of these, where I stopped to take breath and drink, it occurred to me that it might be an advantage to know how time was going in these wild places, that I might see when it was necessary to be in a hurry for fear of being benighted, and to measure my pace. I had an old watch with me, which I carried more for the sake of the luck-money attached to it, than anything else, as I had forgot to bring the effective key. But, though the working-key was left at home, there was a superannuated, worn-out partner who had lost his teeth in the service (so that he could not bite the winch of the key-hole), but who was retained on the bunch of supernumerary hangers-on in consideration of his being a specimen of my own goldsmithery. But now I took him off his gold ring, and with a stout pebble for my hammer, and a great rock for my anvil, bruised his mouth smaller till he would bite—wound up the watch, and set it to the time of day I conjectured it might be.

At last I reached the path, toiled over the hill and down into the valley on the other side, having then come about eight miles. In the valley there was a bothy, and in the bothy a woman who had no English. I said "Craig Inn!—Craig?" pointing about.

'No English,' shaking her head.

'Craig!—Craig!—Craig!' very loud.

"Oh!" said she brightening up, "hhhré-ahshch," and a string of Gaelic, in which the word road predominated, and that I concluded to mean road, for she pointed to a distant track up the broad sloping valley.

On I journeyed—over the slippery stepping-stones of the burn—along the grassy valley—very tired, and dragged in my weary shoulders by the weight of the damp plaid. By-and-by I took it off, and, spreading it on the sward, laid my head on a little mound, and actually went to sleep for a few minutes near another cottage, where I had intended to ask for a drink of milk, but found it silent and deserted. However, I knew that would n't do. "Rheumatism, you know!" whispered I to myself, to encourage my weary bones to move on.

I topped at last the long slope of the valley, and saw below me, on the other side, a lake at a great depth down a very steep hill. I scrambled down it in a very severe shower—found a few cottages, but nothing like an inn—tried two or three of them, and at last found a man who had some English—entered his house, and sat by the fire, asking him questions.

"Had he ever been across the hills into the Glengary country?"

He had, but went with other shepherds who knew the way, and it was hard to find, and easy to lose, and only here and there a bothy for shelter at nights.

"How far would it be to Glengary—forty or fifty miles?"

"Oh! more than that," and then he also recommended Kylaken and the mail; but the mail had gone by half-an-hour ago, and would not go again till Wednesday (the day after to-morrow). The inn was a mile back the other way. Here I almost repented of not riding on my other ten miles and taking the mail. But I said to myself, in the pride and obstinacy of my heart, "Come, now, don't be beat! don't own you were wrong to go against the good advice of older heads! take to these wild hills and steer southward by the sun."

"Ay, but perhaps I shall find nothing to eat, and starve by the way. There is a prevalent notion that these mountains are dangerous."

"Then carry some barley-scons with you; that and the water of the burns will keep you alive at the worst."

"But where shall I sleep at night?"

"In a bothy if you can find one; if not, in the heather, and think yourself lucky if it does not rain all night like this."

It was and had been raining violently. My plaid was dripping wet, and the whole of me more than damp.

Amid these reflections I reached the inn, which my informant in the cottage had said was "not a very good inn, just muddling." But the hostess was a good woman, and lighted a peat fire in my garret bed-room, and gave me a dry plaid to wrap myself in while I dried my wet clothes before the flame. She baked me some broad, thick scones, and gave me some good tea and good cream and a fresh egg, so that I was deliciously comfortable. She seemed anxious to know where I had dropped from, and where I was going; I told her with some hesitation, fearing she would take me for an escaped maniac, as I rather think she did at first, though I took pains to talk as coherently as possible.

I asked her to send up her husband to give me what information he could about the way.

He seemed a respectable, intelligent man, and gave me a much more satisfactory account than the man in the bothy. He says it is six miles to Glen Iag, and six more to Monnar, where there is a shepherd who will set me in the very step of the way to Cluny. He was not very sure how far Cluny would be, perhaps a dozen miles, or the like of that, and then he actually mentioned a place called Tomadour, which sounded almost like being at home, for it is the nearest place and a household word to the dwellers in the happy valley of Glen Q——.

Loch Cluny too I have been at some years ago on an expedition to drive the deer; so I am fairly getting into a pays de connaissance. This sounds much less awful than taking to the hills by myself with nothing but the sun for a guide, for the landlord will himself set me to Glen Iag the first six miles on his pony, and then I shall have only eighteen to walk to Cluny. I have got half-a-dozen stout scones and as many hard-boiled eggs and a little paper of salt for the road. So hip, hip, hurrah! for short-cuts and romance.

This I have written sitting in my borrowed plaid by the fire, and now I will to bed, for I am to be called at half-past five.

Tuesday, 10th.

And so my mountains, after I had made up my mind with a great struggle to face them, were to turn out molehills, mere bugbears which had frightened foolish tourists with an empty rumor of difficulty and danger. Perhaps, after all, in writing the beginning of a formal account overnight, I had invested my expedition with an undeserved solemnity of literary importance. And to-day would be the ridiculus mus of a melancholy lack of adventures and easy travelling. Never mind. Les aventures viennent en voyageant.

The hostess called me at half-past five. I breakfasted on a basin of cream and a bit of biscuit, having no stomach for a huge soup-plate of porridge I had ordered overnight. Soon after six I set off on the landlord's fat, wheezy pony to ride the seven first practicable miles. After that, he said, the pony could not go.

"What was the name of this great mountain up whose knees we were climbing?"

"Skurnachanigan — that's the mearchant's hill. It was just two pack-men, that went wrong in the hill — they were dead when they got them; but I'm sure that's three hundred years ago — two hundred whatever. And it's no a very canny thing to find a road the like of this when it is dark; and mist is a curious thing. A man will think he knows the road and he will be ten miles; and many die for thinking that they know the road. But if it comes dark you will better just sit down for a few hours. A man cannot find his way on a road the like of this when it is dark, but a horse can. One night I was coming down from the gentlemen on the hill with games, and it came on to rain and as black as pitch. So I took hold of the mare's tail and she drew me in the recht way, and she drew me through the burn that was so full that nobody could pass it that night whatever."

After climbing about two miles we turned and descended into an oval, flat-bottomed valley, from which Skurnachanigan rose like a wall; and indeed it was enclosed all round, somewhat like a theatre.

"What's the name of this place?" said I. "Oh! it's just called by a Gaelic name Neatoch. I'll no be thinking there's any English for it."

Presuming that it was only that he did not happen to know the English word, I pressed him to explain.

"Oo! it's just suppose a doog will baark, it will give a sound."

Having thus discovered that Neatoch meant Echo, I shouted lustily, and a beautiful prolonged answer, clear and musical, rang the rocky walls of the glen and seemed to die away among the toppling heights. An echo gives back only the good elements in a sound, neglecting all the hoarse, discordant mixture which drops on the way, as the sand falls short when you throw a handful of gravel. Here is a simile for something — not clear what. Shall we say the works of an author and the response he awakes in an enlightened public? Does the enlightened public select the true and clear notes in an author's mind to echo and to dwell upon? Not perhaps at first, but let us hope it is so in the end.

We now turned to the left and got out of Neatoch into Glen Iag. Here we found the Shepherd's hut, but he did not "put me into the very step of the way" to Monnar, for it turned out there was not a step of way at all. He told me, however, to go up by the side of a certain rushing burn, and turn to the left when I should see a loch. This sounds well enough on paper, but climbing, say 1500 feet, up a steep, rough gully, with no sort of path, is serious work. It came on to rain too, and having to walk in my plaid I got very hot and thirsty. Stooping down under a small waterfall to get a drink, my foot slipped into a deep hole, and my strike-light pouch in the same moment dropped out of my pocket into the bubbling water. I snatched it out as quick as I could and found that the water had not run in among the tinder.

My feet being now wet, as I had previously encountered great difficulty in finding any walkable ground, I tried wading up the burn for a quarter of a mile or so, but it was hard climbing, besides being slippery and dangerous work among great rocks and gushing waters. So I left the bed of the torrent and scrambled up four or five hundred very precipitous feet, in hopes of better walking on what appeared to be a ledge of more level ground.

This was very stiff climbing any way, and it was the worse from a painful stiffness in my right hip, brought on no doubt by my thirty miles yesterday. Besides which I had been weakened a good deal by two days' severe sickness in the yacht, being, into the bargain, suspected by my friends of a weakness in the lungs and heart. Here was a nice position for an invalid. Breathless and almost burst, with a thumping heart shaking my ribs as if I was a badly constructed little steamboat caught in rough weather. This was really a short-cut of the most orthodox character.

I felt somewhat distressed, but consoled myself with a stanza of an Arabic poet, which (I will translate it to you) runs,

Say to him whom troubles overburden,
Misfortune is not eternal!
Even as rapture passeth away,
So shall anguish have an end.

I do not translate it into verse, but literally, meaning the ingenious reader to imply that I administered the quotation to myself in the original tongue. Do you doubt me? Here goes in Arabic:

Cáll le mén yachméeloo húmma
Enna humma la yedoom
Mithlema yafn 'almasarra
Hakaza tafn 'al hamoom.

"It shall have an end! it shall have an end!" so I climbed and plodded slowly on till I topped a ridge and saw a small lake at the bottom of a long slope. Towards this lake (Lochmenlich) a stream rising in the ridge, ran down Strathmulich, a distance of about three miles. First a whisper in the moss, then a murmur in the hollow, peaty channel, then a babbling rill, and, lastly, a brawling, roaring stream was the companion of my steps, for, as down-hill is much easier work than up, I followed its example and ran down the hill too.

Being somewhat tired and out of breath before I got to the loch, I sat down by a large stone in the midst of the strath, and smoked a cigarillo, by which the reader will discover that the soused tinder responded to the flint and steel as if nothing had happened.

On again! taking the left shore of the loch, which proved to be about a mile and a half long. I was now getting hungry, and resolved that if I did not see Monnar from the other end I would eat a scon and an egg on the spot, and so I did, slaking my thirst at the stream where it began to run down the hill-side out of the lake. After a while I descended a steep hill, from which I saw that my south passage was cut off by a narrow-ended lake and a deep, impassable looking river. Another steep descent brought me to the margin of Loch Monnar.

Here were some bothies, out of one of which I got a fiery-headed, red-eyed Yahoo, who had but little English. After a tedious cross-examination I made out of him that the lake was fordable, opposite a long, narrow tongue of sand which ran into it from the other side. My feet being already wet, "accoutred as I was I plunged in" and waded about ninety yards in some trepidation lest I should blob over head and ears; but the bottom was good and the depth pretty regular, about three feet.

There were two cottages near where I emerged. In one of them I found "no English." In the other a pretty and hospitable young woman, whose husband was away to Kintail with wool. I sat before the fire to rest, being somewhat weary, and made a little conversation with my pretty hostess, by way of civility, while two great pools ran down from my wet legs upon the mud hearth.

"How long had she been married?"

"A quarter of a year."

"How long had the courtship been?"

"A year."

"Did marriage, on experiment, come up to her expectations?"

She had not entertained very brilliant expectations, and indeed attempted to make out that she had married more to please her ardent suitor than herself—a statement which I received with a polite incredulity.

She now began to cross-question me, and I satisfied her where I was coming from and going to. She asked me whether I had ever been the way before, and on my saying no, she observed, that I "must have a very strong heart to tak' the hills aloono."

I said that, "on the contrary, I had rather a weak heart, and weak lungs besides." Hereupon she suddenly inquired—

"Will you be married?"

"No; I am not so fortunate."

"That is good luck. If I was your wife my heart would be very sore for you on the hill."

She was going to have some tea, and invited me to take a cup, which I did, and it warmed me up after my wade. Her hospitality had an independent dignity of manner, by which I plainly saw it would be an offence to offer her any remuneration, so, when I had done my tea, I shook hands and thanked her for her kindness, and I left the turf-cabin with more good-will and gratitude than is often carried away in splendid equipages from the doors of great mansions.

Here there happened to be a shooting-box of a gentleman I knew a little, and I called, but he was not there. I got some advice out of his keeper about the way. He pointed to a nick in the top of a stupendous mountain-range, about five miles off, towards which I toiled over bog and heather and hill and stream. As I approached it grew bigger and bigger; and as I labored up the long mountain-flank, I had to remind myself several times that I was supposed to have a strong heart. The climbing became steeper and steeper towards the top, so much so at last that, as I was rather unsteady on my weary legs, I was in serious fear of losing my footing, and rolling down a few hundred feet of the almost precipice, which had, however, sufficient protruding jags of rock to tear me to pieces long before I should have reached the bottom. But the worst thing that could have happened would have been to fall and break a leg, in which case I should have had perfect leisure to starve to death, without hope of rescue. So I clung to the rough rocks as if I loved them, and bestowed all my attention, with a painful effort, on my climbing. The reader will think that, with the alternative of breaking one's neck, it cannot take much effort to keep a bright look-out for the safest steppings, but when the same degree of danger lasts a long while the attention becomes wearied, and it is only when you stumble now and then, and nearly go over a precipice, that the inconvenience of being dashed to pieces affects the nerves with due seriousness.

At length I did get to the top. The western sun was flinging about his golden lights aslant the clouds and peaks and lake which lay around my eminence, but I had not time to stop and admire them.

As I plunged down into the shade behind the mountain, I was seized with a fancy that this might be the last time my shadow should stand upright in the sunshine. So I got on a rock, and threw my likeness at very full length on the other side of the corrie. I now turned to the right along the shoulder of the range, and then down a descent, if possible steeper than what I had climbed on the other side. After six or seven hundred feet of this, the slope of the mountain became more gradual. While running across this comparative level, I observed a pent-stack, and near it, all of a sudden, as if by magic, a bothy sprung out of the hill. I wondered I had not seen it before. It seemed small, and there was no smoke. Probably it was a shepherd's occasional, and now deserted, place of shelter.

I resolved to take possession, even if I had to enter by the chimney. I would light a peat-fire and dry my clothes, and gather myself a heather bed. And I had three eggs and three scones to sup upon. And would n't such be a real adventure!

Approaching still nearer in the instant anticipation of seizing it to my own use, it turned out to be a great stone; but as like a bothy, with a marked line for the eaves, and an irregular pent-house roof indicating thatch, that even when I found out my mistake, I could not reproach myself with much stupidity. Petrified (like my abortive dwelling) by this melancholy discovery, I bounded away down the swampy slope, like a rolling stone, except that I gathered a good deal of moss in my shoes.

I now perceived a lake to the left, far below, and turned towards it, with the idea that at the end of it there would be houses. The sunlight was rising to the summits of the hills. It might come on before I could get down (and the head of the lake was yet three or four miles off). I should have "to sit down for a few hours," which, with my blood heated, my feet full of puddle, and every rag of my clothes wringing wet with rain and perspiration, was not a very cheerful prospect for a consumptive patient with a very light plaid.

The sunlight was lifted from the last peaks, and only lingered in the loftier clouds. Twilight had begun. Though I was very hot, a cold shiver seemed to rise from my wet feet, and to creep all over my back, as if the darkness was pursuing me, and one of the shadowy sheriff's officers that arrest people in Nature's debt, had laid his clammy hand upon my shoulder.

I increased my pace, which was already almost dangerous, and for some time ran at about ten miles an hour, often slipping and tumbling head-over-heels, but I was lucky enough not to fall in hard places. But, independent of imagination, I felt I had received a dangerous chill, and it clung to me, though I got into a furious broil.

At last I was safe down to the river running into the lake-head. Here I found a boat, and rowed myself over. On the other side was a smart new cottage, a shooting-lodge of Captain Inge's. I presented myself and demanded shelter for the night. The captain was away, but his keeper, a most kind and civil man, gave me a change of raiment and lit me a fire in a comfortable bedroom, and took my wet things to dry. A bottle of "whiskey for gentlemen" (so ran the inscription pasted on it) was uncorked. Good hat tea followed, and, very much contrary to my expectations, I am better off to-night than I was last.

The keeper calls the lake Loch Malardich, and says, the great pass I have come over is called Balloch na Bholla, and this very hospitable lodge, Luib na Dámh. Glen Q——, which I may almost call home, is about thirty miles off. I shall not be able to get there to-morrow. I must go to bed, for it is late. I am to be called at five. To-day I have come about twenty-five miles.

Wednesday, 11th.

At seven this morning I left Luib na Damh, and followed the river Caunich up the glen to Loch Loongur. Here I turned to the left, up a wearisome rising valley, which ended, as usual, in a precipitous corrie. Up this, however, there was a decent path made by Captain Inge, between his shooting-box here and that in Glen Affric. To this last lodge (Ard Bae) I descended by an equally tedious one on the other side. The keeper did not receive me with quite so much empressement as my friend of last night. Perhaps my appearance was more dubious by daylight, now that two or three days' tramp had begun to tell on the respectability of my outward man.

I, however, asked for what I wanted without ceremony, and told him to be seated, and tell me the way while I drank my brandy and milk. In proportion as I patronized him, his respect for me began to increase, and he volunteered some bread and cheese. After this I sat some time, shivering and wretched and drowsy, in a hard, uncomfortable chair, before the kitchen fire, and had some difficulty in persuading myself to depart for Cluny, which is nine miles to add to the thirteen from Luib na Damh to Ard Bae. Luckily, there was no great hill, only a slight rise up a glen till half-way, and then a fall. After the half-way there was no road, and bad walking, soft and rough. Coming into Cluny, I heard this glen was called the Currin Mor. This third day has taken the shine out of me. I sit very weary before my bedroom fire at Rhiabaie or Cluny Inn.

Thursday, August 12th.

Started at six on a pony, and turned off the road up Glen Luyng. Very rough riding; often obliged to walk. Came at last in sight of Archy's cottage. He is the forester of Glen Q——, and his cottage only three miles from the lodge. Here I left the pony, and walked on. Soon after I saw the blue waters of "Loch Q——", that most beautiful of lochs," and my troubles ended with a pleasant welcome from my friends, who had begun to think I was lost for good. Such is a short cut of about ninety miles in the Highlands.

From Fraser's Magazine.

ON THE MARRIAGE OF NAPOLEON III.

We cannot raise our voice to swell

Her joy who mounts yon lonely throne,

Because the groans of Freedom's knell

Blend with thy triumph's every tone—

A man who mowed his people down

As coldly as he wears their crown.

We cannot say "God speed" to thee,

Though now perchance less foul thy aim,

Because upon thy garb we see

The stains of blood, the stains of shame—

Those broken oaths, that fell surprise,

Still float before our English eyes.

Let venal priests their organs blow,

And venal bards accordant sing,

(Oh! when will France the difference know

Between a tyrant and a king!)

We cannot speak, except to say

Thy darkness shows less dark to-day.

The mockeries of thy regal state,

(Oh, had those suffrages been free!)

The empire's ghost, we needs must hate;

But praise is on our lips to see

A thing of silence and of art

Show something of a human heart.

The dull monotony of kings,*

Who would not have thee in their quire,

* I feel indebted for this stanza to an article in the Spectator newspaper.

To interrupt with livelier strings,

The warblings of a Spanish lyre—

Had well beseeemed some nobler knight,

And e'en in thee looks almost bright.

Thy stream is tainted at its source,

And, though henceforth its waters flow

In blameless fertilizing course,

We still must eye them as they go.

We dare not trust—we cannot bless,

And yet to-day we loathe thee less.

Perchance thou yet mayst live to do

Good service to thy native land;

And, though we ne'er may deem thee true,

Nor Treachery's virtues understand—

We yet may learn to praise, and say

"His better life began to-day."

Unless it be that sensual fire

That torch eccentric lit alone;

Then soon the unwilling lord will tire

Of her who claimed to share his throne:

The maid, who Passion's hopes denied,

And rose to be an Emperor's bride.

Fair bride! whom yet we scarce may hail

As mother of a princely line,

For memory wakes a spectre pale,

Thy type—imperial Josephine:

A childless, loveless, outcast she—

Shall kings in France descend from thee?

AND THEN ?

THE oracle of the beautiful sequestered little hamlet of Ambermead, was an old gentleman of unobtrusive and orderly habits, whose peculiar taciturnity had obtained for him the familiar cognomen of Two Words. Mr. Canute, alias Two Words, dwelt on the outskirts of the village, tended by an ancient housekeeper, almost as chary of speech as her worthy master. It was surmised that Mr. Canute had seen better days; but though his means were straitened, his heart was large, and his countenance expressed great benevolence. Notwithstanding the brief mode of speech which characterized him on all occasions, the advice of Mr. Canute was eagerly sought on every subject whereon it was presumed advice could be profitable; and the simple rustics of Ambermead perhaps valued it the more, because, though delivered without a particle of pomposity, the terseness and decision of the words expended, left an indelible impression, which long sermons often failed to convey. Mr. Canute lived on terms of intimacy with the family at the old Hall—an intimacy cemented by early associations, for Mr. Harwell and Mr. Canute had been school-fellows; and when a painful and lingering illness attacked the squire, his ancient friend and crony felt deep anxiety as to the ultimate fate of Mr. Harwell's only child, the good and lovely Clara Harwell. The disease was an incurable one; though the suffering might be protracted, there was no hope of ultimate recovery, and an air of gloom reigned over the village of Ambermead, where once the sweet spring and summer tide brought only sport and glee. Ambermead was noted for a profusion of rich red roses, exhaling delicious fragrance; and for the song of innumerable nightingales, whose harmonious concerts resounded amid the umbrageous groves, sheltering the hamlet on every side, and extending beyond the old Hall of Ambermead. But now, although the roses bloomed and the birds sang, serious faces looked from the cottage doors; and while the younger villagers forgot their usual pastimes, the elders conversed apart in whispers, always directing their glances towards the hall, as if the sufferer within those thick walls could be disturbed by their conversation. This sympathy was called forth, not only by the circumstances of Mr. Harwell being their ancestral landlord, the last of an impoverished race, but from his always having lived among them as a friend and neighbor—respected as a superior, and beloved as an equal. Their knowledge also of the squire's decayed fortunes; and that, on his death, the fine old place must become the property of a stranger, whom rumor did not report favorably of—greatly enhanced the concern of these hereditary cultivators of the soil; and many bright eyes grew dim thinking of poor Miss Clara, who would so soon be fatherless, and almost penniless. The estate of Ambermead was strictly entailed in the male line, and the next heir was of distant kin to the Harwells. A combination of misfortunes, and no doubt of imprudence in years long by-gone had reduced the present proprietor to the verge of ruin, from which he was to find refuge only in the grave. The Harwell family had lived for centuries in Ambermead. They seem so much to belong to their poor neighbors, who always sympathized most fully in all the joys and sorrows of the "Hall folk," that now, when there was a certain prospect of losing them forever as it seemed, the parting became more than a common one between landlord and tenant, between rich and poor—it was the parting of endeared friends.

They watched and waited for Mr. Canute passing to and fro, as he did every day, and more than once a day; and on his two words they hung, as if life or death were involved in that short bulletin.

"How is the squire to-day?" said one.

"No better," replied Mr. Canute mildly, without stopping.

"And how 's Miss Clara?" inquired another with deep pity in his looks.

"Very patient," responded the old man, still moving slowly on with the aid of his stout staff.

"Patient!" repeated several voices when he was out of hearing. "Yes, yes, patient enough; and Master Canute means a deal when he says patient. Bless her young sweet face! there 's patience in it if ever there was in mortal's."

Mr. Canute's patience was sorely taxed by questioning at all hours; he was waylaid first by one, then by another, on his way from his own cottage to the Hall, but with unflinching good-nature and promptitude, he invariably satisfied the affectionate solicitude of his humble neighbors—in his own quaint way, certainly—never wasting words, yet perfectly understood.

The summer-tide was waning into autumn, and the squire of Ambermead faded more gradually than autumn leaves, when late one evening a wayfarer stopped at Mr. Canute's cottage, which was on the roadside, and requested permission to rest, asking for a draught of water from the well before the porch.

"Most welcome," said Two Words, scanning the stranger, and pleased with his appearance, for youth and an agreeable countenance are sure passports; perhaps, too, Mr. Canute discerned gentle breeding in his guest, despite travel-soiled habiliments, and a dash of habitual recklessness in his air. At any rate, the welcome was heartily given, and as heartily responded to; and when Mr. Canute left his dwelling, in order to pay his usual evening visit at the Hall, he merely said, addressing his young visitor: "Soon back;" and turning to Martha, the careful house-keeper, added; "Get supper;" while on stepping over the threshold, second thoughts urged him to return and say to the young man: "Don't go."

"No, that I won't," replied he frankly, "for I like my quarters too well. I'll wait till you come back, governor; and I hope you won't be long, for my mouth waters for the supper you spoke of."

Mr. Canute smiled, and walked away more briskly than usual; and after sitting for some time beside the sick man's bed, and bidding "good-night" and "bless you" to Clara Harwell, he retraced his steps homewards, and found supper ready, and the handsome stranger so obviously ready to do justice to the frugal fare, that Mr. Canute jocularly remarked: "Keen air;" to which the stranger replied in the same strain: "Fine scenery;" on which the host added: "An artist?" when the youth, laughing outright, said: "An indifferent one, indeed." After a pause, and suffering his mirth to subside, he continued: "Are you always so economical in words, sir? Don't you sometimes find it difficult to carry on conversation in this strain?"

"You don't," replied Mr. Canute smiling, and imperturbably good-natured.

"Not I," cried the youth; "and I want to ask you a half a hundred questions. Will you answer me?"

"I'll try," replied Mr. Canute.

"I've not long to stay, for I'm on a walking tour with a friend; but I diverged to Ambermead as I was anxious to see it. I've had a curiosity to see it for a long while; but my friend is waiting for me at the market-town, eight miles off, I think, and I shall strike across the country when the moon is up, if you'll give me a rest till then."

"Most welcome," said Mr. Canute courteously.

"Ah ha!" quoth the stranger, "if that's the way you pursue your discourse, I don't think I shall learn much from you. I hope, however, that I may get a wife who will follow your example—a woman of two words, in short; she'll be a rare specimen of her sex!"

"Ah ha!" ejaculated Mr. Canute.

"But come, tell me, for time presses," said the young man, suddenly becoming grave—"tell me all about Ambermead, and the squire—how long he's likely to last. For, in fact, the friend I mentioned, who is with me during this walking tour, is vastly interested in all that concerns the place and property."

"The heir?" whispered Mr. Canute mysteriously.

"Well, well, suppose we say he is; he's not altogether a bad fellow, though he is considered a bit reckless and wild. But he has heard of Clara Harwell's beauty and goodness from his cousin, Lady Ponsonby (she's Clara's cousin too, you know; and he is really quite sorry to think that such a lovely creature should be turned out of the old Hall to make room for him. He wants to know what will become of her when old Harwell dies, for all the world knows he's ruined. It's a pretty place this old Ambermead—a paradise, I should say. I know what I'd do, if I was ever lucky enough to call it mine." The youth rubbed his hands gleefully. "I should be a happy dog then!"

"And then?" said Mr. Canute smiling.

"Why, then, I'd pull down the rickety old house up there, and build a palace fit for a prince; I'd keep nothing but the old wine; I'd have lots of prime fellows to stay with me; and I should sport the finest horses and dogs in the country." The speaker paused, out of breath.

"And then?" said Mr. Canute quietly.

"Why, then, I'd hunt, and shoot, and ride, and drink, and smoke, and dance, and keep open house, and enjoy life to the full—feasting from year's end to year's end—the feast of reason and the flow of soul, you know, in old Ambermead!"

"And then?"

"Why, then, I suppose that in time I should grow old, like other people, and cease to care for all these things, so much as I did when strength and youth were mine."

"And then?" said Mr. Canute more slowly.

"Why, then"—and the stranger hesitated—"then, I suppose, like other people, in the course of nature, I should have to leave all the pleasures of this life, and, like other people,—die."

"And then?" said Mr. Canute, fixing his eyes, glittering like diamonds, on the young man's face, which flushed up, as he exclaimed with some irritation,—

"Oh, hang your 'and thens!' But the moon is well up, I see, so I'm off. Good-night, and thank you." And, without further parley, he started off on his walk over the hills; and Mr. Canute silently watched his guest's retreating figure, till in the deep shadows of the surrounding groves, he was lost to view. In the moonlight, in the darkness, in the valley, and on the hillside, these words haunted the wayfarer, and he kept repeating to himself, "And then?" Thoughts took possession of his mind that never before had gained entrance there, or at least they arranged themselves in a sequence which gave them quite a new significance. His past life presented itself to him for the first time as a coherent chain of events, exemplifying cause and effect; and if his plans for the future did not at that moment receive any determinate change, he still kept repeating anxiously and inquiringly, as he wandered on in the moonlight, the two strangely-suggestive words, "And then?" It proved a long and a toilsome night's journey for that belated traveller; for he had left Mr. Canute's cottage so hastily, that he had omitted to ask for certain landmarks on the hills leading to the place whither he was bound. In consequence, the stars faded in the sky, and the rosy morn broke through the eastern mists, ere the weary man, from the summit of a high hill which he had tortuously ascended, beheld afar off, down in the valley, the shining river, the bridge, and the church-tower of the town where his friend, in some anxiety, awaited his reappearance.

During all his after-life, that young man never forgot the solitary night-walk when he lost his way beneath a beautiful spangled summer sky; the stars seemed to form the letters, "And then!" the soft night-breeze seemed to whisper in his ear: "And then?"

It is true, he had not gained the intelligence he sought respecting the inmates of Ambermead Hall; but he had laid bare his own folly for the inspection of Mr. Canute; and, in return, he had listened to no reproof—no tiresome lecture vouchsafed from proxy age to ardent youth, but simply two words had penetrated his heart, and set him a thinking seriously. Mystic little words! "And then?"

For nearly three years after Mr. Harwell's decease, the old Hall, contrary to general anticipation, remained untenanted, save by domestics left in charge. Miss Clara had found shelter with her relative, Lady Ponsonby, though her memory was still fresh and warmly cherished among the humble friends in her beautiful native village. Mr. Canute, if possible, more silent than ever, still remained the village oracle; perhaps more cherished than of yore, inasmuch as he was the only memento remaining of the beloved Harwell—the old familiar faces now seen no more. He would listen, and they would talk, of days gone by; he felt the loss even more than others, for he mourned a companion and friend in Mr. Harwell, and Clara had been to the good Two Words as an adopted daughter. At length it was rumored that Mr. Selby, the new proprietor, was soon expected to take possession of his property in due form; moreover, that he was on the point of marriage, and that his young bride would accompany him. Ill reports fly quickly; and it had been circulated in former times that Mr. Selby was wild and extravagant, careless of others, selfish and profligate. Indeed, Mr. Canute had not contradicted such reports, so it was generally opined they were too true, and had a legal foundation. With heavy hearts, the inhabitants of Ambermead commenced their rural preparations for the reception of the squire and his bride; green arches were erected, and wreaths of flowers were hung on the spreading branches beneath which the travellers' road lay. It was the season of roses and nightingales, when Ambermead was in its glory; and never had the rich red roses bloomed so profusely, and never had the chorus of the groves been more full and enchanting, than on the summer evening when the old and young of the hamlet, arrayed in their holiday attire, waited to greet the new-comers.

Mr. Canute stood at his cottage door; the bridge just beyond, over which the route conducted to the Hall through avenues of greenery, was festooned with roses; and a band of maidens in white lined the picturesque approach. The sun was setting, when a carriage drove quickly up, slackening its pace as it crossed the bridge, and stopping at Mr. Canute's humble gate. Two Words himself, bareheaded, stepped forwards on seeing a lady alight, who in another moment threw herself into his arms, exclaiming: "Our first greeting must be from you, dear, dear Mr. Canute! I need not introduce Mr. Selby—he is known to you already." Speechless from astonishment and emotion, the old man could only say, "Miss Clara!"—as he gazed from one to another, recognizing in the gentleman the wayfaring guest who had departed so abruptly on his walking expedition over the moonlight hills, more than three years previously. Seizing the hand which Mr. Canute silently extended, Mr. Selby said with deep feeling:—

"It is to your instrumentality that I owe my present happiness."

"How so?" was Mr. Canute's reply, looking with pleased surprise into the open face, which, on a former occasion, had won his confidence and admiration.

"Two words spoken in season wrought a change in me, which all the preaching of friends and guardians had failed to effect," returned Mr. Selby, "and without which Clara never would have blessed me with her hand. These years of probation have proved my sincerity; and Lady Ponsonby (a severe and scrutinizing judge) pronounced my reformation complete ere she permitted me to address Clara. Those two little words, "And then?" enigmatical to the uninitiated, convey a deep and mystical meaning to my heart; and they are of such significant import, that by inserting them whenever I paint the future, I trust to become a wiser and a better man."

Clara gazed proudly and confidently on her husband; and the news of her arrival having spread through the village, a crowd collected, whose joy and surprise found vent in tears and blessings, to say nothing of numerous asides, purporting that Miss Clara never would have espoused a bad man ; ergo, Mr. Selby must be a worthy successor of the ancient race !

The prognostication proved correct ; and the pathway, strewn with bright summer roses, over which Clara trod in bridal pomp on her way to the ancestral home where she was born, was indeed emblematical of the flowerly path which marked her future destiny.

The old Hall of Ambermead is still extant — a fine specimen of venerable decay, surrounded by ancestral groves, still famed for sheltering innumerable nightingales when the Ambermead roses exhale their delicious fragrance. In the old church-yard on the green hill-side, a white monument gleams in the sunshine, whereon may be traced the name of John Canute, specifying the date of his happy death, while below is engraven this inscription of two words — “ And then ? ”

HAUNTED GROUND.

BY DORA GREENWELL.

It is the soul that sees.

THE rest have wandered on —

Stay thou with me, dear friend, awhile, awhile ;
This air is full of voices, leading on,
As o'er enchanted isle.

This ground is writ all o'er

With the soul's history ; I may not choose,
Spell-bound, but pause above this living lore
To linger and to muse.

We give of what we take

From life of outward things ; our spirits leave,

Where they have been, a glory in their wake
More bright than they receive.

And this was once my home ;

The leaves, light rustling o'er me, whisper clear —

“ The sun but shines where thou dost roam,
It smiled upon thee here. ”

And these are of the things

That God hath taken from me, safe to keep ;
Sometimes, to let me look on them, he brings
Them to me in my sleep ;

And I have been in sleep

So oft among them, now their aspect seems
The vague soft glow vanishing, to keep,
Of half remembered dreams.

Thou shouldst have been with me

Of old, dear friend, as now ! and borne a part
In all that was — then Life were filled with thee
As wholly as the Heart.

Then hadst thou won mine eyes

My soul to look through — half it angers me
To think a sweetness on the years can rise
That is not mixed with thee !

Yet stoop with me to trace

These olden records, over-run with bloom ;
The Dead are underneath, and yet the place
Looks hardly like a tomb.

This is the wood-walk ; oft

I feel a clasp detaining — not the fold
Of clinging bind-weed — far more close and soft,

For here in days of old

My earliest friend with me

Walked hand in hand ; we sat long hours upon
CCCLXVI. LIVING AGE. VOL. I. 15

This bank ; and I am on the earth, but she
Had wings, and she is gone.

See ! see ! the ancient hall

With sunset on it ! Now the windows flame
In evening light — they flash and glitter all —
And one looks still the same

As when my mother kept

Upon me, while I played, an eye of love ;
Since then, it oft has watched me while I wept
Still, Mother, from above.

As then she used to smile,

And softly stroke my head ; so now my heart
These gentle memories stroke and soothe—awhile,

Awhile we will not part.

Kind shadows ! from the door,

At noon-day with a joyous shout flung wide
I see the merry children rush, and pour
A swift unfettered tide —

The old domestic, gray

And bowed with weight of many years, whose look

And grave kind smile still followed on the way
Our flying footsteps took.

Such wealth was his in store

Of loving words — when fain he would be stern
And chide our rovings, all his speech the more
To tenderness would turn !

As twilight brings a face

Drawn faint, yet perfect, on the darkening wall ;

So on me rise the spirits of each place,

Yet bring not gloom withal.

Heaven's wasted wealth, the gold

It gave for treasure slighted and ungraced,
Earth's kindly seeds of love on soil too cold
Let darkly run to waste,

That needed but our care

To bloom forever round the heart serene ;
These, these the forms of evil things that were,
Of good that might have been.

Time gathers silently,

Yet from their ashes troubling phantoms sends
More stern than these of happy hours gone by,
Than these of buried friends.

More sad than these that smile

And whisper, “ Now thou comest as a guest Where once thou dwelt — yet mourn not thou the while,

Because thou hast been blest ! ”

A ROYAL WHIM.

FROM THE GERMAN OF WILHELM MEINHOLD, AUTHOR OF "THE AMBER WITCH," &c.

WE are about to tell our readers a very strange event that occurred in the reign of Frederick William I. of Prussia, father of the great Frederick, and a man generally disliked on account of his rough and frequently tyrannical manner, but who was really one of the best regents of his fatherland, as he alone (and to this his son afterwards bore testimony) was the real founder of its future greatness.

This extraordinary man, who should be judged by the customs of the age in which he lived, in order to prove him extraordinary both in his errors and his virtues, had one passion which far outweighed all others—namely, love for the chase. We remember reading in his historian, Förster, that within one year he killed upwards of 3000 partridges with his own gun, without taking the other game into account, in which the queen was the greatest sufferer, as she had to find him, according to a marriage contract, in powder and shot gratis. When there was nothing for him to shoot in his own forests, he never declined the invitations of the landed gentry to pay them a visit.

Thus it happened that—it might be about the year 1720—the rich landed proprietor, Von W——, sent his majesty an invitation to a wolf-hunt, with the humble request that he would bring his most illustrious consort with him, as the nobleman's wife had formerly belonged to her majesty's suite.

On a fine September day, then, the king and queen, with several officers and ladies of the bedchamber, as well as the court fool, Baron von Gündling, arrived at the nobleman's ancestral château. On the very next day the chase commenced, and Von Gündling, who found as little pleasure in the sports of the field as the king did in the arts and sciences, took a solitary walk in the meadows, and lay down to read in the long grass.

But before we hear what happened further, we must first give our readers a description of this strange man. He was, as we have already remarked, the king's fool, and had received all imaginable titles and honors, in order to afford his majesty and the court still greater sport. In fact, his Excellency, the Supreme Master of the Ceremonies, Privy Councillor, and President of the Academy of Arts, Baron von Gündling, acquired such arrogance through his titles, that nothing could be more comical than the contrast between these dignities and the indignities he had to suffer daily, even from the youngest lieutenants. His excellency on such occasions would grow very angry—the very thing his tormentors wished—and would lay a protest before the king against a man of his rank being so treated, which naturally increased the general laughter. Through such scenes, which were in that day considered remarkably comical, our fool had become a necessity for the king and court. Besides, we may add that he was a walking lexicon, and had to give all possible explanations in the daily meetings of the so-termed "tabaks collegien." His pedantry, in fact, was the best thing about him; as for wit he possessed as little as a mule; but, to make up for it, he could be as vicious and obstinate as that amiable animal.

The Baron von Gündling, then, lay at full length in the grass, in his peculiar dress, the chief ornament of it being an immense full-bottomed wig, and in such a position that only the locks of his peruke could be seen as he moved from side to side. A gentleman who arrived rather late for the chase happened to notice it, and, taking it for some strange animal, fired point blanc at the wig, but very fortunately missed it. His excellency sprung up immediately, in the highest indignation, and cried out,

"You vagabond rascal, how dare you——?"

The gentleman, however, when he perceived that the strange animal must necessarily belong to the royal suite, did not wait to reply, but ran off at full speed to the neighboring forest. The baron, however, was not satisfied with this, but, as he saw a man ploughing at a short distance from him, he called out in his arrogant manner,

"Come hither, man!"

The reply he received was,

"I have no time or inclination to do so; but if you'll speak civilly, I may."

His excellency was not accustomed to such an answer; he, therefore, walked towards the impudent ploughman with upraised stick, and was about to apply it to his back, when he noticed that it was the clergyman of the village, whom he had seen the preceding evening at the nobleman's château. The baron, therefore, lowered his stick, and contented himself by punishing the clergyman with his tongue.

"How can he be such an impertinent ass? Does he not know who I am?"

"Oh, yes! he's the king's fool."

His excellency trembled with rage, and raised his stick again; but on measuring the sturdy pastor from head to foot, and seeing no help near, he let it fall for the second time, and merely uttered the threat,

"Just wait, my fine fellow. I'll tell the king you pretend to be a pastor, and yet go out ploughing."

The clergyman replied, quite calmly,

"My gracious master will probably remember that Cincinnati was ploughed too, and he was a dictator, while I am only a poor village pastor."

"Yes," the baron said, after inspecting his coarse and peasant-like dress; "but when Cincinnatus ploughed, he did not look like a common peasant."

"I am certain he did not look like a fool," the clergyman replied, as he drove his oxen on.

This was too much for the baron, and he rushed away towards a peasant he saw approaching, vowing vengeance on the impudent pastor, whom he determined to ruin on the first opportunity.

He was very glad, then, to find in the peasant a most determined enemy to the clergyman, who complained bitterly of his sternness, and of the fact of his compelling him to make up a quarrel he had carried on very successfully with his wife for several weeks.

Our fool was clever enough to see that this anecdote would not be of any service to him in trying to injure the pastor with the king; he therefore answered, most pathetically, "But the pastor was perfectly in the right; that could do you no harm?"

"Well that's very true," the peasant replied, "especially as he's getting old, and can't carry on as he used; but I'm sure when his son takes his place—a fellow like a church steeple—he'll break all our bones for us. For that reason, if the matter was left to me, I would n't choose him for our clergyman; for if the patron is to beat us on work-days, and the pastor play the same game on Sunday, when will our backs find time to get well?"

Gündling now listened attentively, and his plan was soon formed, when he learned that the pastor's son would return from Halle in a few days to preach his trial sermon on the next Sunday, as the patron had promised him his father's living. He therefore quitted the peasant with a mocking smile, and made some pretext for visiting the sexton, to make further inquiries into the matter. The latter confirmed the story, and gave his opinion that the young master must be at least six feet two in height, and as straight as a poplar-tree.

"Wait!" Gündling murmured between his teeth, as soon as he again reached the street; "we will put a blue coat on the young fellow, and that will annoy that vagabond preacher." He therefore returned to the chateau, where he looked up a captain of his acquaintance, whom he took on one side, with the hurried question, "How many fellows have you already got?"

To understand this question, our readers must know that the king, at every review, requested each commander of a company to present his new recruits to him. If the poor gentleman had less than three he fell into partial disgrace; and so each captain, about review time, which was close at hand, tried to procure a few young men by any method, legal or illegal, but especially those particularly tall, for the king had a peculiar delight in such soldiers.

"Woe is me! I've but one," the officer replied, "and he's only a journeyman tailor."

"Well, then," Gündling replied, "you can get a journeyman clergyman of six feet two."

"Well, that's no tremendous height, but still it's better than nothing."

The captain then requested an explanation, and both discussed the measures by which to get hold of the clergyman's son. They soon agreed that the officer should feign illness when the king departed. Gündling would remain with him as company; a few soldiers would be secretly procured from a neighboring town, and the young candidate taken volens volens by the ears, and transported to the next garrison.

In the mean while, the king and his suite followed the chase on the next day with their usual ardor. It so happened that two ladies in attendance on the queen, tortured by ennui, followed the windings of the stream, which led them from the nobleman's garden into the open fields. One of them, Wilhelmine von B—, was a young and charming creature, and was evidently attempting to cheer her companion, who was silent, and not nearly so charming. In consequence there was a deal of laughing, which might have been heard at some distance off, and might have led to the conclusion that the old, though still ever new, story of marriage and love was being discussed by the ladies. They had gradually wandered some quarter of a mile from the village, when a wolf, probably disturbed by the beaters, and which they at first took for a dog, ran towards them, regarding them with a look which they interpreted: "This little darling I'll make my breakfast off, and the other little darling I'll leave on that bed of forget-me-nots till supper time."

The poor girls had not in the least expected such a bridegroom, and stood petrified with fear as soon as they recognized the animal, for they possibly did not know that a wolf, in the summer or autumn, would attack nobody, and that the Isegrim who fascinated their eyes was, probably, as much afraid of them as they were of him. The silent young lady sobbed out a masculine name—we presume that of her lover—while the charming one, after recovering from her first terror, looked round on all sides for assistance.

Suddenly a carriage made its appearance from a branch road, drawn by two horses, in which a young and handsome man was sitting. Both ladies cried out together in joyful surprise when they perceived this unexpected assistance, and the wolf immediately ran off, and took up his station some distance from them. "You have saved us from death," the charming Wilhelmine said, as she approached the young man, who immediately ordered the coachman to stop, and leaped from the carriage. After begging, in the style of French gallantry, to have his doubts cleared up as to whether he looked upon nymphs or hamadryads, or actual mortals, and all possible explanations had been furnished him, he presented himself to the ladies as the son of the old pastor, and just arrived from Halle, in order to act as curate to his father. The young man, whom we will call Carl, then invited the ladies to take seats in his vehicle, and thus return to the château.

The ladies quickly accepted this invitation, and Carl had the pleasure of lifting them into the lofty carriage, in which he also took his seat, exactly opposite the fair Wilhelmine, who, however, was cruel enough, for some time, to look every way but at him. At length, when he began to speak of Halle, where he had been several years "Famulus," at the house of Freylinghausen, she turned her eyes with pleasure towards him, for she was well acquainted with this poet, and became so eloquent that her companion blushed, nudged her repeatedly, and at length whispered in her ear, "Ah, mon Dieu! he's not a nobleman." Wilhelmine, however, paid no attention to her, and as the young man was very well read, and recited several of Freylinghausen's newest poems, the time passed so quickly, that they stopped before the rectory almost without perceiving it. Here all the family assembled round the carriage, and wished to embrace their dear relative; but this he declined, and first presented his fair companions, who were immediately invited into the rectory, while the silent one at first declined, but the other immediately accepted.

After the first stormy salutation the old clergyman clasped his hands, and commenced the hymn, "Praise God for all his gifts!" in which the whole family joined; among them our friend Carl, with such a splendid tenor voice, that the young lady could not refrain from saying, after the hymn was ended,

"If you would do me a real favor, you would sing me that song of Freylinghausen's which you recited to us on our road here."

This request was so flattering, that Carl could not refuse to comply with it. He therefore sang, as solo, the song, "My heart should feel contented," without the least idea that, in a very short time, not merely all his consolation, but all his good fortune, would originate from this song.

The charming Wilhelmine was highly delighted when he had finished the song; and the two ladies took their leave, on the earnest persuasion of the silent one of the two. Carl politely accompanied them to the neighboring gate of the château, where they parted with mutual compliments.

The young man felt for the first day or two as if he had lost something necessary to his existence; but as the difference of rank between himself and a lady of the royal suite appeared to him an insurmountable obstacle, he soon forgot the strange adventure, in which he was materially assisted by the composition of his trial sermon, which he was to preach the next Sunday before his patron and the congregation. In the mean while, however, the king and his suite had returned to Berlin, while Gündling and the captain remained behind to carry out their treacherous scheme. The captain pretended to be suffering from a frightful attack of gout, and had secretly ordered a corporal and six men to come on the ensuing Sunday night from the neighboring garrison of G——n, as he had learned that their kind host intended to pay a visit at a gentleman's house some thirty miles off, as soon as the candidate's sermon was ended, and would not return for a week. During that time they expected to have the young recruit so securely hidden away, that any reclamation would be unavailing; and besides, the king's adjutant, who attended to all military affairs, was the captain's cousin. Gündling, after his usual fashion, rubbed his stomach with both hands, as he thought of the pastor's terrible despair at the loss of his beloved son.

As soon as the anxiously-desired Sunday arrived, both gentlemen went to the overcrowded church; the captain, as he hypocritically told his host, to return thanks for his sudden and fortunate recovery, but in truth, to have a nearer look at his young recruit, whose height he was delighted with, and paid Gündling repeated compliments for his discrimination. The poor young man gained complete approbation from his patron and the whole parish, and even Gündling, after the service was over, approached the pastor, and treacherously praised his good fortune in having such a son. We must say, that the captain, to his credit, was not guilty of such hypocrisy in this case.

At a late hour in the evening, which was both stormy and cold, the sound of arms and a loud knocking was heard at the door of the parsonage. The door was at length opened by the unfortunate Carl, with the words.

"Who are you, and what do you want at this unseasonable hour of the night?"

"We want you!" the captain exclaimed, as he sprang forward, and seized the young man by the arm. "You must come with us, and change your black coat for a blue one."

We may easily imagine the terror of the wretched man, who, only partly dressed, was standing speechless before them, when his old father, who had heard this conversation, rushed out of bed, and interposed between them. He, too, was unable at first to speak through terror, when he perceived in the moonlight the soldiers, and among them Gündling, who burst into a loud laugh on seeing the father's agony. This insult restored the old man to consciousness, and crying, "You villainous Judas!" he rushed with clenched fists at the baron. Carl, however, interposed; but as the old man could not be calmed, and the confusion and cries had become general, for the mother and sisters had joined them, the young man repeatedly begged to be allowed to speak; and when he gained permission, he addressed the following question to his father:

"Do you believe that our Heavenly Father is aware of my fate, or not?"

At this all were silent; but when the question was repeated, the old man replied:

"Why do you ask such a question! How should He, who knows everything, not be aware of your fate?"

"Well, then," the son calmly replied, "if you believe that, you must not forget that 'all things work together for good to those who love God.' I love Him, and willingly yield to my fate; and will only dress myself, and then be ready to follow the captain."

"No!" the latter replied, "you must come directly. Allons — march!"

All ran after the unfortunate man, crying to him, and striving to retain him, but in vain. Father, mother, and sisters were driven back by the butt-ends of the muskets.

"He will not be frozen," the captain cried, "before getting out of the village, and then he'll put on his accoutrements."

We will not attempt to give any description of the condition of the sorrowing family, as a soldier's life in that day was not merely the most disgraceful, but also the most wretched on earth; and many a father, had the choice been left him, would sooner have seen his son in his coffin than in the colored coat.

The unhappy father waited in vain for a letter from his son from one week — from one month to another. The captain had taken all necessary precautions to cut off every opportunity for communication. No one knew what had become of him, and although it was so very difficult, on this very account, to claim him, still both pastor and patron attempted it, though, as may be easily imagined, in vain. After repeated petitions to his royal majesty, they at length received a very harsh reply from the minister of war himself; that they made a most insane request in asking them to look for a recruit in the ranks of the whole Prussian army, when no one, not even themselves, knew where he was; and he must be getting on well, or else he would have written to them.

Two years thus elapsed, without the disconsolate father, who had long before received a young curate to assist him, hearing the least news about his son, and therefore supposed that he had died through the cold on that frightful evening, or at the halberts.

At length, when the second year had just ended, he received a message from the neighboring town to say that his son was in good health, and intended to visit him that same evening in company with the lady of the Dean of P—. When their joy at this unexpected news, which appeared to the old man almost fabulous, was moderated, and a thousand questions asked of the messenger, no one could certainly furnish any explanation as to his strange companion; but this was their least anxiety. "The dean's lady," the old mother gave it as her opinion, "will soon be tired of us." And long before evening the whole family set out to welcome their Joseph as the old man called him. They had just arrived at the cross-road we have already visited, when a carriage drove up, out of the window of which a charming little white hand was stretched, and a silvery voice uttered the words, "Yes, yes, dear Carl, here it was that you saved me from the wolf." At the moment he looked out he recognized his parents. A cry of joy burst from him, which was echoed by the whole family. The coachman was bidden to stop, the lady and gentleman sprang out, and it was some time before the old father could say, "Now, then, tell us all, you wicked boy; you caused us much grief by not writing a single word."

"I could, I dare not," Carl replied. "The captain made me pledge my honor that I would not send you any news of my place of abode. If I kept my word, he promised to give me my liberty at the end of three years."

"And the worthy captain set you free at the expiration of two," his father remarked.

"Not he!" Carl replied. "Death alone could have saved me from his clutches. I owe my liberty to our glorious king."

"Tell us — tell us how," all cried; "let the carriage drive home."

"Yes," the patron cried, who had come to share in the general joy, "send the carriage away. I must know all about it. We will take our seats on this bank."

All — among them the dean's lady, to whom no one had yet paid any attention — seated themselves on the grassy couch, and kept their eyes fixed on the young man, who wiped away his tears, and then commenced thus:—

How badly I fared, and how grieved I was at not being able to send any news to my dear parents and sisters, I need not tell you. My only trust was in God; for, had I not had Him to support me, I should have acted like a hundred others — either deserted, or put an end to my life. But my faith, which daily found nourishment in the beautiful text with which I quitted you on that night of terror, "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God," supported me in all my necessities.

Thus it happened that, just fourteen days ago, I stood as sentinel in the grand corridor of the royal palace at Berlin. I was thinking, as usual, of home, and as I felt very low-spirited, and, besides, fancied the neighboring apartments unoccupied, I commenced singing that sweet song of Freydinghausen, "My heart should feel contented;" when I was singing the third verse, a door opened to my great embarrassment, and I saw this lady's head.

"Ah! the dean's lady," the old pastor said, as he bowed to her. "Now I am beginning to see more clearly into matters." And he straightway poured forth a multitude of apologies for not having noticed her before, through his immoderate joy at his son's return.

"But, father," the son inquired, "do you not recognize the lady?"

The old man, however, and his wife, had long forgotten the features. One of Carl's sisters at length said:

"That must be the young lady, if I am not mistaken, whom you saved from the wolf?"

"Certainly," Carl replied; "and at this very spot where we are now sitting so happily together."

But as all began crying, "Proceed, proceed with your story," he continued it in the following fashion:

As soon as I saw the head I was in great fear, and ceased singing. The lady, however, came very kindly towards me, measured me from head to foot, and at length said:

"I could scarce believe my ears when I heard that voice, but my eyes cannot deceive me. Surely you are the son of the clergyman of H——, who saved me from the wolf two years ago?"

"I am that unhappy man," I said to her; and then proceeded to tell her what a frightful revenge Gündling had taken. Her eyes filled with tears, and she seemed to me like an angel sent from on high to comfort me.

"You saved me from a wolf," she exclaimed, "and I will now do as much for you;" and then hurried back into the room. I stood there with a beating heart, till a page approached me with the words:

"Sentinel, as soon as you are released from duty you must go through that door, and present yourself to her majesty the queen."

I need not say with what anxiety I waited for the hour.

At length I was relieved, and, trembling, I entered the queen's apartments. She asked my history very graciously, and when I had finished it, she added:

"I can do nothing for you, my son, but I will beg the general to see that you are on duty here to-morrow morning between eleven and twelve, the hour at which the king pays me a visit. Then sing, with your clear voice that pleased me so much, any verse you like of his majesty's favorite hymn — 'Who puts his trust in God alone.' I will then see what more I can do for you."

With these words her majesty dismissed me, and without the door I met this lady, who whispered to me, "Courage, courage; I trust all will be well."

As I expected, I was placed on duty before the queen's apartments the next morning at eleven o'clock. As soon as I heard voices within I commenced singing a verse of the hymn that had been commanded. However, I expected in vain to be summoned again. The hour passed, and I fancied that no attention had been paid to me; and I despaired, for I did not dare sing another verse.

"And yet," the young lady here interrupted the narrator, "all proper attention had been paid to your hymn, and I may be permitted to give an account of it, as Carl has already become my dear husband."

Another cry of astonishment was here raised: "What! what! your husband!" all exclaimed. "I fancied you were a dean's wife," the old pastor remarked. "I never heard of such a thing," the patron murmured, for he knew the lady was of very old family, and both he and the pastor seemed scarce to know whether they were awake or dreaming.

"You must then hear my story," the young lady remarked, with a smile:

The voice delighted both their majesties greatly, and as soon as I perceived this I began saying everything I could in favor of the young man without, till the king laughed and said:

"Why, she must be in love with the fellow."

I felt that I blushed at this remark, but still answered boldly:

"Yes, your majesty, for he saved me, two years ago, from a frightful wolf."

"Diable!" the king added. "You are of a very old family, and might get a lieutenant, as far as I know."

Here the queen interposed, and begged his majesty, who was in very good-humor that day, not to torment me further. I had opened my whole heart to her, and was determined on having this grenadier, or no one else, for my husband. "I must beg your majesty to remember," the queen continued, "how carefully this good girl attended to our child in its last illness."

"Well!" the king remarked, "we'll see. The captain praises the fellow; but still she cannot by any possibility marry a simple curate. Well, as I said, we'll see. I'll examine the fellow myself; but apropos suppose he will not have you?"

I did not know what answer to make to this inquiry, save by letting my eyes sink on the ground; but the queen came to my assistance, by saying, "Your majesty will be best fitted to arrange that matter."

"Well, that's very true," the king replied. "We'll see, then; the fellow will not be such a fool as to refuse." And with these words his majesty left the room, apparently in deep thought.

"That is the end of my story," the young lady said, "and my husband must proceed with his now."

Carl, therefore, continued:

I naturally believed that I had been quite unnoticed, especially as nothing of the slightest importance occurred during the remainder of the day that might nourish my hopes.

The next morning, however, at parade, the king cried out, after he had finished all other affairs,

"Where is the fellow who stood as sentry yesterday morning between eleven and twelve at the queen's door!—let him step out the ranks."

With a beating heart I obeyed this order, on which his majesty, without moving a feature, first measured me from head to foot, and then said, "Two under-officers here—take the fellow's coat off!" I could fancy nothing else than that I was going to be tied up to the halberts for my unseasonable singing, and therefore began tremulously, "I implore your majesty, with all submission——" but the king interrupted me: "Don't argue—take his waistcoat off!" The under-officers did what they were commanded, and the king in the same tone, and without moving a feature, said—"Now his gaiters!"

I now fancied I was going to be impaled at the least, and entreated, in my fear, "I beg your majesty, on my knees, to be merciful to a poor fellow;" but the same answer was given me—"Don't argue."

As I stood there in my shirt sleeves, the king ordered—"Now, bring that black chest hither to the front."

I was now certain of death when I saw this chest brought up, in which I fancied an executioner's sword, at the very least, was contained. I clasped my hands, and commended my soul to God, when the king, before whom the chest had been deposited, cried out to me. "Now, look in, and see how that suits you."

As soon as I raised the lid, I saw, not a sword or any instrument of torture, but a black clerical dress, and the bands laid on the top of it. This change in my feelings almost took my senses away, but the king's voice again aroused me. "Now, dress yourself immediately, and listen to what I say. Bring four drums here, and lay a dozen side-arms across them, so that he cannot tumble through. The grenadier shall preach us a sermon, for I must first examine him, and see if he has learned anything. If he sits firm in the saddle, as the saying is, he can keep the black stuff, and all it contains; but if he's a stupid ass, I'll make him put the coat on again. Now, then, up on the drums; you need not give it us long, but it must be good."

Assuredly (the young man continued) I should have talked nothing but nonsense, through the agitated nature of my feelings, and the fact that such a terrible alternative was offered me; but to my great good fortune, during the whole duration of my wretched servitude, I had daily thought of my favorite text, and determined I would preach on it the very first Sunday after my release. In fact, from continually thinking on the subject, I had the whole discourse long before ready in my mind. I, therefore, boldly mounted the drums, and began immediately with the words—"St. Paul says, in Rom. viii. 28, 'And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God;'" after which I gave a detailed account of my own misfortunes, which had worked together for good by the confirmation of my faith, and then made an universal and particular application of it.

I had noticed that the king, who stood close before me, and never once took his eyes off me, could not keep the tears from pouring down his cheeks; and I had scarce uttered the word "Amen," when he said to me, "Now, come down from your pulpit; you can keep the black coat, and all it contains. You had better inspect the pockets, and see what you have got in them."

During my discourse, I had noticed that one of them seemed heavier than the other. I therefore put my hand into that one first, and who could picture my astonishment, when I drew out a gold tabatière filled with ducats. I was silently regarding it, when the king said, "That is a present from my wife; but now look, and see whether there is anything in the other pocket;" and, not yet able to utter a word through surprise, I drew out my appointment as dean, signed by the king's own hand.

"How is that possible! such a thing was never heard of!" the old pastor exclaimed, as he raised his hands to heaven. "My son a dean! A candidate and private in the Grenadiers a dean! Yes! now I understand why you sent to tell us you would visit us in company with the dean's lady. But not to ask your poor old father to the wedding—as if you were ashamed of him—that is unpardonable."

"Did I know anything about my marriage?" the son continued; "but listen further."

I naturally tried, after all these fabulous events, to murmur out my thanks, but was interrupted by the king, who said, "Now come up to the palace; you can eat your soup with us, and the regimental chaplain must accompany you."

Giddy with the thought of all that had happened, I followed with the chaplain, who was hardly less astonished than I was, the king and his suite to the palace; and as soon as we had entered the audience-room, where all the court was assembled together with her majesty and this young lady, the king advanced, and asked me,

"Whom does he think he has to thank for all this?"

I answered, with a low bow,

"Besides God, my most gracious king and his most illustrious consort."

To which his majesty remarked,

"There he's right; but look ye here, this young and charming woman did the most for him. Has he nothing to say to her? She is not proud, and I know not married. What does he think of it? he's now a dean, and has his pocket full of ducats. Will he try his luck, and fancy he is all alone with her?"

Half mad with joy and hope, I raised my eyes, and looked at the poor girl, who was blushing and trembling before me, and who could not raise her eyes from the ground.

All were silent, though at intervals a slight sound of laughter could be heard in the room. In spite of all my good fortune, I was even more embarrassed than I had been an hour before when forced to mount the drums; but I collected myself, and in a few moments said,

"His majesty the king, to whom I owe all my good fortune, has inspired me with courage to ask you before this great assembly, whether you will accompany me in my wanderings on the troubled path of life, like the angel Raphael formerly guided the youthful Tobias?"

She immediately gave me her hand, silent and trembling, which I pressed with ardor to my lips, and her majesty had scarcely bidden God to bless us, when the king added,

"Regimental chaplain, come hither and marry them. Afterwards we'll have our dinner; but I must get them off my hands to-day."

The chaplain, with a deep bow, remarked, "It is impossible, your majesty; the young couple have not been asked in church."

"Nonsense!" the king objected; "I asked them myself long ago. Come, and marry them as quickly as you can, for I am hungry. Next Sunday you can ask them in church as many times as you like."

Although the chaplain urged various reasons, all was of no avail. The marriage took place that very hour, and my parents can now see why it was impossible for me to invite them.

"I really must be dreaming," the old pastor now said; "why, it's stranger than any story in the 'Arabian Nights.' A grenadier made a dean! But what did the members of the consistory say to it? I cannot imagine."

"They kept me so long," the young man replied, "or I should have come to share my joy with you eight days ago. I had scarcely announced myself, and handed in my diploma with a request to be ordained, when the gentlemen, as may be easily conceived, declared the whole affair impossible, and sought to demonstrate this to his majesty in a long petition. The king returned it with these words, written with his own hand, on the margin:

"I have examined him myself. If he does not understand Latin he can afford to keep some one who does. I do not understand Latin myself."

'FREDERICK WILLIAM.'

"As they did not dare to trouble the king again in the matter, they proceeded to ordain me, after an examination, to which I voluntarily submitted."

The young man thus ended his story, and our kind readers can easily imagine the rest. We need only remark that our hero made an excellent dean, and for many years held the living of P—.

In conclusion, we are bound to state that the above anecdote is historically true, and that we have merely repeated the family tradition. Still we thought it better to refrain from giving the real names, as the descendants of our illustrious grenadier might not desire the story to be publicly known in connection with themselves.

From the Ladie's Companion.

MADAME SCARRON, HER FRIENDS AND RELATIVES.

FROM THE FRENCH.

THE age of Louis the Fourteenth forms one of the most striking periods in French history. Voltaire would have said this to-day as he did a hundred years ago; for a great age is not composed solely of splendid actions or heroic conquests. It is one which gives birth to great generals and distinguished philosophers, and to celebrated poets and artists. We say, The age of Pericles, of Augustus, of Leo the Tenth, and of Louis Quatorze. We never say, The age of Napoleon, because in Napoleon's time there was scarcely one man worthy of a niche in the temple of history besides the hero himself. Around Louis Quatorze we behold a radiant galaxy of distinguished men: Turenne and Condé, Malebranche and Pascal, Corneille and Molière, Poussin and Lesueur, Perrault, Fontaine, and Sully.

There are likewise some feminine stars in this shining cluster, who have transmitted the remembrance of their charms and graces for the admiration of remote generations. Such are the Farnarina, Madame de la Vallière, and the Marquise de Pompadour. Madame de Maintenon does not rank with these. Her box-wood rosaries have repelled many admirers. One does not exactly know in whose company to place her. Was she a heroine of romance, or a saintly personage? a monarch's favorite, or the Queen of France and Navarre?

She had a few partisans; we attempt not to count her enemies. Since beholding her portrait, engraved by Mercuri after Petitot, we avow ourselves a partisan. This picture represents a proud and majestic woman, of a beauty at the same time robust and delicate; with the head of the Psyche of Praxiteles, and the neck and shoulders of St. Theresa. The voluptuousness that reigns in the figure is corrected by the pride that prevails in the countenance. The heart and passions are evidently held in subjection to the intellect. Such was the woman beloved of a prince who scarcely believed himself mortal.

Let us go back to this talented woman's origin. It is said of her grandfather, Agrippa d'Aubigné, that "at six years of age he could read in four languages; and at seven and a half translated Plato." At ten, his father, the old Huguenot soldier, in passing Amboise, where the heads of the conspirators were yet suspended to the battlements, said to the boy, "These butchers have decapitated France!" Then, laying his hand upon the child's brow, he added, "My son, spare not thine own life to avenge these honorable chiefs. If thou spare thyself, thou hast my curse." Such was the vigorous school of the era.

This child, grown to maturity, was named "The man of rude probity." Thus he wrote to Henri Quatre: "Sire, your memory will reproach you with twelve years of my services, and twelve wounds upon my person; it will put you in mind of your prison, and of the hand that drew the bolts; and which has still remained pure in serving you, empty of your benefits, exempt from corruption, either from one side or the other." Such were then the servants of royalty. At the hour of death, when solicited to take nourishment, D'Aubigné said to his wife "Ma mie, suffer me to depart in peace, and go where I shall eat celestial bread."

In all this seventeenth century we breathe something reviving to the heart and feelings. We were in a forest of hoary and vigorous oaks, crooking their gnarled stems beneath an azure sky. Now the Gaulic forest is much decayed, being represented by a few stunted trees, thinly sown, standing amid a confused growth of underwood, with a dark and tempestuous heavens above them. In the seventeenth century, the sap rose more vigorously. Where should we now find in our French statesmen a probity equal to that of Agrippa d'Aubigné, "rude" though it were! But if virtue assumed a grand aspect in this picturesque age, vice was no less open and audacious. Witness the life of Constant D'Aubigné, son to the "man of probity." This man, the father of Madame de Maintenon, was a thorough-paced rascal. Molière and Rembrandt alone could have painted his characteristic villany. Thus his father speaks of him: "My son Constant in nothing resembles his father, though I have educated him with as much care as though he had been born a prince. Inclined from the first to play and drunkenness, he ended by giving himself to all manner of dissipation; after which he married a wretched woman, whom he has since killed. Seeking to withdraw him from court, where he was fast hastening to perdition, I procured him a regiment. But nothing could restrain him, and he soon returned, and speedily lost at play twenty times his estate." He pledged his honor—which proved a phantom. His religion alone remained to him; this he did not hesitate to sell likewise. Utterly ruined in purse and reputation, he returned to his father, who, still cherishing some hope of his amendment, gave him the command of Maillezais, believing that, though a reprobate, he was still a stanch Protestant. Constant, however, had already secretly abjured his faith and Maillezais soon became, under his command, "a public gaming-place, crowded with people of evil reputation and coiners of false money." At length Agrippa disinherited and cursed him. The wretch now entered into treasonable communication with the English government, and was forthwith consigned to the prison of Niort. Here Françoise D'Aubigné, afterwards the Marquise de Maintenon, first beheld the light, in the year 1635.

Constant D'Aubigné had always found a plank of refuge in his shipwrecks. To do him justice, though stained with every possible crime, he was brave and gallant. For this chivalric outside, Mademoiselle de Cardillac, his second wife, fell in love with and married him. He made away with her property, loved her passionately, and ill-used her tremendously, though not to the point of killing her, as he had done his first wife. She lived on, perpetually in prison or in exile. Madame de Villette, the sister of Constant, more touched by his misfortunes than revolted by his crimes, came to the prison at Niort to take away his three children, whom she brought to her château of Murçay. The little Françoise had the same nurse as her own daughter. But for this trait of mercy, poor Madame d'Aubigné might well have believed herself accursed of God and man; for even in the prison, where she divided her time between prayer and mending her husband's old clothes, the latter was employed in coining. She wrote to Madame de Villette with a profound feeling of misery and abasement: "I fear the poor little girl will give you much trouble; may God enable her to requite you." What a singular contrast was presented here between the cradle and the tomb! She who was born in a prison, and brought up on charity, died the wife of a powerful monarch. Suppose any one had prophesied this to the poor mother, her who was brought too low by want and misery even to nourish her babe!

Françoise d'Aubigné never forgot her aunt's maternal tenderness. In later times, when entreated to abjure Calvinism, she replied —

"I will believe anything you like, except that my aunt De Villette may be damned."

Yet another notice of her father. He was set at liberty, and sailed with his wife and children to Martinique. He once more succeeded in laying hold upon Fortune; played, and lost all. His wife was compelled to return to France with her children, leaving behind her unhappy husband, whom the severe lessons he had received had not been able to convert to good.

Françoise d'Aubigné had already commenced her part of heroine. At Martinique she was attacked by a serpent. During the passage homewards she was nearly thrown into the sea for dead; but upon her mother pressing her lips to hers for a farewell kiss, the supposed corpse opened her eyes and extended her arms. The vessel was afterwards assailed by corsairs, and escaped with difficulty.

Mademoiselle d'Aubigné, on her arrival in France, was again received into the house of Madame de Villette; who had remained a Protestant, as much out of respect for her father as for Calvin. The young girl followed the religion of her aunt.

At this epoch, proselytizing was the order of the day. Madame de Neuillant, a relation of Madame d'Aubigné, obtained an order from court to withdraw Françoise from the maternal care of her heretical aunt. Mademoiselle d'Aubigné wept bitterly at the idea of a separation; for she regarded the château de Murçay almost as her native place. At length she quitted it to live with Madame de Neuillant, but in the determination to remain true to the mode of faith her beloved aunt had taught her. At first, caresses were vainly employed to wean her from it; then humiliations. She was placed on a level with the domestics of the establishment, and employed in the care of the turkeys.

"I commanded in the poultry-yard," she has somewhere said; "it was there that my reign commenced."

The woman who afterwards dwelt so near a throne might then be seen any fine morning following her feathered charge, with a velvet mask on her face to preserve her from the effects of the sun; a large straw hat upon her head, a switch in her hand, and a small basket containing black bread and cherries upon her arm. These cherries she was enjoined not to touch until she had learned by heart five verses of Pibrac. She usually learned one verse, and ate all the cherries.

Madame de Neuillant, tired out, at length, forcibly placed her obstinate young relative in the Ursuline convent at Niort, whence the latter was shortly afterwards dismissed, Madame de Neuillant refusing to pay the pension of a Huguenot. The young girl returned to her mother, who had scarcely yet recovered from her griefs. Madame d'Aubigné, who was a strict Catholic, conducted her rebellious child to the Ursuline convent in Paris. Here they had the good sense not to force Mademoiselle d'Aubigné's convictions, and she at length embraced the parental religion.

There lived at this time a wit and a poet, who had risen from the ranks of the people. Eccentric and crippled, he laughed at his own infirmities, and by the power of his intellect and the éclat of his humble dwelling, radiant with liberty of thought, protested against visible grandeurs, the prestige of birth, and the sumptuousness of rank and wealth. Around Scarron's hearth were grouped Ménage, Péliisson, Soudery, Benserade, Marigny, Saint Amand. At his table were welcomed Marshal d'Albret, the Marquis de Sévigné, the Comte de Grammont, Martemart, Coligny, and twenty others of the same calibre.

"I also have a marquise," he once said to the illustrious assembly — "the marquise of Quinet."

Quinet was his bookseller.

One evening there appeared in the witty cripple's saloon, where a goodly company were met to laugh and sup, a young girl of fifteen years of age, "already handsome, but timid, who wept upon her entrance, being embarrassed by the shortness of her robe." She came from the provinces, where the court-fashions had not yet penetrated. Her mother was with her. The young girl was silent, but all comprehended the language of her eloquent eyes. Scarron was affected even to tears, for he had heard of Madame and Mademoiselle d'Aubigné. Upon that evening he was brimming over with wit and fun. The youthful guest was much more struck by these qualities than with the fine airs of the court gentlemen who were doing their best to make an impression on her inexperienced fancy. We see by this, how, even at that early period, intellect carried the day with her.

The girl and her mother returned to Poitou, and shortly afterwards Madame d'Aubigné left this weary scene, where her fainting spirit had been able to find no rest. Madame de Villette being likewise dead, Françoise d'Aubigné found herself almost alone in the world: she was compelled again to accept the protection of her Aunt de Neuillant, who allowed her to go "nearly naked through avarice," says Tallemant des Réaux. Decidedly the commencement of her life was not very promising.

She had left at Paris, besides Scarron, another sympathizing soul, Mademoiselle de St. Hermant. One of the letters that she wrote to that young lady was exhibited to Scarron, who answered it in a most flattering manner. It was the first gallant epistle she had ever received. This man, her future husband, we may certainly consider her first lover.

Madame de Neuillant now conducted her protégée to Paris, where she allowed her to see a little society, being at the same time proud and jealous of her beauty. The young lady became a prominent personage; her romantic adventures were generally discussed, and she was everywhere called "The Young Indian." People wondered what kind of future awaited this talented orphan, who talked like a charming book and attracted every eye. She dreaded a convent, but she equally disliked the idea of remaining in society without the protection of a husband. Yet how could she expect to marry without dowry? In this difficulty Scarron, who loved her as a sister or a daughter, offered her his hand. She gratefully accepted the proposition, being well aware that theirs would only be a marriage of the spirit. They were accordingly united in the spring of 1652. The notary asked what dowry Scarron intended to bestow upon his bride. "Immortality," was the proud reply "The names of the wives of monarchs die with them; that of the wife of Scarron will live to future ages."

It was Mademoiselle de Pons who lent the bride her wedding attire. The latter at once assumed the dignity befitting her new position; and from the first day wrought a change in her husband's establishment. "I will teach her plenty of fooleries," Scarron had said before their marriage; but he was disappointed in his mirthful design. To his hearth, haunted by fashionable vice, she brought the reviving freshness of virtue, the smiling and graceful virtue of seventeen. She was present at every conversation, at every supper; but, as her biographer says, "she claimed respect without imposing restraint;" and, according to Madame de Caylas, "passed her Lents in eating a herring at the end of the table," because she thought it better to show a little strictness amid the license by which she was surrounded.

From the day of the nuptials she assumed her post of femme savante, but with a modesty worthy of all praise. She was at the same time the pupil, the critic, and the secretary of Scarron, and his devoted wife. In his suffering, as in his merry hours, she was still by his side. She learnt Spanish, Italian, and even Latin, but she likewise learnt the duties of life. Little by little her husband's sway was eclipsed by her own. People came no more to hear him, but to hear and see her. "She had," said M. de Noailles, "acquired an infinite charm of conversation." Every one knows about the servant who one day at table whispered in her ear, "Madame, be pleased to tell another story. There is no roast meat to-day."

Scarron's circumstances were not improved since his marriage. The roast meat was often wanting. Yet he always wished to live like the nobility. He even affected to protect the arts. A letter of Poussin's informs us that amid the tempest of the Fronde that great artist painted two pictures after Scarron's order. Mignard was an intimate friend. Scarron ordered pictures likewise of him. He painted the first and last portraits of Madame de Maintenon; the one in 1659, the other in 1694. Of these two portraits it is unhappily only the last with which we are acquainted. "We only behold her in her decline," says M. de Noailles. "We picture her to ourselves in her dead-leaf robe and severe head-dress—regent of a court become serious like herself." Mignard painted her as St. Françoise; noble and dignified, but sombre and melancholy, without a single reflected ray of her youth lighting up her fallow visage.

Madame Scarron lived at home. "At first," as Scarron wrote to M. de Villette, "she was very unhappy at not having either means or equipage to go abroad." Afterwards her husband's infirmities retained her near his bedside. Her virtue daily gathered strength from the fact it was her sole wealth, and would be her sole refuge. At length poor Scarron died the death of a stoic philosopher; they placed over his grave the following touching epitaph : —

Passants, ne faites pas de bruit
De crainte que je ne m'éveille,
Car voilà la première nuit
Que le pauvre Scarron sommeille.*

* Passenger, don't make a noise, lest you waken me. This is the first night that poor Scarron has been able to sleep.

The knell of Louis the Fourteenth's reign now sounded — the reign of the monarch who, believing that all the passions of France beat in his bosom, said, "I am the State," because he saw everywhere around him bravery and genius. Scarron's widow was not of this splendid period. When she came near the throne the court was already in the decline of its splendor. We will follow her no further. The history of Madame de Maintenon, aged and a devotee, is known to all the world, for it is the history of France. In her youth she illuminated with a smile the troubles of Scarron; grown old, she veiled with a mask of severity the royal dignity.

ELEGY

WRITTEN IN A RAILWAY STATION.

The Station clock proclaims the close of day ;
The hard-worked clerks drop gladly off to tea ;
The last train out starts on its dangerous way,
And leaves the place to darkness and to me.

Now fades the panting engine's red-tail light,
And all the platform solemn stillness holds,
Save where the watchmen pacing for the night,
By smothered coughs announce their several colds.

Behind that door of three-inch planking made,
Those frosted panes placed too high up to peep,
All in their iron safes securely laid,
The cooked account-books of the Railway sleep.

The Debts to credit side so neatly borne,
What should be losses, profits proved instead ;
The Dividends those pages that adorn
No more shall turn the fond Shareholder's head.

Oft did the doubtful to their balance yield,
Their evidence arithmetic could choke ;
How jocund were they that to them appealed !
How many votes of thanks did they provoke !

Let not Derision mock King Hudson's toil,
Who made things pleasant greenhorns to allure ;

Nor Prudery give hard names to the spoil
'T was glad to share — while it could share secure.

All know the way that he his fortune made,
How he bought votes and consciences did hire ;
How hands that Gold and Silversticks have awayed
To grasp his dirty palm would oft aspire.

Till these accounts at last their doctored page,
Thanks to mischance and panic, did unroll,
When virtue suddenly became the rage,
And wiped George Hudson out of fashion's scroll.

Full many a noble lord who once serene
The feasts at Albert Gate was glad to share,
For tricks he blushed not at, nor blushed unseen,
Now cuts the Iron King with vacant stare.

For those, who, mindful of their money fled
Rejoice in retribution, sure though late —
Should they, by ruin to reflection led,
Ask Punch to point the moral of his fate,

Haply that wooden-headed sage may say,
"Oft have I seen him, in his fortune's dawn,
When at his levees elbowing their way,
Peer's ermine might be seen and Bishop's lawn.

"There the great man vouchsafed in turn to each Advice, what scrip or shares 't was best to buy,
There his own arts his favorites he would teach,
And put them up to good things on the sly.

"Till to the House by his admirers borne,
Warmed with Champagne in flustered speech he strove,
And on through commerce, colonies and corn,
Like engine, without break or driver, drove

"Till when he ceased to dip in fortune's till,
Out came one cooked account — of our M. P. ;
Another came — yet men scarce ventured still
To think their idol such a rogue could be.

"Until those figures set in sad array
Proved how his victims he had fleeced and shorn —
Approach and read (if thou canst read) my lay,
Writ on him more in sadness than in scorn."

THE EPITAPH.

Here lies, the gilt rubbed off his sordid earth,
A man whom Fortune made to Fashion known ;
Though void alike of breeding, parts, or birth,
God Mammon early marked him for his own.

Large was his fortune, but he bought it dear ;
What he won foully he did freely spend.
He plundered no one knows how much a year,
But Chancery o'ertook him in the end.

No further seek his frailties to disclose ;
For many of his sins should share the load ;
While he kept rising, who asked how he rose ?
While we could reap, what cared we how he sowed ?

THE WAR IN ALGERIA.

A SLIGHT blow on M. Deval, the French consul's check, in 1829, by the fan of Hussein, Dey of Algiers, afforded Charles X. an unhopèd-for chance of breaking the spell of ill-fortune which attached to the transmarine expeditions of France — of crushing, in the general interest of humanity, a nest of pirates that for three centuries had infested the Mediterranean; and chiefly and lastly, of diverting the attention of his volatile subjects from their new fancy — constitutional government — by the regilding of their old and tarnished idol — foreign conquest. The first-mentioned purposes were easily accomplished. The time chosen was summer, June, 1830. Great Britain, to whose hostility previous maritime disasters were chiefly attributable, partially satisfied by a verbal assurance that no permanent occupation of the Algerine territory was contemplated, interposed no obstacle to the enterprise; and a fleet of upwards of a hundred transport-ships, escorted by twenty vessels of war, under the command of Admiral Duperré, safely conveyed General Bourmont, 40,000 choice troops of all arms, and the necessary war-material, from Toulon to Sidi-Feruch, a point of the African coast a few miles westward of the city of Algiers — where the disembarkation, which occupied three days, was effected without difficulty. Algiers, though strongly fortified to seaward, was incapable of serious resistance to a well-appointed and numerous land-force; and after a brisk cannonade of the Emperor's Fort, to the south-east of the city, the dey offered to capitulate, on condition that private property and the religion of the inhabitants should be respected, and himself and his garrison of Turkish Janizaries, about 7000 in number, permitted to embark unmolested in person and effects. These terms were readily acceded to by General Bourmont; and the white flag of Bourbon France replaced (5th July) the red ensign of the pirates; the victors, moreover, finding themselves in the possession of public spoil to the amount of two millions sterling in gold and silver, besides twelve vessels of war, and more than a hundred bronze cannon. But this brilliant success availed the French king nothing in his conflict with the Paris democracy, if, indeed, it did not precipitate his fall, by inducing a belief in the royal mind, that the clamorous indignation sure to be excited by the famous ordonnances, would be drowned and forgotten in the triumphal echoes of the African victory. If so, the rash monarch was ruinously self-deceived; the coup d'état, aimed at the popular liberties, failed miserably — solely, as we now perceive, because launched some twenty years too soon, and by the wrong hand; and the deposed dey arrived in France just as his disrowned conqueror was leaving it forever. This, we may observe by the way, has not been the only time warlike adventure in North Africa has been associated with disaster to the House of Bourbon. St Louis died in the camp before Tunis; Charles X. in the same month wins Algiers and loses France; and but for the inopportune absence in Algeria at a critical moment of De Joinville and D'Aumale, by far the most popular and energetic of Louis Philippe's sons, it is more than probable that the feebly-opposed outbreak of February, 1848, would have had a very different termination. But it was not to be so written.

There is reason to believe that Charles X., and his minister, Prince Polignac, were quite sincere in the assurances given to Lord Aberdeen — that the only object of the French expedition was the thorough extinction of Algerine piracy, so long the scourge and terror of feeble commercial states; but it was one of the cruel necessities of Louis Philippe's precarious position — resting as it did, well-nigh exclusively, upon the timid sympathies of the moneyed and middle classes, instead of upon those far more powerful buttresses of continental thrones, the traditions and instincts of a numerous army, and the passions and prejudices of the great masses of the population — that he was compelled to temporize with every whim and vanity of the popular mind that happened to be in any way associated with the military "glory" of France. Compelled by this pressure, the citizen-king's government, after the exhibition of much vacillation and infirmity of purpose, finally repudiated the engagement with Great Britain, and, admittedly against their better judgment, prosecuted the war we are about to sketch, sometimes with languid irresolution, at others with remorseless violence, till French Africa, as it is called, nominally comprised an area of 100,000 square miles, extending from Morocco on the west, to Tunis on the east — a distance of about 500 miles — and from the blue waters of the Mediterranean on the north, to the great Desert of Sahara — the Arab's "Sea without Water" (El baher billa maa)—on the south, an average breadth approaching 200 miles. This country of hill and dale, plain and desert, sand and forest, rook and river, is divided into three provinces—Constantina on the east, Titteri in the centre, and Oran on the west; of which Bona, Algiers, and Oran are respectively the principal maritime towns or sea-gates—Algiers, or El Jezira ("the Warlike"), being placed near the centre of the coast-line between Bona and Oran, which are about as distant from each other as both are from France. Other important coast-towns are Mostaganem and Arzew, westward, and Bouteyah and Philippeville—the latter built by the French near Bona for greater facility of access to the interior of Constantina, eastward of the capital of Algeria. The great Atlas Mountains, which rise on the Atlantic sea-board of Morocco, stretch in broken and irregular masses across the three provinces in a south-easterly direction; whilst the less elevated ridges, known as the Little or Maritime Atlas, extend through the country from about Mostaganem and the mouth of the Shellyff River, in a direction more parallel with the coast than the central and southern ranges—from which the Shellyff, for nearly 300 miles, divides them. The heights of the Lesser or Northern Atlas vary from 200 to 1000 feet, and, together with the loftier chains and the extensive intervening valleys, occupy the greater portion of the surface of French Africa. Algiers itself is built in the form of an irregular triangle upon the seaward slope of Le Sahal, a magnificent amphitheatre of hills swelling gently up from the Mediterranean. These hills are based and girdled southward by the plain of Metidjah, which extends—a distance of seven leagues only—to the nearest ridge of the Little Atlas, in the midst of which, about forty-five miles south of Algiers, Medeyah, the capital of the province of Titteri, and, moreover, the key of the south country, is situated. To reach this city, and the equally populous, though not, in a military sense, equally important town of Milianah, from Algiers, the Col or Pass of Teneah, a dangerous mountain-defile, of which we shall have to make frequent mention, must be threaded. Two other towns in the vicinity of Algiers are Blidah and Koleah, separated from each other by the width of the Metidjah—the first nestled at the base of the Lesser Atlas, the other charmingly placed on the Mediterranean shore, about four leagues westward of Algiers. The chief inland towns of Oran are Mascara, near which Abdel-Kader was born, and, till his final overthrow, the governmental capital of the province; and Tlemecen, 100 miles south-west of Oran, near the borders of the Sahara, which there approaches unusually near the coast. Tlemecen is also but a few leagues eastward of the Desert of Angada, a debatable district, famous for its ostriches, on the confines of Morocco. Mascara is on the borders of Titteri, and inland ten leagues of Mostaganem. The only city of importance that breaks in the vast plains of the eastern province, is Constantina itself, fifty leagues from the coast, and perched upon high table-land, the southern boundary of which is the Libyan Desert.

Conquerors and colonists out of number—Phœnicians, Romans, Vandals, Greeks of the lower empire—attempted, with more or less present success, the subjugation and settlement of this part of North Africa, and passed away, leaving few traces of their footsteps, till the Arabian invasion, under Kaled, "the Sword of God," in the eighth century, which, it is quite manifest, vitally impressed the language, manners, religion, and, in no slight degree, the physical conformation of the natives of this ancient Numidia. The population of Algeria, about two millions, according to General Lamoricière's estimate, is essentially Asian, not African; and all, with the exception of the Jews and negroes, are devout votaries of Mohammed. This strongly-marked and diversified people consist of Berbers, otherwise Kabyles, Arabs, Moors, Kooloolis, Jews, and negroes from Soudan. The Kabyles (clansmen) are the descendants of the hill-tribes of North Africa, and, like their Numidian ancestors, are reputed to be brave and active, as well as cruel, inhospitable, and revengeful. They still occupy the mountain-ranges, and are skilled in agriculture and the ruder mechanical arts. Their dwellings are stone huts, straw-thatched and overgrown with palm-branches, in almost every one of which there is to be seen a copy of the Koran. They are broken into innumerable tribes, constantly at feud with each other, and are governed, like their co-religionists the Arabs, by sheiks and holy men or marabouts—literally, men with rope-girdles—who possess immense influence over them. They understand Arabic, and those near the coast speak that language; and in complexion they differ little from the swarthy Arab, but their heads are rounder, and their noses less prominent and aquiline than the Arabian types. The Arabs of the plains are a nomadic race, chiefly dwelling in tents, who have preserved the manners, faith, and language of their progenitors who immigrated to these countries; and flit hither and thither with their flocks and herds, as fancy, caprice, or the need of water and fresh pasture dictates. Some of these tribes, however, reside in villages near the chief cities, and engage in the cultivation of the soil. They are of courageous temperament, and simple, abstemious habits; in these attributes differing altogether from the servile and luxurious Moors, who constitute the bulk of the town populations—a mixed race, descended from the various nations that have at different periods settled in North Africa, although the Arabian element undoubtedly predominates, especially since the large addition to their numbers consequent upon the expulsion of the Andalusian Moors from Spain, after the conquest of Granada. The Jews, who also flocked thither in great numbers on being driven out of that country, need not be described—semper idem—in Algeria, as elsewhere, the ubiquitous race are the brokers, pedlers, money-changers, jewel-dealers of the community. The Kooloolis are the descendants of the Turkish Janizaries—of whose Algerine rule we shall have presently to speak—who, not being permitted to bring females with them to the Barbary States, intermarried with Moorish women or Christian captives. The negroes are, or rather were, slaves from the interior of Africa.

As might be expected, the French occupation of Algeria shows to greatest advantage in the metropolis of their new possession and its charming environs, so easily accessible from Toulon and Marseille, especially if visited during the month of June, or early in July, when the heat has not yet become intolerable, and the gorgeous vegetation of the country is in its fullest vigor, and colored by its richest dyes. At this season of the year, the harbor of Algiers, formed by the artificial connection of a small island in front of the city with the mainland, will be found alive with shipping, steamers chiefly, with frequently several crack specimens of the Royal Yacht Squadron intermingled with them. The bustle on the quays, and in the steep and narrow streets which lead from them, the hurrying to and fro, and Babel hubbub of the motley population by which they are crowded, present a scene at once novel, striking, and picturesque; and although the vigorous commercial life everywhere pulsating around is no doubt in a great degree factitious—factitious in the sense applicable to all numerously-garrisoned towns—it is not the less impressive and exhilarating; and you will not have been on shore ten minutes, before feeling quite satisfied that the contest going on between Asia and Europe on North African soil, is already virtually decided so far as the capital of Algeria is concerned. The narrow, filthy streets, with their dead walls of whity-brown houses, have been or are in process of being cleared and widened, and the houses turned round with their window-faces to the passers-by—to the unspeakable disgust and dismay of the wealthy, luxurious Moors, at thus finding themselves, their harems, servants—the inner, shrouded life, in fact, to which they were accustomed in their walled-in seclusion—exposed, like the faces of Frankish, and, alas! of late, too many Moorish women, to impertinent observation and the common light of day. There has been an extensive emigration of rich Moors to the more congenial atmosphere of Tunis and Morocco, but the poorer classes, both of Moors and Kooloolis, have adapted themselves, with more or less of readiness, to a change by which they have unquestionably been greatly benefited; and as porters—a business they dispute with the emancipated negroes—waiters, clerks, household servants, boatmen, and the inferior occupations generally, display an energy and teachableness that could hardly have been predicted from their former habits and modes of thought. The Jews also remain, and make money of their new clients the French, with as keen a relish as they did of their old friends the Turks and Moors; and all the more agreeably, no doubt, that no apprehension need now be entertained of a sudden demand of “your money or your life” from a fierce aga of Janizaries, or other all-potent functionary, as in the days when their elastic shoulders stooped beneath the burden of Turkish rule.

The new buildings—the Prefecture, Cathedral, Theatre, Palace of Justice, handsome structures all of them—contribute greatly to the rapidly-developing European aspect of the city. Then the principal thoroughfares are studded with brilliant cafes, milliners, confectioners’, jewellers’ shops, almost all kept by a monsieur or madame de Paris. Let us walk on to the principal bazaar or market-place, not very far from the Place de Marengo, which has not only a fresh and pleasant look at this season of the year, with its pyramids of delicious fruits — cherries, peaches, pomegranates, oranges, dates, jujubes, melons — but is perhaps the very best place in Algiers for obtaining a good, collective view of its shifting, miscellaneous population. Here we are, and the first glance assures us that officers and soldiers in the blue and red uniforms, gold, silver, and worsted epaulettes, and lace of the French army, are abundantly numerous; Zouaves and Spahis, native troops in the service of France (fighting Arabs and Kabyles — not Moors), in ornamented bornouse (cloaks), are scarcely less so. Yonder, a muffled Moorish lady hurries past, followed by a huge negro carrying her marketings, the lady intensely scrutinized by a bevy of elegantly-attired French dames, who, escorted by their smart and lithe, if not very gigantic husbands, that talk much more and louder than their greatly better-halves, are come over to take a peep at the capital of L'Afrique Française — one or more of them possibly to ascertain if an eligibly-situated magasin de modes is in the market. At a stall near them is a gay soubrette, unmistakably a recent importation, with her unexceptionable cap and glittering ear-drops, who wonderfully contrives at one and the same moment to bargain for a fowl with her fingers, dispose of a peach with her teeth, and play off the artillery of laughing lips, bright eyes, and the prettiest feet in the world, at a young sous-lieutenant, in the uniform of a Chasseur d'Afrique, who happens to be standing by. Here and there flash past, showily attired, jewelled Jewesses, whose lustrous Eastern eyes are, after all, their brightest ornaments. These grave-looking swarthy men in white bornouse are Kabyles, who, first leaving their arms at the barrier, are come to ascertain how wheat, maize, millet, which they cultivate on the slopes and in the valleys of the Little Atlas, are ruling in Algiers to-day. There are but few Arabs present, except those in uniform — the free air of the plains doubtless suiting them better than the close atmosphere of towns, Giaour-governed towns more especially; but there is a large number of Kooloolis and the lower sort of Moors running about in all directions, in the reality or pretence of business, and bawling and gesticulating in a way that greatly adds to the din and confusion of the novel and, to a stranger, burlesque scene. The gendarmérie maure, who are expected to keep order in this and similar localities, are recruited from the ranks of these noisy, bustling errand-men.

Leaving this market, and passing out of the city by one of the barriers of the upper town, we find ourselves near the plateau-summit of Le Sahal, with one of the most splendid landscapes in the world stretched out before us. Beauty breaks in everywhere, encircles us in all directions. The verdant, slightly-undulating surface of the far east and west extending hills is profusely dotted with white, villa-like country-houses, peeping out from amidst vine-gardens, orange and palm groves, bouquet-like clumps of pomegranate, jujube, cypress, and almond trees; above us is the deep, cloudless blue of Italian skies; and far below, murmuring at the base of Le Sahal, and closing the distant horizon on the north, are the bright and calmly-hearing waters of the Mediterranean — the fresh breeze from whence sensibly moderates the intense heat. Even in the shade of this luxuriant foliage, the thermometer stands at 100 degrees Fahrenheit: a month later in the year it will be at least ten degrees higher — still higher when the south wind blows and scorches, as with the breath of a blast-furnace, every leaf and blade of verdure in Algeria — baking them as brown as an Arab's face, save it may be the oleander tribe, and one or two similar fire-and-frost defying evergreens; with the exception, also, of the oasis upon which we are now standing, which, at an immense cost, has been completely interlaced with a silver net-work of streams, shielded from the sun's rays by the overarching foliage which they nourish and sustain. Le Sahal was the earthly Mohammedan paradise of the chiefs of the Janizaries and the wealthy Moors, till the cannon of the Franks awoke them from their sensuous dreams of security; and, judging by the numerous epaulettes and silk dresses that glance and flutter through openings in the trees and groves, it is not less the favorite resort of the gallant soldiers and fair dames of France. Other luxurious retreats in the vicinity of Algiers are the renowned gardens of Blidah and Koleah, situated, as previously stated, one at the base of the near Atlas range, the other on the Mediterranean shore, slightly westward of the city. The towns themselves may be called gardens, the narrow streets being roofed in, as it were, with interlacing branches of the palm and vine, partly for shade to the dwellers therein, but chiefly to prevent the drying up during the summer heats of the limpid waters of the Chissa, which are made to flow through them. The shop-windows of these leaf-shaded streets, opening like trapdoors, give to view peculiar industries going on within—such as the manufacture and ornamentation of silk bournouse of various colors, rich saddlery, slippers, sabre-sheaths, &c., and fruit and sweet-meat shops are well supplied and numerous. Each establishment is watched in front by the proprietor, who, squat upon a mat, and not unfrequently dabbling with his feet in the cool stream, regards the intrusive Franks with the same dull furtive expression of cowed malignity which one sometimes detects in the quickly-drawn glance of his richer countryman of Le Sahal; seeming, like him, to be searching his opium or tobacco muddled brains for a solution of the mysterious decree of Allah, which permits the unbeliever to command in places once sacred to the faithful, and trodden by the Christian only as a slave.

These are no doubt exceptional spots, but Algeria, generally speaking, is of considerable average fertility. The slopes of the Atlas—three ranges of which rising one above the other, can be discerned from the plateau of Le Sahal—are clothed, in most instances, to the summit with wood and verdure; the intervening valley, watered by innumerable streams, bring forth abundantly; and the plains of Bona and Constantina have a historical reputation for productiveness. The experimental agriculture of France has not yet, however, produced very favorable results. Soon after General Bourmont's conquest, the glowing reports sent home relative to the capabilities of the magnificent expanse of the Metidjah—comprising forty-five square leagues of dead-level ground, in the immediate vicinity of Algiers—induced considerable numbers of French farmers, spite of their generally unenterprising character, to quit la belle France, and encounter the perils of the Mediterranean, with a view to locate themselves permanently in a land of such splendid promise. Pestilence and the sword, however, quickly dispelled the sanguine dreams of the unfortunate colonists. The beautiful green-sward was found to be a forest of tall, reedy grass, in which, without a compass, a man might be lost as easily as in an American wilderness—the fair-seeming plain itself, a pestilential swamp in winter, and in the summer, still more fatal to human life, from the deadly vapors issuing from the cracked surface of the undrained ground. Hundreds of colonists perished miserably; and those whom fever spared, fell by the hands of the Arabs and Kabyles, who, issuing from the Col de Teneah, swept the Metidjah repeatedly with sword and flame. The hapless condition of the scattered colonists, in this last respect, may be estimated from the remark of Baron Pichon, civil intendant of Algeria—“that the government model-farm, distant only about six miles from Algiers, always required a battalion to guard it, and a half-battalion to inquire every morning after their comrades' welfare, and the manner in which they had passed the night.” The incursions of the Arabs have been at length effectually restrained by a wall and chain of block-houses, which completely encircle the Metidjah—a sort of miniature Chinese wall, devised by General Bugeaud in 1845; but the deadly pestilence has been mitigated only by the partial draining that has taken place, and millions must be yet sunk in the devouring soil ere the rate of mortality can be reduced to a satisfactory average. And it is only in the Metidjah that any serious attempt at agricultural colonization has been made. The vast plains at the eastern province are still solitudes, broken only by the shifting locations of the nomadic Arabs. In fact, after twenty-two years of unparalleled sacrifices and prodigious exertion, the French are still only encamped in Africa, not settled there. Their dominion, according to Marshal Bugeaud, an unexceptionable authority upon such a point, is limited to the range of their cannon—“Nos boulets marquent les limites de notre puissance en Afrique.” This is the thrice-told tale of French colonization, for which that versatile and ingenious people do not indeed appear to possess the slightest aptitude. They colonized Canada during more than two hundred years; and when Wolfe's victory over Montcalm finally wrested it from them, Canada could boast of 23,000 colonists, men, women, and children; twenty years afterwards, the number reached 113,000. The chief cause of these lamentable failures seems to be their entire lack of faith in any associative enterprise which is not originated and dominated by the government. They appear to have a downright passion for being regulated—“organized” is the favorite term—by authority, whether the purpose be great or small — the mode of waiting at the doors of a theatre, or of founding a great colony; a remarkable idiosyncrasy, which has no doubt its value in a military point of view, but is quite incompatible with the self-relying energy, the individual vehemence and determination which constitute the vital force, the inherent and expansive life, of all permanently successful colonies. Still, as the French nation prefer being organized for such enterprises, let us hope that the railways which the Journal de l'Empire announced in December last to be contemplated by the government (one from Algiers to Blidah across the Medjidjah, the other from Philippeville to Constantina by the Saza Valley), will not only be speedily accomplished, but that the correlative decrees which the emperor may issue, commanding the prompt and permanent colonization of Algeria, will be as effectual as those of Louis Philippe were notoriously futile and useless. This, by the way, is not an entirely disinterested aspiration; for if there is one thing clear in the hazy domain of international politics, it is that France, by establishing herself in Algeria, has entered into a bond to keep the peace towards Great Britain to the full value she places upon its retention; and, as earnest friends of peace, we shall rejoice at the success of any measures which may tend to render the pledge of amity more precious in the eyes of the French people. The protests of successive British ministries before alluded to, were from the first solely dictated by anxiety for the independence of Morocco, with which this country has important commercial relations, and whence, moreover, the supplies for Gibraltar are drawn. That point conceded, as it has ultimately been, the French settlement in North Africa is a matter of congratulation for Great Britain, not jealousy.

It will be necessary to introduce our sketch of the war, still unconcluded, that has for so many years desolated the interior of the country, whose more salient physical and moral features we have briefly glanced at, by the shortest possible summary of the origin and character of the Turkish power encamped there, in nearly the same positions as the French now occupy, for three hundred years previous to the capture of Algiers by General Bourmont. And it may be as well in this place to request the reader to bear in mind — especially when his blood flames and his eyes fill with indignation and pity at the bare recital of deeds which outrage the humanities even of war, if such a phrase is permissible — that we transcribe those passages from records furnished by the perpetrators of the deeds themselves, and necessarily so, inasmuch as the adverse parties in the terrific contest — the Kabyles and Arabs — publish no newspapers, indite no bulletins; a circumstance, moreover, which may perhaps in some degree reconcile the apparent contradiction between the confessedly unsatisfactory result of the war and the unusually large number of brilliant military reputations that have been created by it.

Algerine piracy owes its origin, in reality, to a war of proselytism, initiated by Ferdinand, called the Catholic, of Spain. That monarch, not satisfied with expelling the Mohammedan Arabs from Spain, pursued them with relentless zeal to Africa, where they had fled for refuge; and his forces obtained possession, in the commencement of the sixteenth century, of Oran, several minor points on the coast, and the small island in front of Algiers, then unconnected with the mainland. Eutemi, the Saracen chief of Algiers, terrified at the progress of the invaders, applied for assistance to a co-religionist and desperate pirate called Baba Horush (Father Horush), corrupted by European sailors into Barbarossa, whose exploits in the Levant had invested his name with a terrible celebrity. He acceded to the request with alacrity, landed his sea-banditti near Bona, and, in concert with the Moors, recovered from the Spaniards all their acquisitions, except Oran and the island before Algiers. He next slew Eutemi, and governed the Moors in his stead with brutal ferocity. At length, on returning from the sack of Tlemecen, he was attacked near Oran by the Spaniards and revolted Moors, defeated, and slain. His brother, Khair-ed-Din, who succeeded to his authority, lost no time in placing himself and his dominions under the protection of the Commander of all the Faithful, Selim I., sultan of Constantinople, who, guided chiefly by religious motives, accepted the charge as affording a valuable maritime counterpoise to the growing power of Spain, and the zeal of the Knights of St. John, established at Malta for the avowed purpose of enforcing Christianity in the Mediterranean by fire and sword. Khair-ed-Din was created a bey, subsequently capudan pacha, or high-admiral, and was furnished with a body of Turkish Janizaries, who assisted him to retake the island in front of his capital from the Spaniards. The organization of Algerine piracy dates from this time; and so vigorous and rapid was its development, that when Charles V. ascended the throne, the corsairs of Barbary were not only the terror of the Mediterranean and Adriatic seas, but insulted the very coasts and harbors of Spain almost with impunity. In 1541, Charles V., the most powerful monarch at that time in Europe, sent a great armament against Algiers, which resulted in disastrous failure. The fleet was shattered by a hurricane, and the army compelled to reembark in confusion and dismay. The insolence of the Algerines now overtopped all bounds, and indiscriminate war was made upon the vessels of all Christian nations that refused to pay them tribute. Admiral Blake, however, taught them to respect the English flag; the French, in 1684, bombarded the pirate-city with the like purpose and success; the Dutch, Swedes, and Danes, purchased forbearance by annual subsidies; but against the weaker maritime states, the piratical war continued with unabated audacity. The United States, after their separation from Great Britain, were supposed to be in that category—a mistake which the dey, in 1815, had to pay dearly for. The following year, Lord Exmouth battered Algiers, and compelled the liberation of every Christian slave in the dey's dominions—not one of whom, by the by, was a British subject; and in 1830, as we have seen, the dominion of the Turkish Janizaries, after three centuries of ferocious misrule and oppression, was finally brought to an end.

That turbulent and licentious militia, though always recruited in the Ottoman dominions, had long ceased to owe more than a nominal allegiance to the sultan; and the deys, whom they elected from their own ranks, held their precarious state upon a throne but one step from a bloody grave, into which, at the caprice of the Janizaries, they might be at any moment hurled. The rule of the deys did not extend beyond the towns and the Arab villages in the immediate vicinity; and they were accustomed to make war upon the Kabyles and nomadic Arabs precisely after the corsair fashion practised in the Mediterranean—namely, by sudden incursions in quest of booty, the most valuable being the chiefs of principal families, and their wives and children, whom they bore off, not into absolute slavery, for—the prisoners being followers of the Prophet—that was forbidden by the law of the Koran, but into rigorous captivity, from which they were only released upon payment of heavy ransoms by their relatives or tribe. This system, incredible as it may appear, has been continued, and in some respects improved upon, by the generals of France. In the cities, the Turkish sway was ruthless; and as the arrival of the French brought only a change of masters, they were submitted to by the Moors with the same timid obsequiousness as they manifested when crouching beneath the iron rod of the Janizaries. The Jews and Kooloolis welcomed the new-comers from the first; so that France has really had to contend only with the Kabyles and nomadic Arabs, and not with all or nearly all of these, for many of the most warlike tribes have constantly sided with the invaders, and furnished the battalions and squadrons of Zouaves and Spahis, the most effective troops, according to French authority, in the army of Africa. It was the Zouaves who covered their new eagle with glory at the recent storming of Laghouat, and, said General Randon, governor-general of Algeria, inscribed with their victorious swords the first page of the military annals of the new empire. We now commence the narrative of a war, of which we have just quoted the latest triumph.

Soon after the capitulation of Algiers, a considerable number of Arab chiefs met in council at Blidah, to consider whether it might not be politic to continue on the same terms with the new as with the old masters of Algiers, Bona, and Oran, the deys of which latter towns had already transferred their allegiance, whatever that might be worth, to France, and been confirmed in their authority. They, the Arabs, had been accustomed to purchase, by certain fixed payments, the privilege of grazing their flocks and herds within reach of the Turkish garrisons; and the continuance or discontinuance of this species of tribute was the especial matter for discussion. General Bourmont went to assist at the conference with 2000 infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and six pieces of cannon, for the sole purpose, as he stated, of personally assuring the Arabs that France had no other object in sending an expedition to Africa, than to relieve them of the detestable yoke of the Algerine Turks. The Arabs did not wait to receive this friendly message; and when the misunderstood general was returning the next day but one to Algiers from his abortive mission, he was assailed by such a swarm of Arab cavalry, and pressed so fiercely, that, spite of the unquestionable bravery and discipline of the troops under his command, it was only with the greatest difficulty, and after severe loss, that they succeeded in regaining the shelter of the city. The prosecution of the Arab war, thus rashly provoked by General Bourmont, was intrusted by Louis Philippe's government to General Clausel, who succeeded to the chief command in September, 1830. This officer's views in Africa embraced from the first a wide horizon; and the preliminary steps for their attainment were entered upon with vigor. He recommended colonization on a grand scale, commencing with the plain of the Metidjah, and the formation of native battalions, in imitation of the policy of Great Britain in India. These views were to some extent adopted by the French ministry; the immediate colonization of the Metidjah was decreed and formalized in the Moniteur Algérien, and a commencement made towards organizing a powerful force of Zouaves and Spahis. A foreign battalion, composed, according to one of them, whose narrative has been translated by Lady Duff Gordon, of adventurers and vagabonds from every nation in Europe, except Great Britain, but commanded by French officers, was formed and permanently attached to the army of Africa, which, consisting of about 40,000 men when General Clausel assumed the direction of affairs, has been since gradually increased to 100,000, the average force usually maintained in French Africa.

The first military exploit of General Clausel was directed against Medeyah, the capital and residence of the Bey of Titteri, whom it was resolved to depose, says Baron Pichon, because he wrote insulting letters to General Clausel. The troops employed amounted to 10,000 men; the Metidjah was traversed in safety; and first leaving a garrison at Blidah, the French general pushed on through the Col or Pass of Teneah, occupied Medeyah, deposed the refractory bey, and installed Ben Omar, a Moor of Algiers, in his stead. Whilst General Clausel was thus busied, the Sheik, Ben Zamour, descended from the hills at the head of a numerous body of Kabyles, massacred, as he swept through the Metidjah, fifty artillerymen who had lost their way there, and attacked the garrison left at Blidah; General Clausel instantly hurried back to the rescue of his rear-guard, dispersed the assailants, ordered military execution to be done upon a number of native traitors to French rule, "pour encourager les autres," and returned to Algiers. He subsequently entered into negotiation with the Bey of Tunis with reference to a joint expedition against the Turkish Bey of Constantina; and having concluded an arrangement which the French ministry refused to sanction, the mortified general threw up his command, and returned to France. General Berthézène succeeded to the vacated post — a very onerous and difficult one in the then indecisive see-saw state of French African policy — one day veering towards peace, the next, yielding to the clamors of the war-party, inclining to vigorous hostilities. General Berthézène, although a distinguished veteran of the imperial school, was a strenuous partisan of peace, chiefly, no doubt, because he had formed a truer estimate of the probable duration and calamities of a death struggle with a fanatical and hardy population than the badads of Paris. His military measures were, nevertheless, prompt and energetic. On the 1st of July, 1831, he forced the Pass of Teneah; relieved the garrison of Medeyah, hotly besieged by a numerous force of Kabyles and Arabs; and fought his dangerous way back again in safety to Algiers, though beset and hemmed in on every side by a multitude of fierce and desperate assailants. This homeward march was a hurried one — occupying fifty hours only, writes Baron Pichon, though the advance to Medeyah had consumed five days.

The efforts of General Berthézène to bring about an accommodation with the Arabs of the plains, which his recent march to Medeyah and back did not induce him to slacken, would perhaps have succeeded, had he not been suddenly superseded by Savary, Duke of Rovigo. On the arrival of this officer in Algiers, the negotiations were peremptorily broken off, and it was ostentatiously proclaimed that the new commander-in-chief was in full possession of the confidence of the French king and ministry, and heartily determined to carry out the plan mutually agreed upon for the subjugation of the native population. There can be, we think, no doubt that this was a calumnious misrepresentation; and that the frightful deed which has branded the African command of the Duke of Rovigo with indelible infamy, was that of one ruthless man only, irritated by the vexations incidental to his very difficult position, and not the deliberate counsel of a cabinet of calmly-judging statesmen. The prime object of the Duke of Rovigo was evidently "to give a lesson" to the Arabs — one that they would not easily forget; a design in which he unquestionably succeeded to admiration, though not in the sense he had anticipated. The tribe of Ben-Ouffas, a friendly and peaceful one, against whom Baron Pichon says no serious, well-founded complaint could be alleged, was selected for the experiment.

On the night of the 6th of April, 1833, a battalion of the Foreign Legion and a squadron of Zouaves fell suddenly upon the unsuspecting Ben-Ouffas, and the morning's sun rose upon the mangled bodies of the entire tribe, surprised and slain whilst they slept! Tidings of this atrocious massacre flew, as if on wings of fire, through the land, everywhere kindling into flame the yet smouldering passions of the vast majority of the country population, and lighting up the fierce war of despair which has since cost France so dear alike in men, money, and reputation. So universal was the outbreak, that in the opinion of the Duke of Rovigo himself, his "great lesson" necessitated immediate and powerful reinforcements. They were granted; and the duke's conduct, in reply to the angry reclamations of several eloquent speakers in the Chamber of Deputies, indignant that such dishonor should be brought on the great name of France, was defended, or rather excused, by the plea of necessity. Marshal Soult, at a subsequent period, defended an act, if possible, of still greater enormity by saying, "that what would be a crime against civilization in Europe, might be a justifiable necessity in Africa." This geographical morality of the invader of Portugal in 1808, may pass for what it is worth; but we must not forget to mention, that many French officers entitled to a share of the spoil obtained by the Ben-Ouffas razzia, refused to contaminate themselves by its acceptance, and that Savary, Duke of Rovigo, arrived death-stricken in Paris, and died there in the June following the slaughter of the Ben-Ouffias.

The terrible example he had set survived him: the system of night-razzias—that is, of swooping, during the hours of sleep and darkness, upon unsuspecting villagers, in revenge or reprisal of the hostility of the armed countrymen of the sleepers—became a settled practice of the war. They form the underplay, as it were, of the grand military drama enacted in Algeria; and as the limits of this paper preclude more than an outline of the more important operations, it will be as well to give in this place, and once for all, a description of the mode of executing a razzia, extracted from the narrative of an actor in one of them, who evidently, from the easy frankness with which he writes, was quite unconscious that he was relating any blameworthy or uncommon exploit. The writer was at the time in the Foreign Legion, under the orders of Lieutenant-colonel Picolou; and the scene of the enterprise was in the neighborhood of Dschilegu, between Budeschia and Philippeville, on the sea-coast of the eastern province. The translation is Lady Duff Gordon's:—

"The commandant marched up into the mountains one night with the whole garrison, to chastise the Kabyles for their insolence. We started at midnight under the guidance of some Arabs who knew the country, and marched without stopping, and in deep silence, up hill and down dale, until, just before day-break, the crowing of cocks and the baying of dogs gave us notice that we were close upon a tribe. We were ordered to halt, and two companies, with a few field-pieces, were left behind upon an eminence. After a short time, we started again, and the first glimmer of light showed us the huts of the tribe straight before us. An old Kabyle was at that moment going out with a pair of oxen to plough; as soon as he saw us, he uttered a fearful howl, and fled, but a few well-directed shots brought him down. In one moment, the grenadiers and voltigeurs, who were in advance, broke through the hedges of prickly pear which generally surround a Kabyle village, and the massacre began. Strict orders had been given to kill all the men, and only take the women and children prisoners. A few men only reeled half awake out of their huts, but most of them still lay fast asleep: not one escaped death. The women and children rushed, howling and screaming, out of their burning huts in time to see their husbands and brothers butchered. One young woman, with an infant at her breast, started back at the sight of strange men, exclaiming: 'Mohammed! Mohammed!' and rushed back into her hut. Some soldiers sprang forward to save her, but the roof had already fallen in, and she and her child perished in the flames. . . . We then returned with our booty, and it was high time, for other tribes of Kabyles came flocking together from every side, attracted by the noise. We were forced to retreat in such haste, that we left the greater part of the cattle behind. The fire of the companies we had stationed in our rear and the field-pieces at last gave us time to breathe."

The narrative goes on to say, that, two or three days afterwards, messengers from the Kabyle tribes came to treat for the ransom of the captive women and children; and that "they conscientiously ransomed even the old women, whom we would have given them gratis." It is only fair to add, that a writer in the Revue des Deux Mondes, states that General Cavaignac, when engaged in such enterprises, gave orders "only to kill the men in the last extremity."

The tumultuous uprising of the Arabs consequent upon the Duke of Rovigo's massacre of the Ben-Ouffias, elevated for the first time an individual into notice whose name has since become famous in the world's ear—the renowned Abd-el-Kader—a brief account of whom, previous to this period, may not be unacceptable.

Abd-el-Kader (Adorer of God) is the son of a saintly and ambitious marabout of the name of Mahli-ed-Din-Hadj. He was one of six children—five boys and one girl—and his place of birth, in 1806, was in the vicinity of Mascara. His mother, Leila Zahara, who still lives, and has shared her son's long captivity in France, is said to have been a beautiful and highly-instructed Arabian woman; and Mahli-ed-Din-Hadj, his father, claimed to be in some way descended from the Prophet of the Mussulmans—a circumstance which, combined with the more positive fact that he had made two pilgrimages to Mecca, gave him an immense influence with his countrymen, which he appears to have very skilfully availed himself of, in the hope, it is alleged, of one day founding an Arab dynasty upon the ruins of the Turkish power. He very early discerned, or imagined that he did, indications of the qualities which lead to eminence, in his favorite son, Abd-el-Kader; and it was sedulously given out, that a halo of celestial brightness had encircled his baby-brows at the moment of birth, seen, however, only by his father and mother, who were alone at the time. There could be no doubt that this was not only a special testimony to his descent from the Prophet, but a promise, certain to be fulfilled, of future greatness; and that he might be worthily fitted for the high position thus miraculously proclaimed to await him, the utmost pains were lavished upon his education, by which he so rapidly profited, that at twelve years of age he could repeat the Koran by heart. This solid foundation for more secular teaching accomplished, he was sent to Oran for further instruction, and of course soon distanced every competitor in the race after knowledge. Some suspicion of Mahli-ed-Din-Hadj's perfect loyalty having found a lodgment in the brain of Hassan, bey of Oran, the saintly marabout was requested to attend his highness' divan on a particular day, for the purpose of clearing up the doubts which troubled the bey's mind. This Abd-el-Kader strongly advised his father not to do, and offered to attend himself instead, and give the required explanations. This course was agreed to; and Bey Hassan was so charmed with the son's eloquence, and so entirely convinced thereby that his suspicions had fully wronged the excellent marabout, that he made the youthful orator a handsome present, and charged him, moreover, with a most pressing invitation to his father to pay his highness a friendly visit at the palace of Oran, where he would be received with all the favor and distinction due to his illustrious descent and many virtues. The message was delivered; and the result was, that Mahli-ed-Din-Hadj departed forthwith on a third pilgrimage to the holy city, this time accompanied by his counsellor and son, Abd-el-Kader. In passing through Egypt, they obtained, we are told, an interview with Mohammed Ali, the career of which energetic barbarian had previously excited the enthusiastic admiration of the future emir — an admiration which a nearer view of the great man served to increase. Before returning, the father and son visited the tomb of a celebrated marabout relative, not far from Bagdad — one Mulei-Abd-el-Kader, who had lived exactly a hundred years, precisely half of which he had passed upon the summit of an isolated piece of rock, miraculously fed by a starling. This visit was a fortunate one in many respects. The departed marabout reappeared to the two pilgrims, and presented his youthful relative with an apple of remarkable properties; inasmuch that when Abd-el-Kader, on his return home, commenced eating it in the presence of his family and a few intimate friends, the same halo of azure light which at the moment of birth had lightened round his brows, again encircled them with a prophetic glory! What is certain, however, is, that Abd-el-Kader's reputation for wisdom, sanctity, and as possessing the especial favor of the Prophet, increased rapidly; and it was chiefly in deference to his counsel, that his former dangerous friend, Hassan, bey of Oran, who had incurred the displeasure of his Junizaries, was refused an asylum at Mascara. The future emir's marriage with Leila Kheira, the daughter of an influential sheik, and a very charming maiden — that is, according to the notion of what is charming entertained by Arabs — added considerably to his importance; and it began to be quite evident that, apart from miraculous interposition, a brilliant perspective was disclosing itself to the eager gaze of Mahli-ed-Din-Hadj's aspiring son. The personal appearance of Abd-el-Kader was not of that kind which usually commands the respect of a rude people, nor had he yet shown any proof of the impetuous courage which, in the absence of the slightest pretension to military ability, properly so called, has since won for him a wide renown. He was under the middle size, but active and robust; and his large, thoughtful black eyes, and abundant beard of the same color, gave a sombre as well as intelligent expression to his palish-yellow countenance. His hands — his especial vanity — were small and delicately formed, and his voice was soft and musical; so that, altogether, he seemed rather a reflective, meditative man, than one of fiery, impulsive action.

Such was Abd-el-Kader, as he appeared in the presence of the large gathering of Kabyle and Arab chiefs assembled at Egris, after the destruction of the Ben-Ouffas, to concert measures for proclaiming a holy war against the French, and deciding as to who should lead them in the desperate contest. The indecision that for some time prevailed as to the choice of a leader, was put an end to by a celebrated marabout called Sidi Al Amich, who announced, amidst a breathless silence, that having been nearly the whole of the previous night engaged in prayer to Mohammed, that he would be pleased to indicate the person most worthy to lead his — the Prophet's — people in the war against the infidel about to commence, he received an answer just at the rise of sun, when Mulei-Abd-el-Kader suddenly appeared before him, and, beckoning, led the way to a magnificent tent, the entrance-curtain to which being self-withdrawn, revealed Abd-el-Kader, the son of Mahli, the Pilgrim (ed Din Hadj), seated upon a magnificent throne, with the pale-blue halo, twice before seen, encircling his head as with a celestial diadem. This was quite sufficient — more than enough, in fact. The decision of the Prophet, so unmistakably intimated, was instantly ratified by the loud acclamations and flashing swords of the congregated chiefs. Abd-el-Kader was forthwith proclaimed Emir of Mascara, Prince and Commander of the Faithful, and invested with the violet bournou, the badge and emblem of supreme office and authority.

At once broke the hurricane of war, sweeping the open country to the very walls of Algiers, Bona, and Oran, with terrific violence. Blidah, Medeyah, Koleah, were invested by multitudes of half-frantic cavalry, whose glancing swords and waving banners, however, though terrible and imposing in appearance, were of slight avail against stone walls and well-pointed cannon. Lavish reinforcements arrived from Toulon and Marseille, and the French commanders gradually resumed the offensive. General Demischels made a successful razzia upon a tribe of nomade Arabs, slew 300 men, and carried off the women and children safely to Oran, though sorely pressed during his retreat by the gathering tribes; who, failing to rescue their unfortunate relatives by the sword, purchased them of the general a few days afterwards. Much desultory fighting ensued, with varied and generally indecisive results; but the French, notwithstanding, persistently extended themselves along the coast-line, both east and west, of Algiers. General the Count d'Ernon had succeeded the Duke of Rovigo in the chief command, with the title of Governor-general of the French Possessions in Africa; and under his administration, the maritime state of Arzew, and the important town of Mostaganem, eastwards of Oran, were wrested from the Arabs. An expedition direct from Toulon encountered and defeated the Kabyles of the eastern division of the Little Atlas, and captured Bouteyah. In pursuance, however, of the policy announced at this time by Marshal Sult in the Chamber of Deputies, in reply to General Clausel, that France had no intention or wish to seize upon the interior of Algeria, and merely intended keeping possession of a number of strong positions on the sea-board, negotiations were opened with Abd-el-Kader; and ultimately a treaty was concluded with the new prince of the Faithful, by which he was solemnly recognized as the lawful emir of the province of Mascara, with the exception of Oran, Arzew, and Mostaganem, and the immediately adjacent land. The Shelliff was to be his eastern boundary.

This treaty was much cavilled at in France, as having a direct tendency to swell the prestige and enhance the authority of the emir with his turbulent, fanatical countrymen — a criticism fully born out by the result. It was not, however, very long observed. Abd-el-Kader, urged by the impatient clamors of his Arabs, to which his own eager ambition gave willing audience, to renew the holy war against the intrusive infidel, crossed the Shelliff (1835) at the head of a numerous force, burning with fanaticism, and individually brave enough, but withal little formidable in open fighting to French or any other European troops. General Trézel, left Oran to encounter the audacious emir, but, after marching and countermarching for several days in vain search of his enemy, was debating whether it might not be advisable to abandon the seemingly hopeless attempt to bring the wary Arab to action, when an unforeseen and tempting chance presented itself. The army was halted on the plain of Frigor, where an Arab presented himself, and offered, for a certain reward, to conduct the French general by a short route direct to the emir's camp. General Trézel yielded to the temptation, the army was immediately put in motion, and the troops pressed forward with alacrity and vigor. Towards the middle of the day, the leading column found themselves entering upon a spongy morass, and the more desperately they struggled onwards to reach the firm ground, which the guide assured them was only a few yards further on, the deeper both men and horses floundered and sank in the mud, till at last they were up to their bellies in the yielding soil. Suddenly the traitorous Arab disappeared through a coppice (taillis), unharmed by the shower of balls sent hastily after him, which, a moment after, were replied to by a tempest of the same missiles from the flanking woods, where Abd-el-Kader had been for some hours impatiently awaiting the French advance. Fortunately, the rear-guard had not yet entered the treacherous bog, and its fire checking that of the ambushed Arabs, the main body of the troops were extricated from their perilous position, though not without considerable loss both in men and material. The French army passed the night on the banks of the Sig, and at earliest dawn General Trézel marched, as he thought, towards Arzew, on the sea-coast. He followed the course of the Mukta, a stream which, during a part of its flow, does lead towards Arzew, but by insensible windings turns away for some leagues in a totally different direction. The way seemed long, still the troops marched on undoubtingly, till they came to the entrance of a long narrow defile, shut in on each side by precipitous lofty rocks, where some hesitation was manifested. It appeared, however, of necessity that the ugly pass should be threaded; there was no enemy to be seen, and the march was resumed in the quickest military time. Two thirds of the distance had been accomplished, when tumultuous cries high overhead, as if a multitude of mocking voices were calling to them from the clouds, caused the soldiers to raise their eyes and see the heights crowded with exultant Arabs. The checked pulse had scarcely time to beat again before huge stones, enormous fragments of rock, came bounding, leaping, thundering down — a granite hail-tempest, to which no resistance could be opposed, accompanied by the pattering of musketry, not less fatal in its effects, though not so terrifying to the imagination, as huge jagged masses of rock whirling through the air; and in a few minutes the dreadful pass was heaped with the dead and writhing bodies of men and horses. The march of the troops, hurried from the first, fell rapidly into confusion, and presently became an utter rout, the soldiers casting away even their arms in frantic anxiety to escape what seemed almost inevitable destruction. Happily for them, the pursuit of the Arabs was checked by their eagerness for booty, or the loss of 1200 soldiers, besides caissons, cannon, baggage, &c., would have been nothing like the extent of the misfortune. This murderous business is Abd-el-Kader's great battle of Makta; it was a surprise, a massacre, perfectly justified no doubt by the usages of war, but a battle it cannot be called. The exultation of the emir, though quite natural, was absurd in its exaggeration. He had slain French troops, but he had not beaten, as he boasted, a French army, for the simple reason that he had not encountered one.

The shock of this disaster vibrated painfully through every vein of military France, and signal vengeance, it was promptly agreed, should be taken on the perfidious emir. General Clausel's reasoning upon the folly of attempting to quell the Kabyles and Arabs by a few settlements along the coast, came suddenly into remembrance and favor, and that officer was himself despatched to the scene of action with reinforcements and large discretionary powers. As it was determined that Mascara, the emir's capital, should be stormed, as a set-off against Makta, and there could be no reasonable doubt of success in such an enterprise, the Duke of Orleans, Louis Philippe's eldest son, was sent over to participate in the glory thereof. Abd-el-Kader, after vainly attempting to arrest the march of the French troops at the Sig, and subsequently at the Habrah, abandoned Mascara to its fate, which was first to be plundered by bands of hostile Arabs, and afterwards fired (December 9, 1836) by the French army; which done, General Clausel returned to Algiers, the Duke of Orleans to France.

The measure of vengeance for Makta was not yet full; and after permitting himself only a few weeks' breathing-time, General Clausel led his army against Tlemecen, the emir's second capital, on the confines of the Sahara, and 100 miles, in a south-westerly direction, from Oran. This city he also found abandoned by the emir and his Arabs, who had withdrawn into the eastern mountains. The Moors received the French with resigned indifference; the Jews and Kooloolis, the latter of whom garrisoned the Kasbah or citadel, with acclamations. The citadel was at once surrendered to the French general, who, after making arrangements for the safe-keeping and government of the city, returned to Algiers by the valley of the Shelliff, on the south of the Little Atlas, and consequently through the Pass of Teneah, between which and the Algerian capital he caused a military road to be constructed. A garrison was left in Tlemecen, under the command of Colonel, now General Cavaignac; and Jussuf, colonel of Spahis, was charged with the collection of 500,000 francs, ordered by General Clausel to be levied upon the inhabitants that had so well received him. A more unscrupulous agent than the colonel of Spahis could not have been selected, and the Moors and Jews of Tlemecen were both numerous and wealthy; yet, spite of all Jussuf could do in the way of ransacking, plundering, and threatening, only the value of 100,000 francs could be obtained, and that chiefly consisting in finger and ear rings, and other female ornaments. The remainder of the tribute was formally remitted.

These successes gave a permanently bolder tone and wider aim to French-African policy. General Clauzel was directed to organize a powerful expedition against Constantina, with the avowed object of annexing that city, and the whole of the interior of the province which bears its name, to the French dominions in fact as well as theory. Success was deemed so certain, that Colonel Jussuf was named bey of the menaced city long before the army commenced its march towards it; and in November, 1837, the Duc de Nemours came over to share the fame of an assured conquest. The result signally rebuked these confident boastings. Constantina was numerous, garrisoned by the Turks and Kabyles, who fought under the red flag of Algiers; and the usually brilliant and impetuous, if not very stubborn, valor of the French troops, would seem to have been chilled and weakened by the terrific hail and snow storm which they encountered upon the high land whereon Constantina is built; for the assaults directed by the general upon the gates El Cantar and El Raba, feeble and ill-sustained, were easily repulsed; and so discouraged were the troops, that it was necessary to order an immediate retreat. A confused and hurried one it proved, involving much loss, and affording Algiers the strange spectacle of a numerous French army chased to its very gates by a crowd of undisciplined triumphant Kabyles! The usual penalty of non-success, well or ill-deserved, awaited General Clausel; he was recalled, spite of his earnest entreaties to be permitted an opportunity of retrieving his tarnished reputation. "What," wrote the indignant general, "would be now the fame of the Duke of Wellington, had the British government recalled him after the failure before Burgos?" The angry absurdity of the comparison is very amusing; and, as the French ministry were unmoved by his appeal, we may fairly presume that they also demurred to the perfect appropriateness of the illustration.

In the mean time, General Bugeaud had been winning his first African laurels. By a rapid march along the sea-coast, he relieved Oran from the Arabs, by whom it was beleaguered; and then turning south-westward, he hastened to the succor of General Cavaignac, who had been for several months cooped up in Tlemecen, inflicting on his way a heavy defeat upon Abd-el-Kader in person, by whom he was attacked whilst crossing the Sikhah. On this occasion, it should be remembered, to General Bugeaud's honor, the first successful attempt was made to prevent the native auxiliaries of the French, the Zouaves and Spahis, from decapitating the prisoners that fell within their power. General Bugeaud was quick enough to save the lives of thirty of them; and he interdicted, under no less a penalty than death to the offender, such practices in future. General Cavaignac was relieved, and Bugeaud returned to France—a lieutenant-general.

General Danrémont obtained the African command; and as it was deemed imperatively necessary to efface the failure before Constantina by the capture of that city, preparations, civil as well as military, were diligently set on foot, which once matured, would leave no doubt of triumph. The expeditionary army was to be composed of between 20,000 and 30,000 men; but even that amount of force might prove inadequate while Abd-el-Kader's numerous and daring, and, though frequently defeated, still formidable forces, ranged the open country. Divide et impera is a maxim seldom lost sight of by civilized ministries; and in this crisis of Algerian affairs, it was acted upon with great success by the cabinet of Paris. General Bugeaud, who had already made himself respected by Abd-el-Kader, was despatched to Africa with orders to arrange a truce with the emir—peace was the word used—upon any terms short of the surrender of the sea-line cities in the actual possession of France. This was the turning-point in the emir's career, and it argues ill for his patriotism, worse for his sagacity, that he permitted a personal repugnance to the Turkish Bey of Constantina, and a revengeful longing to punish the Arab tribes that had refused him tribute, and defied his authority, to seduce him into making peace with the French invader at the very and only moment his hostility might have been effective. General Bugeaud, escorted by 10,000 men, met the emir on the banks of the Tafna, where a treaty of peace (May 30, 1837) was speedily agreed upon between the high contracting parties. The terms, readily consented to by the French envoy, were such as could only have been dictated by the emir if a conqueror, holding the very existence of France, in Algeria, in his hands. This alone, did he possess the clear intellect imputed to him by generous natures, prone to magnify into greatness the most ordinary qualities of those who, after bravely combating, fail in a just cause, should have sufficed to reveal the artifice employed against him. He was not only reconfrmed Emir of Mascara, but created Emir of Titteri. Tlemecen and Medeyah were surrendered to him, and his boundary was to be the ridge of the Northern Atlas! In fact, France merely affected to retain Algiers, Mostaganem, Oran, Bona, and other sea-stations, whilst preparing to march inland to Constantina! The treaty was signed; General Bugeaud returned in triumph to Paris; Abd-el-Kader commenced his preparations for the punishment of the refractory Arabs; and General Danrémont, accompanied by the Duc de Nemours, marched with the assured step of a conqueror upon Constantina. The garrison of Turks and Kabyles again offered a stout resistance, but not with the same good-fortune as before. General Danrémont was killed by a cannon-ball whilst speaking to the Duc de Nemours; and the direction of the siege devolved upon General Vallée. Finally, the city was stormed, and after a deadly struggle, continued from the breach along the narrow streets, captured; and the Duc de Nemours took up his residence in the palace of the bey, who had escaped to Tunis.

Abd-el-Kader, on his part, was equally successful. The defection from his authority had been extensive. His uncle, Sidi Aby Ben Taleb, not only disputed his descent from the Prophet, and miraculous gifts, which, considering that he, Sidi Aby Ben Taleb, had been one of the family-council, is not so surprising, but positively refused to pay his nephew tribute, or, as our accustomed tongues would say, taxes. He thus expressed himself in a letter which subsequently fell into the hands of the French: "Thou wert nothing before the arrival of the army of the French—thou wert nothing before thou madest a peace with those unbelievers. I was greater and holier than thou; and it was in the hope of usurping my authority, O Abd-el-Kader! that thou madest a treaty with the Christians. When thou thoughtest thyself great enough, thou brokest the treaty with the French, and thou wilt that we should acknowledge thee for our sultan. But I have ever been greater and holier than thou, and never will I bow before thee; neither will I pay the tribute which thy horsemen demand in thy name."

Bravely as these words sounded, Sidi Aby Ben Taleb was compelled to pay his nephew tribute, and was very glad to be let off with no worse punishment for his contumacy; and after a protracted struggle, the emir succeeded in overcoming all his domestic foes. His chief adversaries were Sidi-el-Aulid, Mustapha Ben Ismaël, and Moressa Ben Kaoui. The first was early slain, the second perished in battle, and Moressa Ben Kaoui was driven into the Desert. This home-campaign employed the emir upwards of a twelvemonth; and it was not till January, 1839, that the Arab and the Frenchman, disembarassed of other foes, again confronted each other—both with the flush of victory upon their brows, mutually-courteous words upon their lips, and hate and scorn in their hearts, ready to leap forth, like their swords, at the first favorable opportunity, and upon the slightest provocation. The emir sent General Vallée the journal of his recent triumphs, compiled by Léon Roche, a young Frenchman, who had acted as his secretary during the war; and the French general sent in return some handsome presents to the emir.

The first overt provocation to a renewal of hostilities was no doubt given on this occasion by the French. In May, 1839, the Duke of Orleans arrived in Algeria, visited Constantina surrounded by a brilliant cortège, and after distributing a profusion of decorations amongst the leading Moors, marched with ostentatious triumph through the Biban and the Iron Gates — a remarkable and lofty pass in the central Atlas chain — and, disdainful alike of license or apology, through the territory of the Emir of Titteri and the Col de Teneah, back to Algiers. Abd-el-Kader's preparations were not yet complete, and he simply protested against the violation of his territory by his highness of Orleans. This was laughed at — not so the second holy war proclaimed by Abd-el-Kader in the following October, the first huge wave of which, as in 1833, swept the open country with resistless violence. The unfortunate cultivators of the Metidjah were sabred, and their dwellings given to the flames, and many isolated detachments of French troops were overwhelmed and destroyed; but, as at the former period, steady bravery and discipline gradually prevailed against the fluctuating impulses of fanatical enthusiasm; and the Kabyles and Arabs were driven back to the fastnesses of the Atlas, where, during three years, a war of razzias and guerilla adventure raged with varying fortune but equal ferocity on both sides.

It was soon after the commencement of this second holy war, that the brilliant affair of Mazagran occurred, which, in the language of the Paris papers, flashed like a gleam of lightning (coup d'éclair) athwart the deep gloom of the African war, and covered Captain Le Lièvre and his heroic companions with imperishable glory. According to the published reports, to which it almost seemed there would be no end, Captain Le Lièvre, commanding the 10th Company of the Battalion of Africa, numbering 123 young soldiers, was posted on the 1st of February, 1840, at the small military post of Mazagran, distant somewhat less than two leagues by the road — much less in a direct line — from the garrison-town of Mostaganem, on the coast. Mazagran mounted one piece of artillery, a 4-pounder; and, besides a barrel of gunpowder in the magazine, the garrison had a supply of 30,000 ball-cartridges. Towards evening, on the 1st of February, the post was suddenly attacked by 15,000 horsemen under Ben

Khami, who, moreover, were furnished with two pieces of cannon — 8-pounders. At the first shock, fourteen standards were planted on the wall of the devoted fortress, and, but for the close, rapid, murderous fire of the 10th Company, it must have been carried at once. As it was, the fierce billowy sea of Arabs was hurled back, scattered into spray as from a rock; and the same fate attended their efforts, which were incessant during the rest of the night, the following day, and night again. Colonel Dubuessil, who commanded at Mostaganem, continued not only unaccountably blind to the near presence of 15,000 cavalry, but to the incessant roar of the cannon, and the interminable flashes of musketry; whilst the continuity of the attack, as well as how thoroughly the post was encircled, is made evident by the fact, that it was impossible to send a messenger to Mostaganem, to warn the supine French commander of the peril of his countrymen. One apprehension alone disquieted Captain Le Lièvre — would his ammunition last till either the garrison were relieved, or the Arabs driven off! During a brief interval of quiet, the cartridges that remained were counted, and Captain Le Lièvre addressed his soldiers in the following words: — "Frenchmen, comrades, friends! there are only ten thousand cartridges left. I propose continuing the defence till they are exhausted. I shall then fire the barrel of gunpowder in the magazine, too happy to die for our country. Vive la France!"

"Vive la France!" echoed the excited soldiers, with wild enthusiasm, and, rushing back to the walls, reopened their terrific fire upon the astounded assailants, scarcely a bullet sent amongst whom, from their crowded numbers, failing of its aim; the slaughter amongst them may therefore be approximately estimated by the number of used-up cartridges. Two more days and nights the desperate contest continued, when, and not an hour too soon, for the cartridges were almost exhausted, Dubuessil heard in some way of what was going on at Mazagran, marched to its relief, and the surviving Arabs fled!

The foregoing is really a cold, weak summary of the details of the extraordinary affair, as published in the Moniteur and the non-official Paris papers. Captain Le Lièvre was made a commandant, and had the cross of the Legion of Honor conferred upon him. Nothing else was talked of for many weeks; a huge mimic Mazagran was got up in the Champs Elysées — it was stamped upon paper-hangings, pocket handkerchiefs, painted upon the scenes of theatres, engraved in every variety of style; and Mazagran pantaloons, hats, gloves, shawls, &c., became instantly and universally the vogue. At length it began to be whispered, that the officer commanding at Mostaganem had demanded a court-martial either upon himself or Captain Lièvre, nobody knew exactly which, for the Paris papers, like the Moniteur Algérien from the first, had suddenly become religiously silent upon the subject. Next it was said, that the subscription raised for the widows and orphans of the fallen heroes was to be returned—not a single soldier of the 10th battalion of Africa having been either slain or wounded in the terrible defence of Mazagran! Finally, the London Morning Chronicle boldly proclaimed and challenged the French government, day after day, to contradict its statement—that the Mazagran story was a fain, an invention from end to end! Only one Paris newspaper, Le National, reprinted the Chronicle's exposure, evidently derived from unquestionable authority, and demanded explanation of the government. The government answered not a word—all allusion to the subject was dropped by general consent, and has not since been revived; Captain La Lièvre the while keeping the step in rank he had acquired, his cross, and a handsome sword presented to him by the merchants of Marseille. Who the hoax originated in, it would be idle to inquire—possibly the government, desirous of relieving the public anxiety relative to the renewed and formidable outbreak in Algeria by a well got-up if somewhat extravagant popular fiction; but whoever its author may be, it offers only a more flagrant proof than others, of the bold impunity with which African army news has been habitually got up and seasoned to the palate of the French people. Real fighting, however, if not of the super-humanly heroic Mazagran kind, had begun in serious earnest.

General Bugeaud, who had replaced Marshal Vallée, organized a plan of campaign by movable columns, radiating from Algiers, Oran, and Constantina; and, having 100,000 excellent soldiers at his disposal, the results, as against the emir, were slowly but surely effective. General Négrier at Constantina, Changarnier amongst the Hadjouts about Medeyah and Milianah, Cavaignac and Lamoricière in Oran, carried out the commander-in-chief's instructions with untiring energy and perseverance; and, in the spring of 1843, the Duc d'Aumale, in company with General Changarnier, surprised the emir's camp, in the absence of the greater part of his force, and it was with difficulty that he himself escaped. Not long afterwards, he took refuge in Morocco, excited the fanatical passions of the populace of that empire, and thereby forced its ruler, Mulei-Abd-er-Haman, much against his own inclination, into a war with France—a war very speedily terminated by General Bugeaud's victory of Isly, with some slight assistance from the bombardment of Tangier and Mogador by the Prince de Joinville. Upon this occasion, an understanding was come to with Great Britain, by which the retention of Algeria by France was acquiesced in, upon the agreed condition that the French dominion should not be extended either east or west—in other words, that the independence of Morocco and Tunis should be respected. The governor-general returned to Paris soon after his victory of Isly, which made him a peer and marshal of France, but not till he had taken measures for encircling the plain of the Metidjah with a wall, ditch, and chain of block-houses, for the much-needed protection of its still sparsely scattered cultivators—nearly one-half of whom, by the way, are Spaniards and Germans.

The star of Abd-el-Kader's military life had not yet finally set, though obscured by clouds, and rapidly nearing the western horizon. The struggle amidst the hills was maintained by his partisans with scarcely abated vigor, even whilst he himself still lingered at the half-friendly, half-hostile court of Morocco; and it was nothing doubted that the emir would make yet another trial of his fortune before abandoning the unequal struggle in despair. There is only one incident in this intermediate, desultory warfare which it is essential to reproduce in these pages, but that one is of so terribly significant a character, that it cannot be omitted in a paper designed to give the reader a true impression of the character of the war in Algeria. We will endeavor to state it without prejudice or exaggeration. On the night of the 12th June, 1843, about three months before Marshal Bugeaud left Algeria, Colonels Pelissier and St. Arnaud, at the head of a considerable force, attempted a razzia upon the tribe of Ben-Ouled-Riah, numbering, in men, women, and children, about 700 persons. This was in the Dahrah. The Arabs escaped the first clutch of their pursuers, and when hard-pressed, as they soon were, took refuge in the cave of Khartani, which had some odor of sanctity about it; some holy man or marabout had lived and died there, we believe. The French troops came up quickly to the entrance, and the Arabs were summoned to surrender. They made no reply; possibly they did not hear the summons, or perhaps the courage of despair had steeled them to await the attack of their foes, however numerous and sure of ultimate victory those foes might be, and endeavor to sell their lives as dearly as possible in the holy and vantage ground they had happily reached. Colonels Pelissier and St. Arnaud would certainly not have been justified in sacrificing the lives of the soldiers under their command by attempting to force a passage through windings and intricacies thronged with armed and desperate men; but, as there was no other outlet from the cave than that by which the Arabs entered, a few hours' patience must have been rewarded by the unconditional surrender of the imprisoned tribe. Colonels Pelissier and St. Arnaud were desirous of a speedier result; and, by their order, an immense fire was kindled at the mouth of the cave, and fed sedulously during the summer night with wood, grass, reeds, anything that would help to keep up the volume of smoke and flame which the wind drove in roaring, whirling eddies into the mouth of the cavern. It was too late now for the unfortunate Arabs to offer to surrender. The discharge of a cannon would not have been heard in the roar of that huge blast-furnace, much less smoke-strangled cries of human agony. The fire was kept well up throughout the night; and when the day had fully dawned, the then expiring embers were kicked aside, and as soon as a sufficient time had elapsed to render the air of the silent cave breathable, some soldiers were directed to ascertain how matters were within. They were gone but a few minutes, and they came back, we are told, pale, trembling, terrified, hardly daring, it seemed, to confront the light of day. No wonder they trembled and looked pale. They had found all the Arabs dead—men, women, children, all dead! had beheld them lying just as death had found and left them; the old man grasping his gray beard; the younger one, grim, rigid, stern as iron with fanatic hatred and despair; the dead mother clasping her dead child with the steel gripe of the last struggle, when all gave way but her strong love!

This is no fancy picture; it is the plain record of an indisputable, undisputed fact, justified on the elastic plea of necessity. The French ministry of the day, moreover, in order to mark, it seemed, their contempt for the indignant clamor which the recital of the dreadful deed excited in France, as well as in other civilized communities, actually rewarded, with an air of courageous defiance of public opinion, which but thinly masked the real pusillanimity of their conduct—the favor of the army being in issue—Messieurs Pelissier and St. Arnaud with a step in their profession! It was in reference to this tragedy that Marshal Soult used the words we have before quoted—"that what would be a crime against civilization in Europe, might be a justifiable necessity in Africa." In a subsequent debate upon the affairs of Algeria, an eminent French statesman observed, amidst the loud cheering of the National Assembly, "that he was reconciled to the enormous sacrifices required of France by the exigencies of the African colony, by the value he attached to the warlike experience and habits the French army had acquired there." It is seldom that eloquent sentences are so speedily and strikingly illustrated as in this instance, the morning of the 2d of December, 1851, having seen both the orator and his applauding audience seized and hurried to prison by soldiers whose habits had been contracted in Algeria, acting under the orders of colonel, by that time General, St. Arnaud, and minister of war! A more luminous commentary upon the dangerous unsoundness of Marshal Soult's geographical ethics, and the folly of supposing that, to decorate men for outraging humanity in Africa, is to train them to respect law and right in Europe, could hardly be imagined.

We now turn the last page as yet written of Abd-el-Kader's public life. Driven, at the instance of France, from the cities of Morocco, he still lingered on its half-desert frontiers, and gradually drew together a considerable force. If the Emperor of Morocco did not wish to involve himself in another war with France, it was imperatively necessary that he should at once take decisive measures against the obstinate and impracticable emir. He resolved to do so, and without delay. An army, chiefly composed of the Kabyles of Morocco—who, especially if considerable booty, as in this case, was likely to be obtained, were nothing loath to do battle with Arabs—was hastily assembled, and sent against Abd-el-Kader, with orders to drive him out of the Morocco territory, whatever expenditure of life might be necessary to effect that object. The emir, finding he could not avoid the contest, boldly assumed the offensive, and in an attack on the night of the 20th December, 1845, obtained a momentary triumph, by an expedient as extraordinary as it was cruel. General Lamoricière thus describes the emir's strange ruse: "Abd-el-Kader plastered four camels all over with pitch, loaded them with immense heaps of dried grass, mixed up with pitch, and had them conducted in the dead of night to the edge of the Morocco camp by four soldiers, who had been previously paid 100 duros each for the service, and there set on fire." The plunging and tearing about of the maddened, flaming animals, produced, as was expected, much consternation and confusion amongst the Morocco troops, greatly increased by the impetuous charge of Abd-el-Kader's horsemen, led by the emir in person, and for some time the advantage was greatly on the side of the assailants; but the hour of dawn, showing the Morocco Kabyles the fewness in number comparatively with themselves of the Arabs, and the camel-meteors having long since burnt themselves out, was that of hopeless, irretrievable defeat. The emir's entire force was either destroyed or dispersed; and the only alternative left him, was either to surrender upon terms to General Lamoricière, who had been anxiously awaiting the issue of the struggle between Abd-el-Kader and Abd-er-Haman, or to endeavor to escape by the eastern mountains. The French general, upon hearing of his defeat, despatched

Bou Kraïi with twelve chosen Spahis, to endeavor to intercept him, if, as was likely, he should take the road through the Col de Kérboures. The completeness of the emir's defeat is strikingly shown by General Lamoricière's letter to the Duc d'Aumale, at this time governor-general of Algeria, announcing the precaution he had taken to prevent Abd-el-Kader's escape, though doubtful that he should be able to do so: "Bou Kraïi, with twelve Spahis, will be stronger than the entire escort of him whom only yesterday Morocco struggled against with 38,000 men." There was no opening for the services of the Spahis. The fallen emir determined on surrendering himself to General Lamoricière upon certain conditions, which were negotiated through the Cadi of Tlemcen, who, General Lamoricière states, was of great service to him in the affair. The terms were agreed upon, first verbally, but afterwards reduced to writing, and subscribed by both parties. In reality, there was only one essential condition, which was thus stated in a despatch from General Lamoricière to the Duc d'Aumale, dated 23d December, at nine o'clock in the morning: "Let it suffice, that I assure you I have only promised and stipulated that the emir and his family shall be conveyed to Alexandria or to St. Jean d'Acre; they are the places which he himself indicated in the conditions which I accepted." The great news of Abd-el-Kader's surrender brought the Duc d'Aumale to the French camp, where General Cavaignac had previously arrived. The governor-general personally assured the emir, that he entirely approved and confirmed the engagement which he, Abd-el-Kader, had entered into with the general, to whom, upon the faith of that engagement, he had surrendered himself, and that it would be religiously respected. The Duc d'Aumale, who, there can be no question, acted throughout the transaction with perfect good faith, and within the limits of his official powers, announced the emir's surrender to the French minister of war in the following terms:—"Monsieur le Ministre—a great event has just been accomplished. Abd-el-Kader is in our camp. Beaten by the Kabyles of Morocco, chased from the plains of Moolouia by the troops of Mulei-Abd-er-Haman, abandoned by his people, who took refuge in our territory, he has confided himself to the generosity of France, and has surrendered upon condition of being conveyed either to Alexandria or to St. Jean d'Acre." There is a trifling slip here, intended, no doubt, as a rhetorical flourish. Abd-el-Kader had not confided himself to the generosity of France—that is, of the government of France—for he had made a bargain with her representatives, binding them, with all the power that a solemn engagement possesses, to convey him to one of the two places named in the deed of surrender—he undertaking not to return without the permission of France to Algeria. There lingered, it is plain, in the Duc d'Aumale's mind, a harassing doubt of the good faith of his father's government, for he goes on to say: "The moment I arrived here, I ratified the engagement made by General Lamoricière; and I have the firm hope that the government of the king will sanction it." And as if resolved that there shall be no excuse for unfair dealing, he insists that the emir's surrender was entirely voluntary on his part: "The emir had in his favor darkness, a difficult country traversed by paths unknown to our guides. Flight was still easy for him."

Steam swiftly conveyed the important news to France, and as swiftly returned with the reply of the Paris cabinet: Abd-el-Kader must embark immediately for that country! Accordingly, he, his mother, three children, his cousin and brother-in-law, Hadj Mustapha, and suite, in all ninety-three persons, embarked in the steam-ship Asmodée—not an unfitly named vessel—and arrived safely at Toulon, after a stormy passage, on the evening of the 30th December, 1845, to find themselves close prisoners, probably for life—at all events, for an indefinite period, the probable termination of which could not be even approximately indicated by the French ministers themselves. Not long afterwards, Abd-el-Kader himself, his family, and such persons of his suite as he chose to name, were transferred to the Castle of Amboise, on the left bank of the Loire, between Blois and Tours.

Strange, unlooked-for events knocked at the gate of the old castle, and glanced in at the captive, with a promise of relief, during the seven weary years which the unfortunate emir lingered through there; the dethronement, exile and death of the monarch in whose name he had been imprisoned—the setting up of a republic, whose shibboleth was freedom! liberty! Illusive promise-breakers all! The chafed spirit of the emir still hopelessly fretted itself against the unmoving bars of his dungeon, when, like a shift of scene in a theatre, the door flew open, a mass of glittering uniforms floated in with a sudden light-burst, and the bewildered captive felt the chains put on by a king and riveted by a republic, fall off, as if by magic, at the voice of one who but the other day was a prisoner like himself, and in apparently more hopeless bondage! Whatever may have been the motives of Louis Napoleon in freeing Abd-el-Kader—perhaps delight in the exhibition of supreme power, a wish to obtain a reputation for chivalric generosity at the cost of a cheap, unhazardous magnanimity, the desire to contrast his own conduct towards the emir as strikingly as possible with that of the foregoing royal and republican governments — matters very little, after all, to any one but himself. The act itself was a just and honorable one; and the manner in which it was performed added greatly — an important consideration in France — to its dramatic effect. In truth, one can hardly imagine a more effective incident. Consider it for a moment. The place, a royal castle of the elder Bourbons, built by Charles VI., where Louis XI. instituted the order of St. Michael, and Charles VIII. was born and died; the captive to be set free, originally a prisoner of the monarch who had usurped the hereditary seat of those ancient kings; and the liberator himself, though his foot was now upon the step of an imperial throne, but a brief space previously having escaped from the custody of Abd-el-Kader's jailer, in the dress of a laborer, a rough, heavy plank borne across the shoulder, soon to be graced by the imperial mantle! The dialogue of this showy pièce de circonstance was not less bizarre and misplaced than its other accessories. "I believe you," said Louis Napoleon, addressing the emir, "to be capable of resigning yourself, as both your religion and mine enjoin us to do, to the circumstances of the position in which you are placed, and thus your word is sacred; I rely upon it confidently, knowing, as I do, that amongst honorable men no other bond is required!" To which the emir replied by commanding one of his suite to read aloud a passage from the Koran, which denounces the breaking of a promise, though made to an unbeliever, as a dishonor and a crime! There, reader, you may travel far and read much before you light upon so amusing and suggestive a scene as this, enacted late in the fall of last year at the royal castle of Amboise.

Abd-el-Kader left France just as the news of the storming of Laghouat by General Pellissier, of Dahrah-Cave memory, arrived in that country; unmistakable evidence, were any required, that the war, of which we have endeavored to present a faithful, unexaggerated outline, is not yet at an end — a result much, we think, to be regretted for the sake of the native population themselves. They can never hope to expel France from their sea-frontier; they are hemmed in east and west by numerous populations, bitterly hostile — through dread of France, no doubt, but still bitterly hostile — as the sanguinary overthrow of Abd-el-Kader by the Morocco troops clearly showed; and although even thus crippled, and divided as they are amongst themselves, the fastnesses of the Atlas might perhaps be held for an indefinite time, the prolongation of a conflict without reasonable hope or definite aim, must be chiefly hurtful to the aborigines themselves. A maritime war would no doubt totally change the conditions of the strife; but we doubt whether the compelled evacuation of Algeria by France, supposing no other European nation willing or able to supply her place, would not be the greatest misfortune that could befall the natives, now that the smashing, slaying, firing part of the business must be pretty well over. They have been forcibly brought into contact with a more potent civilization than their own, by which they must ultimately be greatly benefited; railways, the precursors of material progress, are, it is said, about to be constructed on the plains; and the government, by the establishment of schools, evince a laudable anxiety to advance their moral as well as physical condition. The subjugation of Algeria, so far as it has gone, has assuredly added nothing to the reputation of the French armies either for prowess or humanity; but the civilization of Northern Africa presents an ample field for exertion, success in which will make amends for the past, and cause men to acknowledge, with unalloyed satisfaction, the signal service rendered to mankind by France in putting down the vast and formidable system of piracy which, for three centuries, had been permitted to organize and intrench itself on the shores of the Mediterranean.

PREDICTION. — In the "Astronomical Diary," or an Almanac calculated for the meridian of Boston, in New England, for 1758, and published in that year, by Nathaniel Ames, in an essay on the "Past, Present, and Future State of America," a subject which the writer says is "daily becoming more and more interesting," occurs the following paragraph: — "The curious have observed that the progress of human literature (like the sun) is from the east to the west; thus it has travelled through Asia and Europe, and is now arrived at the eastern shore of America. So arts and sciences will change the face of nature in their tour from hence over the Appalachian mountains to the Western Ocean — the rocks will disclose their hidden gems — the inestimable treasures of gold and silver will be broken up; — huge mountains of iron ore are already discovered, and vast stores are reserved for future generations — shall not these vast quarries that teem with mechanic stone — those for structure be piled up into vast cities — those for sculpture into statues to perpetuate the honor of renowned heroes, even those who shall now save their country? Oh! ye unborn inhabitants of America! should this page escape its destined conflagration at the year's end, and these alphabetical letters remain legible, when your eyes behold the sun after he has rolled the seasons round for two or three centuries more, you will know that in Anno Domini 1758 we dreamed of your times." What would Nathaniel Ames say now, if he could rise up from his grave and contemplate America as she stands in less than a century from the time when he penned the above prophecy of her future destiny? — Daily Ad.

MR. DARLEY'S WYOMING.

AMERICAN subjects are not usually favorites with American artists. We must admit the costumes and accessories—the materials which go to make up a picture—to be more picturesque and effective, more abundant, striking, and significant, in the old world than in the new. A Swiss peasant girl, in the foreground of an Alpine landscape, is a more agreeable object to the eye, than a young lady with a parasol, among the mountains of Fishkill. We have in this country many estimable gentlemen of the Hebrew faith, whose portraits, no doubt, would be intensely interesting to their families and friends; and yet, we think a likeness of Judas Iscariot, after he hanged himself, likelier to be relished by the indiscriminating multitude. Mr. Seward's full-length, with a copy of "Uncle Tom" in his hand, even in these days of excitement, might, we fancy, be a less desirable subject for a painter than that of Machiavelli with a scroll. With certain privileges of art, custom has made us familiar. Respectable elderly gentlemen suffer themselves to appear in marble, in this climate of coughs, colds and catarrhs, with nothing but a slight fold of drapery across the pectoral muscles; and we gaze calmly upon the statue of Washington, in the trappings of Caligula, without the least suspicion of the palpable anachronism. In brief, however paradoxical it may seem, the elements of art are more attainable, more obvious, more easily recognized in the remote than in the near; and there are certain principles of effect, that have become legitimate, because hereditary, which artists, who wish to be on the safe side, had better acknowledge.

Happily, however, we possess certain achievements in American art that are independent of time and place, of costumes and accessories—transcripts of nature, as it is now, has been, and ever will be. We recognize in the sketches of Mr. Darley—in those expressive faces, and speaking lineaments—a language that needs no interpreter. In the beautiful landscapes of Cole and Durand, of Kensett and Church, we see something that will be understood wherever grass grows and water runs, wherever trees rustle or clouds mantle the sky.

The beautiful valley of Wyoming, our Eden, sweet, elegiac place, filled with the romance of our history, through which, like a silver thread, runs the Susquehanna river, has been a theme for a great European poet; but the "Gertrude" of Campbell, however admirable, does not embrace a tithe of the real interest inwoven with its own sad history. The very seclusion of the valley, its peaceful tranquillity, seemed to invite invasion, and its unwritten epic is the most sad, and the most heroic in consequence. Who can pass through that primeval forest on the road to Wilkesbarre, not misnamed "The Shades of Death," without recalling vividly the suffering of those poor innocents—helpless age, and widowed mothers, and young children, perishing of hunger (as many did), rather than expose themselves to the merciless savage, or his no less merciless employer? We read, in Mr. Miner's history, of children who were born and died in that dismal swamp; of men who refused to touch a morsel of food, that their wives and little ones might not perish by famine; of mothers carrying their dead infants twenty miles beneath a July sun, to give them burial—to save their poor senseless remains from being devoured by wolves; we read of the constant, patient martyrdom of those faithful pioneers in the cause of liberty; we read the names of our great countrymen inscribed upon the monument in memory of the "massacre;" and feel, that as Thermopylæ was to the Greek, so is Wyoming to the American—a watchword, and a battle cry, against the standards of oppression!

Mr. Darley's picture, from which a large engraving is now published, represents, with exquisite fidelity, one of the incidents in that fruitful portion of our history. The Indians in the pay of the British, in 1778, had been gathering in and around the Valley, and the story is thus briefly told in that admirable work by Chas. Miner, "The History of Wyoming:"—

At Fort Jenkins, the uppermost in the Valley, and only a mile above Wintermoot's, there were gathered the families of the old patriot, John Jenkins, Esqr., the Hardings, and Gardiners, distinguished for zeal, with others. Not apprized of the contiguity of the savages, on the morning of the 30th of June, Benjamin Harding, Stukely Harding, John Harding (a boy), James Hadsell, James Hadsell, jun., Daniel Miller, John Gardiner, and Daniel Carr, eight in all, took their arms and went up about three miles into Exeter, to their labor. Towards evening, at an hour when aid could not be expected, they were attacked. That they fought bravely was admitted by the enemy. James Hadsell and his son Benjamin, and Stukely Harding were killed. John Harding (the boy) threw himself into the river, and lay under the willows, his mouth just above the surface. He heard with anguish the dying groans of his friends. Knowing he was near, the Indians searched carefully for him. At one time he was so close that he could have touched them.

This was the opening of the campaign.

How well this is delineated by the pencil of Darley, will be seen by referring to Mr Darley's picture.

UNCLE TOM IN FRANCE.

UNCLE TOM's literary success I have spoken of in former letters; it had then surpassed anything of the kind since the issue of the Mysteries of Paris. It is still going on without abatement. It has been published at Paris in the feuilletons of the Presse, of the Pays, of the Estafette, of the Presse Littéraire, and of another paper; it has also been published in eight distinct book-forms, of one of which an edition of one hundred thousand has been sold. Not one of the numerous circulating libraries that has not its well-thumbed copies. Besides the large importation from England, the house of Baudry has issued an edition for English readers; and still a new translation, the eleventh, is announced in press. Not a journal or literary periodical, from the Revue des Deux Mondes and the Debats, down to the Chronique de France and Charivari, that has not had its article on Mrs. Stowe and her book. Engraved portraits of the lady are displayed in the shop windows; artists are already transferring to canvass the graphic scenes from her pages; a reflex fame illustrates the merits of her other writings, and two translations of her smaller tales have appeared. And all this began only three months ago; Uncle Tom came out in a French dress for the first time last October. We briefly express the universal popularity of a person by saying his name is familiar throughout the land as a household word; it is indicated in this latitude by its appearance at the head of the play-bill. No book that has attained anything like the astonishing success of Mrs. Stowe's, if its scenes and characters offer any dramatic elements, fails to be adapted to the stage.

The French, more sensuous (if I may so apply the word), but less imaginative, more gregarious and less domestic than we, love to see and hear in sympathetic crowds what they have wept and laughed over in solitary perusal. Consequently, the Ambigu Comique and the Gaité, the two largest theatres in Paris, are nightly crowded from pit to gallery with eager listeners and spectators to the thrilling words and brilliant tableaux of the dramatic spectacles founded on the American book. It would not be worth the while here to present an analysis of these two plays. You will find one given in all the Monday feuilletons of your Parisian files received by last steamer. It is enough to say that, with abundant errors in manners, scenery and local coloring generally, the black shade was essentially American; for, as one of the critics last Monday observes: "We have no slaves; on touching the noble soil of France one becomes free." The acting at both theatres is excellent; the personation of Eliza by Madame Guyon at one, and of Eva by Mlle. Felix, a sister of Rachel, at the other, drew down—tears of applause. At the Ambigu, one of the scenes represents an auction sale of slaves at New Orleans, where George, returned a free-man from Canada, bids for his own wife; his competitor is his former master, whose passion is roused by the charms of Eliza; the wealth of the latter soon enables him to run up the merchandise to a price beyond George's resources; two friends add their purses, but they are outbidden by the planter, now mad with passion; at the moment, however, when the chattel is to be struck off to the latter, false news is brought to him that his house is on fire, and he hurries off; George is enabled, by another friendly contribution, to rise on the last enormous bid, and the auctioneer knocks down his wife to her husband. "Il a réussi!" shouted at this instant a worthy blouse, who, with his body half extended over the railing of the gallery, had followed every incident of a scene so novel to a Frenchman with breathless interest.

This is but one of several instances where the audience seemed to confound the fictitious horrors passing before them with some dreadful reality. I must note, with thankfulness, that the authors of the dramas had not taken the occasion to retort upon America the hard words which we have found cause to use toward France during the last year. The two theatres which I have mentioned, seat together an audience of 3,700 persons; they count upon a hundred successful representations of the American dramas. Still two other theatres, the Gymnase Dramatique, with 1,300 seats, and the little theatre du Palais Royal, with 930 places, severally announce as forthcoming the Cabane de l'Uncle Tom, and the Cassine de l'Uncle Tom. Finally, Mr. Ida or Ira Aldrige, a "black Macready," who would doubtless be mobbed at the Astor-place House, but who has been well received at the elegant Opera House in Berlin, is soon to play his round of Shakespearian characters on some Parisian stage. He is, I believe, our compatriot. Lebas le Nègre, who, in this revival of the dramatic black art, figures nightly with sufficient applause, is not, and cannot be further treated of among American representatives abroad.

By a letter from M. Chauvel, printed in the Indépendance Belge, on the subject of the estate given to M. De Lamartine by the sultan, we learn that the Turkish minister has repurchased the concession from the French poet for an annuity of 80,000 piastres (about 750*l.*) to be duly paid for twenty-three years. — Athenæum.

I HOPE YOU WON'T PROPOSE.

BY MRS. ABDY.

You say "the dew is on the rose, the stars are o'er the sea" —
Roses and stars have seldom been discussed by you and me,
Save when we viewed the former in the Flower-show's bright array,
Or gazed upon the latter from a side-box at the play.
You never wore in Regent-street such sad and anxious looks —
You never talked in Belgrave-square of cottages and brooks !
Why do you speak about "the bliss that mutual love bestows" ?
Why quote from Shentone's Pastorals ? I hope you won't propose !

Now, should you really ask of me my freedom to forego,
And I pronounced (for so I should) a frank, decisive "No !" —
Just tell me, could you ever hope hereafter to appear
In public, as my chosen knight, my favored cavalier ?

CCCLXVII. LIVING AGE. VOL. I. 17

We must pass by one another with looks as cold and proud
As the couple in Haynes Bayly's song, who "met, 't was in a crowd !"
Refusals leave a sting behind, so every wise man knows ;
And those who doubt the answer should beware
how they propose !
Nor could I soon another find so ready at my call,
So careful of my handkerchief, my bouquet, and my shawl.
Who would secure the opera-box ? who would so ably choose
The best and most conspicuous seats at races and reviews ?
Who would mount guard beside my stall with such a gallant air,
When I vended "lady-trifles" at the crowded
Fancy Fair ?
And who would take a second when I sang "The Boatie Rows" ?
In our water-parties on the Thames ? I hope you won't propose !
Then, when we once were seen apart, imagine, if you can,
What snares society would set to trap the marrying man !

Girls, chaperons, and mothers would be always in your way ;
You would feel in every drawing-room just like a stag at bay.
While I, unwelcome suitors would beset my path
by scores ;
Pert coxcombs, country cousins, blockheads, fortune-hunters, bores,
All ready to pursue, annoy, plead, flatter, fawn,
and prose.
Do save me from the horrid tribe ! in pity don't propose !

By all the gay assemblies we have gone to, night
by night, (Termed, I believe, in poetry, "the halls of dazzling light !")
By our soft and quiet whispers, when with Jullien's concerts dined —
By our speechless rapture when we heard the notes of Jenny Lind —
By our Crystal Palace saunters, when we saw in rapt surprise
The wonders of Arabian tales unfolded to our eyes —
By all the "Claude Lorrain effects" that faithful Memory throws
Over three successive seasons, I adjure you, don't propose !

I fear that "love in idleness" must thrive in scenes like these ;
Do let us quit these silent shades, these "odious, odious trees !"
I scarcely think the little god would ever cross your path
On the breezy cliffs of Brighton, or the gay parades of Bath.
And when the London Spring returns, with all its countless train
Of pleasures to attract the eye, and fill the busy brain,
New dancers, singers, pictures, books, plays,
parties, belles, and beaux,
My mind will be relieved from fear — I know you won't propose !

SONG OF THE SABBATH.

The Sabbath day — the gracious day !
Bringing the gift of peace,
Chasing life's rudest cares away,
Letting tired labor cease ;
Breaking like sunshine on the earth,
Bidding vain shadows flee ;
Calling for praise and sinless mirth ;
Making the bondman free.

The Sabbath day — the priceless boon !
Let not the sordid deem
It yields no gain, it comes too soon ;
It is of light esteem.
Let not the bigot sternly say
His temple claims it all ;
Who shall imprison Mercy's ray
Within that narrow wall ?

The Sabbath day — the separate :
For which with yearning sighs
The wearied workers patient wait,
And joy to see it rise ;
The aching hand, the o'er-tasked brain,
Alike may find repose,
And gather strength to toil again,
And strength to conquer woes.

The Sabbath day — the gift divine !
That, whatso'er our creed,
Supplies with bounteousness benign
Leisure for every need ;
For prayer, for praise, for soothing rest,
For thought of boundless scope,
For heed of Charity's behest,
For love, for joy, for hope.

The Sabbath day — the glorious day !
Beyond the city-gate
Let tens of thousands wend their way
Where breeze and sunshine wait ;
And let them see the streamlets flow,
And tread the daisied sod,
And look upon the buds that blow,
And search and find out God.

The Sabbath day — the buckler strong
That guards the poor and meek,
Shielding the desolate from wrong,
Leaving the tyrant weak.
The Sabbath day — O, prize it well !
Its wisdom learn to scan ;
Alike in temple, field, or cell,
"The Sabbath made for man."

JULIA DAY.

INDIAN FRONTIER.

28th February, 1853

In the approaching dismemberment of Turkey, Austria seeks to gain possession of the Valley of the Danube ; Russia of Constantinople and the adjacent country ; France, of the "Holy Places," or Syria. Under these circumstances, is it not time for England to make provision for securing her Northern Indian frontier, more especially that part of it which extends from the 30th to the 60th meridian East of Greenwich ?

Commencing at the meridian first mentioned, that frontier is truly the Mediterranean, or the boundary of Asia as far as the Black Sea ; from that sea to the Caspian, still the same boundary, or the watershed of the Circassian mountains and the Caucasus ; and from the Caspian eastward to the Sea of Ochotsk the watershed of the Altai, or the mountain-chains separating the rivers that fall into the Arctic Ocean from those that flow into the Aral Sea and southwards.

Within these limits, do not wisdom and duty alike require that, borrowing an idea from her Transatlantic descendants, England adopt and so far carry out "the Monroe principle," as to preclude acquisition of territory by any power but herself ? — Spectator.

THE OCTAVIUS OF MINUCIUS FELIX.*

WE are grateful to Mr. Holden for this new edition of the Octavius of Minucius Felix. To a carefully revised text, improved by consultation of the best manuscripts, he has appended a learned introduction and compendious scholarly notes, which really elucidate the author without vexing the reader by theological crudities or prejudices. And this is no mean recommendation in an age when patristic literature is so often employed as a weapon of offence in religious frays. Minucius Felix was, on many accounts, worth the pains of a new edition. If not one of the most powerful or original of the Christian apologists, he is one of the most pleasant to read. More compact and graceful than the treatise of Arnolius, Adversus Gentes, less rhetorical and tedious than the Institutes of Lactantius, his Octavius sets before us the general points of the Christian controversy with Paganism in a fair and lucid form. Minucius, indeed, is no Boanerges like Tertullian, yet he is an abler defender of the cause which he advocates than was the sophist Libanius, or his imperial pupil Julian, of their decrepit Paganism. The heathen Cæcilius might perhaps make a better fight for his Olympian friends, and the Christian Octavius might hit straighter blows. Celsus and Origen, Faustus and Augustine, Jerome, and Rufinus, handled their swords less like dancers. Yet Octavius and Cæcilius quarrel, on the whole, with earnestness; and their controversy, as recorded in this Dialogue, may be taken as a fair sample of the discussions between the old law and the new which must often have occurred under the porticoes of a Roman villa, or in the studious retirement of Athens. The burden and heat of the strife were borne in other scenes—in the market-place, when some zealous neophyte denounced the procession of the Salian priests on the Martian calends; in the fore-court of the temples, when some stern enthusiast refused to throw incense upon the altar of Jupiter; in the theatre, when some outraged moralist raised his voice against the pollution of the games of Flora; in the camp, when some scarred and grizzled centurion abjured his allegiance to the eagles; or at the prætor's tribunal, when some hardy convert rejected the oath to the Genius of Cæsar. But amid friends and in the home-circle, where the new creed, as its author had foretold, had sown division of hearts, more temperate discussions would occur; and among kinsfolk and acquaintance who really esteemed one another, may have been conducted and concluded with as little acrimony as the dispute in this elegant Dialogue of Minucius. One member of the family—we will suppose an imaginary case—had attracted notice or incurred reproof from his elders for omitting to salute the Lares on his goings-out and comings-in. He had for some time absented himself from the temples on holidays, and had not bowed his head when the statue of Jupiter or Isis was borne in procession through the streets. His singularity had been remarked by the Flamen, and talked about at the prætor's table. Marcus, it was whispered, had become a denier of the gods; had even gone frequently of late to a Jews' chapel on the river's side, and had been seen standing up to his waist in the water, while the Jewish priest muttered over him some unintelligible words. Marcus, too, was ever and anon repeating to himself a kind of charm—carmen—but so far as the words of the charm had any discoverable meaning, they referred to neither love nor war, neither resembled any of the hymns which were sung in the temples at the calends, the ides, or the spring and autumn festivals. Nay, more, Marcus seemed to have taken to evil courses; for he had been traced to an obscure house in the suburbs, where, in an upper chamber, some of the rabble were wont to assemble after sunset—for what purpose no respectable person could say; they could only surmise it was for no good one, since the doors of the chambers were opened only at a certain password. With Marcus, accordingly, it had become high time to talk seriously, for the credit of the family. Prying eyes were around them; the priest of Jupiter had even condescended to speak with the priest of Isis on the subject, and the prefect of the night-watch—the præfectus vigilum—had threatened to bring the case, on the next Nundines, before the sitting ædile. Yet, when Marcus was questioned and reproved, his defence of these proceedings was so good, that he was better than matters ten times worse in the eyes of all right-thinking men. He not only neglected, but defied Jupiter.

* The Octavius of Minucius Felix; with an English Introduction, Commentary, Indices, and Analysis. By the Rev. H. A. Holden, M. A., Fellow of Trinity College. Edited for the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press. London: John W. Parker and Son, West Strand. 1853.

He maintained his statue to be a block of stone, his altar an abomination, his flamen an impostor, his worshippers dupes, and his pretensions to prayers and frankincense as hollow as the pedestal which supported him, his eagle, and thunderbolts. Marcus averred that, for his part, he adored a mysterious, and sublime, and beneficent Being, who had neither statue, nor altar, nor pompous temple, but who had proved his divine authority by tokens more astounding than even the mysteries or the oracles, and who had given to mankind a written record of himself, older than the Night and Chaos of the Bæotian minstrel, Hesiod. And with such power, and withal such gentleness, did Marcus explain his novel doctrines, that before long the priest of Jupiter suffered further losses in his congregation. The household of Marcus came no more to the temple.

The Dialogue of Minucius represents one of these milder forms of conversion to Christianity. Its plot is simple; its dramatis personæ are three only in number — Minucius himself, the Christian Octavius, and the heathen Cæcilius; the arguments are drawn from the surface of the conflicting creeds, and the language in which they are canvassed would have won an approving smile from Cicero, as a well-intended copy of his own philosophical dialogues. The form and accessories of the Octavius are remarkably graceful. From Plato the ancient writers of imaginary conversations learned the art of prefixing to philosophical discussions a pictorial proscenium of woodland, and running waters, and cool green valleys yielding prospect of "towered cities." In the Octavius, the beach of Ostia, and the "blue Mediterranean," whispering among the shingle, and the distant hum of the port of Rome, and the measured chant of fishermen pushing off their boats, and the laughter of children skimming smooth pebbles on the surface of the waves — we have played at "duck and drake" ourselves, to our great contentment — are the pictorial adjuncts of the scene. It is the autumn of a year — early, Mr. Holden thinks, in the reign of the good Alexander Severus, the cosmopolite emperor who placed statuettes of Abraham and of Jesus in his cabinet — and throughout Campania, and on the sunny slopes of the Falernian hills the in-gathering of the grapes is proceeding busily. At this season three Roman gentlemen of the bar have the smoke and noise and pomp of the metropolis for the quiet shore and marine baths of Ostia. Minucius dwells upon the freshness of the morning, and the gentle oscillations of the sea and the sand, and the delight of leisure and congenial company — "the feast of reason and the flow of soul." He had earned his relish for these sterling pleasures by assiduous attendance in the courts of law during a July spent in Rome. But lawyers, even in vacations, are an argumentative race. Sir Matthew Hale used to "put cases" to his children in their country walks; Lord Keeper North would read the "Reports" in an arbor opening on his bowling-green; and Lord Eldon is said to have drawn a case of trespass — in re Douglas versus Northumberland — upon the evidence afforded by "Chevy-Chase." So long as Minucius and his learned friends converse about things in general, "all goes merry as a marriage-bell." But a controversy soon springs up. It seems that upon that Ostian shore was erected a temple, or at least a statue of Serapis, who, after his migration from the kingdom of Pontus to Alexandria, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, had moved further westward, and had become a fashionable deity in the Italian peninsula. We do not know whether he had supplanted Neptune, or whether the Italian mariners saluted him on leaving and returning to port, or whether those who had escaped the sirocco were wont to suspend votive tablets in his chapel. But whatever his business may have been, there and then Serapis was; and Cæcilius paid his compliments, in passing, to the Pontic deity by kissing the tips of his own fingers. This harmless mark of respect — upon a par with Madame de Sevigné's going to mass par politesse — stirs, however, the bile of the Christian Octavius, and he forthwith reproves Minucius for allowing his friend to continue in such heathen ignorance. The rebuke, although uttered half-aside, reaches the ears and wounds the pride of Cæcilius. He turns sulky for a few minutes, and, "after short silence," challenges Octavius to maintain his incivility by a formal argument in defence of his new-fangled creed. Cæcilius and Octavius respectively plead the cause of the declining and the ascendant faith. Minucius acts as "judicious bottle-holder" to the combatants, and the Pagan champion, as was preordained by the author of the dialogue, "gives in" at last, and politely thanks the instrument of his conversion.

We shall not recapitulate their arguments ; they are drawn from the common stock of the Christian apologists, and many of them had long before been stored in the quivers of the philosophical schools. Plato and Epicurus and Lucian barbed some of the keenest shafts for the Christian archers. Moreover, the dialogue itself is short and agreeable to read, and Mr. Holden's commentary will increase the pleasure as well as the profit of perusing it. We shall rather attempt to direct the reader's attention for a few minutes to the controversy itself, and to some of the social and ethical phenomena appertaining to it.

The struggle between Paganism and Christianity, even if surveyed in its intellectual aspect alone, is one of absorbing interest. As respects its general form, there can scarcely be imagined a more striking contrast than that between the rude vigor of the earlier Christian manifestoes, and the polished art and erudition of the philosophical treatises of Cicero and Seneca. Unfortunately, we possess scarcely any means of nearer comparison, since the bigotry of their opponents has left fragments only of the Pagan apologists, as they chanced to be accidentally imbedded in the writings of their foes. As respects their subject-matter, there can hardly be a more marked distinction than that between the impulsive earnestness of Paul of Tarsus, Ignatius, or Justin Martyr, and the dexterous gladiatorial fencing of the later heathen moralists. The former write "as with authority," and seldom regard the laws of logical combat ; the latter build up their arguments with the polished and plausible eloquence of men who are making the best of their case, without being vitally convinced of its truth. With the one it is a matter of life or death spiritually ; with the other, a stake of skill and reputation intellectually. The one fight like men leading a forlorn hope ; the other, like men who are maintaining their ground in a fortress planned by Vauban, and impregnable while assailed only by the ordinary rules of war. Until the fields of Morgarten and Nancy had proved the contrary, no one dreamed that the chivalry of Burgundy would bend as reeds before the pikemen of Soleure and Lucerne ; and in the second century, it seemed as incredible that the assertions of a few Galilean peasants, even when backed by a pupil of Gamaliel, would shiver the dialectics of centuries, and make practicable breaches in the strongest forts of philosophy.

Most fair indeed, in the eyes of contemporaries, was the aspect of Paganism during the first two centuries of the Roman empire. War, at least upon the scale of the unceasing and absorbing wars of the Commonwealth, had died down. The frontiers of the Rhine and the Euphrates, indeed, bristled with the summer and winter camps of the legions, and the Parthians and Germans occasionally swept off the harvests and wheeled around the fortresses of the northern and the eastern provinces. But these calamities touched upon the verge only of the Roman world. Within its ample circumference the Pax Romana abode securely. The capitals of ancient kingdoms, which the consuls had laid in ashes, were restored by the emperors to their original grandeur and beauty ; the rude villages and towns of Gaul and Iberia were replaced by stately and flourishing cities ; and if Greece and Asia Minor were somewhat shorn of their early splendor, western Europe was brought within the pale of Hellenic civilization. Rome, indeed, for the most part, made large compensations to the world for the independence it suppressed, and for the sufferings which it had inflicted. In its material aspects the evening of Paganism was calm and even august ; and to the superficial observer its moral surface presented no signal tokens of decrepitude and decay.

Yet the perpetuity which its poets, orators, and panegyrists promised to Rome—and promised probably without insincerity or misgivings—rested on a hollow basis. Its great mutations had been acted. Its serenity was the slumber of approaching dissolution. The only living principle throughout its inert mass was Christianity, and that was directly hostile to the perpetuity of Rome. It was hostile to the Cæsars, because they assumed in life and in death the honors due to Christ alone ; it was hostile to the established religion as "the doctrine of devils ;" to philosophy as "a tissue of errors, if not of fraud ;" to literature, as the sounding brass or the tinkling cymbals of pride or impurity ; to the arts and recreations of society, as the garnish of idolatry or the ministers of sensuality ; to the general tenor of ethnic manners and morals, as inconsistent with the precepts of their lawgiver. It is not, indeed, easy for us, whose social system presumes, even where it does not exhibit the influence of the Gospel, to realize the feeling with which a Christian of the second century contemplated the world around him. The features of Paganism, which we, standing apart from them, regard with interest, were to him foul and hideous deformities. We painfully unroll the rolls of papyrus, and preserve in museums the storied urns and mutilated busts; he would have flung the Æneid back into the flames, to which its author on his death-bed had recommended it, and would have shattered the Apollo, even as Josiah purged the valley of Hinnom from the abominations of the Zidonians. As difficult is it to represent to ourselves the surprise and indignation with which even conscientious heathens of the same period regarded their Christian neighbors. From mere humanity, or sentiments of neighborhood and friendship, they would not join in the cry of the multitude, Christianos ad leones; yet they might fairly think that such perverse offenders against law and custom were legitimate objects for coercion by the magistrate. Now and then we read in our police-reports of some crack-brained fanatic's dashing to pieces the storied window of a cathedral, or scoring with his knife a picture of the Trinity, and thinking that he is doing the Lord's work by so much wilful damage. But such outrages, which among ourselves may not happen once a year, were of ordinary occurrence in the earlier ages of Christianity, and were not perpetrated by fanatics only. Yet they were not the less inexplicable to heathen observers because they might be frequent. They would infer from the conduct and conversation of such neighbors—and there have been many inferences less just—a rooted malignity, or at least a most incomprehensible perverseness of nature. "What," they may be supposed to have said, "would these people have! The state-machine moves smoothly; the taxes might be lighter, yet, at all events, they are no longer 'jobbed,' by companies or individual publicani, but collected regularly by Cæsar's procurators. The conscription no longer decimates the people, for there are no wars, and the soldier is as likely to die in his bed as by a Parthian arrow. It were better if the poor were employed; meanwhile they are fed by the government; and if the theatre does not conduce to good morals, it is not worse than it was a hundred years ago, when none found fault with it. As for our religion, it sufficed our ancestors, and they were wise, and honest, and brave men; and he whom the oracle pronounced the wisest among them, especially enjoined his hearers to respect the creed and rituals of the state. In worshipping the Cæsars we indeed sometimes pay but a scurvy compliment to the gods by giving them such copartners in their incense and oblations. Yet, even in this matter, we are hardly innovators; for did not the old Romans make a god of Romulus! and the Egyptians, whom in their obstinacy these Galileans much resemble, deified their Pharaohs and Ptolemies. As for our household-life, it is not more lax than was that of Carthage, Athens, or Syracuse, while our literature is at least as decorous as it was in the time of Ovid or Martial. And yet, forsooth, these peevish puritans would persuade us that the world is coming to an end through the transcendent wickedness of this our generation. They would fain mend all things according to their own fancies, and their mending would be some such work as that of drunken Flaccus the tailor, who yesterday, putting a new border to my prætecta, rent the whole gown from top to bottom. A murder on him and them! They would displace the Cæsars, throw down the statues of the gods, shut up the theatres, stop processions on the calends, and even put out the lamp on Vesta's altar, because they have picked up notions from the Jews' books that such observances are displeasing to the gods. Nay, these pestilent meddlers are not even content with vilifying our rites and opinions; but claim our homage for a Galilean peasant whom one of our procurators put to death more than a century and a half ago. Our divinities, they allege, are evil demons in human shape; or if, as Euhemerus supposed them to be, once mere men, they were men of the worst character, who for their crimes merited a carnifex, rather than a pontifex, to wait upon them. Now, neither my friend Sossius Senecio, the philosopher, nor my good neighbor and kinsman Lucius, the ædile of the markets, a worthy common-place person enough, yet no fool, believes that Jupiter really bestrides a ridge of Olympus, or wears such ambrosial curls as Homer and Pheidias ascribe to him. Yet neither of them scruples flinging a few grains of incense upon his altar, or occasionally buying a kid heifer for his Flamen to kill and eat. For so did our fathers five hundred years back; and the gods prospered the work of their hands, and gave them wit and valor enough to win this empire which we now possess in security, and might with comfort, were it not for these cavillers of yesterday. It was a good deed of the old emperor Tiberius, to pack four thousand of them off at once to Sardinia, where the marsh fever gave them something to grumble for."

We have endeavored to exhibit in a somewhat dramatic form the opposite views which a Christian and heathen respectively would take of the moral and social world in the age of Alexander Severus, and about the time when Minucius probably composed his dialogue of Octavius. To our fancied interlocutors we have ascribed the opinions which Minucius and the Christian apologists in general attribute to their opponents, or adopt for themselves. We now proceed to examine other features of this memorable contest between "old things and new."

To every earnest mind the contemplation of an outworn and decaying system of belief is unutterably painful. Man, individually, remains much the same under any system of belief. His youth is actuated by similar passions; his manhood affected by similar objects of desire; and his old age consoled or embittered with similar retrospects and relaxations of activity. But, in an age of social and moral decrepitude, the passions of youth are more feebly controlled by law and by opinion; the aspirations of manhood have fewer definite aims; and the retrospects of age are less fraught with satisfactions derived from the past. It is too late for great thoughts or great deeds; for the one there is no longer a proper centre — for the other, no possible career. In the decline of Paganism, and before Christianity had infused new vigor into the principles of action, so much of life as was not absorbed by sensual or selfish cares, must have been tinged with sadness — with the sadness which ever attends upon uncertainty. That it was so tinged, we may discern in the subdued tone of the later ethical writers, in the good-natured Plutarch, in the sterner mood of Epictetus, and even in the sarcastic humor of Lucian—who, by the way, is much misrepresented, when, on the ground of a few, and not the best of his writings, he is described as a mere scoffer. The philosophy which at the time Minucius was writing arrayed itself against Christianity, was both in its form and purpose syncretic — that is, it aimed at a species of notional optimism, and attempted to harmonize all previous systems, and to extract from each, however discordant or however irreconcilable, their joint or several stock of truth. But, unluckily for this and all subsequent and similar attempts, there is such a thing as over-truth, or truism; and truisms, or general maxims which nobody questions and which nobody acts upon, were the unavoidable results of this syncretic process of filtration.

Let us take a familiar illustration. In the realm of diamonds the Koh-i-Noor is the acknowledged king. Yet, of the many thousand spectators of this prince of gems who peered into his tabernacle of glass in 1851, few went away contented with his adamantine majesty. "His form is clumsy," said one party; "his lustre is feeble," said another; a third discovered specks on his surface; a fourth suggested "soap and water." There was ground, it seems, for these re-proaches; for subsequently the king of diamonds has been trimmed and polished, and has come forth from this process "much improved." Now, to the metaphysicians of the third century of the Christian era, philosophy was somewhat in the circumstances of the Koh-i-Noor. It was not shapely enough; it was not luminous enough; it was flawed; it needed "soap and water;" it must be ground into fair and marketable proportions. The Koh-i-Noor, we are informed, has gained, by the lithotrical treatment to which it has been subjected, greatly in splendor, and lost next to nothing in size. Philosophy did not fare so well from the raspings to which it was subjected. "Accommodate is a good word," but accommodation of principles leads to much bungling work in philosophy, and does not succeed at all better in religion. By its syncretic regimen philosophy was attenuated more than it was refined; it was made to sparkle in sententious epigrams rather than to emit a steady brilliance. It had even degenerated in form. No species of composition, except the pure drama itself, is so dramatic as Plato's dialogues. We become as anxious for the denouement of the dialectic plot as for the solution of the tragic or comic fable. The interlocutors are as proper personages as Agamemnon and Antigone, and Socrates is as amusing a character as the Demos or the sausage-seller themselves. But if we except a few of Lucian's dialogues, we must convict in the mass the ethical dissertations of the later Greek and Roman philosophers for their dullness and defect of dialectic power. The inferiority arose from the want of vital interest in any great philosophical truth. The great problems of psychology had all been mooted without being solved; the great experiments in law and politics had all been made, and had ended in despotism. Religion had long been regarded as a conventional imposture, at which the very priests smiled in the streets, and which the magistrate had almost ceased to view as a useful auxiliary to the police. It was to little purpose that the four leading philosophic sects were beginning to abandon, in the presence of their common foe, their separate tenets, and to merge their discrepancies in a superficial uniformity. The life which had forsaken the parts could not be transferred into the whole. For organic union a new centre and principle of psychological truth was requisite.

These were found in an unexpected quarter — in a suburb which philosophy had long regarded with as much disdain as the burghers of Warsaw and the Hanse Towns felt for the Jews' quarter in their cities. "Can any good thing come out from Galilee?" was once again superciliously asked, when the first obscure apologists presented to Trajan and the Antonines their appeals for a fair hearing. These men, it was alleged, who petitioned Cæsar for indulgence, are the Pariah caste of a nation more mutinous than the Egyptians and more effeminate than the Syrians; and, thrust out by their own nation and kindred, they are suing for admission into the company of our pontiffs and philosophers.

If Trajan or Aurelius had at any time leisure or inclination to turn over the scrolls of a Christian apology, he was probably struck with equal surprise and disgust at its contents. On the one hand, he would marvel at the high moral tone of its ethics and at its constant assertion of the unity of the divine nature — a truth which the philosophic systems had each, in its turn, adumbrated, but none of them broadly announced. He would mark with satisfaction that these treatises were couched in a spirit of fervent loyalty; that prayers — such as they were — and often they were such as, for their comprehensive piety, would have well befitted the secular games — were offered up for his own welfare and that of the empire; and that they denied none of his earthly attributes, but rendered cheerfully unto Cæsar the things which were his. If, moreover, the emperor, as Hadrian had been, was initiated in the mysteries, his wonder would be increased in proportion as he discovered in the rude manifesto before him intimations of secret bonds and recondite emblems or dogmas more awful and enigmatic than any which the Eleusinian hierophants had disclosed to his gaze. On the other hand, he would be offended by the presumptuous tone of the apologists. Men untrained in the schools, and unacquainted with the very A B C of philosophical terminology, denounced in this audacious roll the wisdom of the wise as folly and the creed of the civilized world as a rank imposture. The petitioners, he would remark, seldom argued and generally asserted: they cut the knots of the deepest ethical problems without scruple, and challenged discussion while they ignored the practice and theoretic of every sect in its turn. What manner of men are these, he may well have pondered in himself, who, in the very act of seeking protection for their dogmas, wage universal war with received opinions, and combine a philosophy worthy of Plato with the impiety of Diagoras the Melian?

Such, probably, was the aspect which the earliest manifestoes of the Christians presented to a philosophic heathen. To the magistrate the next important question would be, how far have these opinions already prevailed? The apologists themselves alleged, and the police reports of the day would confirm their allegation, that they had reached to Cæsar's household, and had insinuated themselves into the camp, the forum, and even the very temples of the empire. It did not appear, indeed, that they were connected with any political movement, for, upon inquiry, the recent tumults in Cyprus, and that everlasting caldron of sedition, Judæa, were not merely disowned by the apologists, who, in fact, were hated by the insurgents, and hated them in turn with true theological rancor. In fact, so far as they had aught in common with any party or person, the Christians were most inclined to fraternize with the Platonic academy, and a syncretic reconciliation had in fact commenced in some quarters, and especially at Alexandria, between them.

Now syncretism, under every possible form — ethical, political, social, and theological, was the favorite policy of the Roman emperors. They would have all the varieties of mankind called in and restamped at the Cæsarean mint. Syria should bear the same impress as Britain, and the Morinian, who picked up amber on the shores of the Baltic, be brought to resemble the Bibyan who yearly descended the Nile with ivory and frankincense. In the world of thought similar tendencies were visible. No writers resemble one another more closely than the Roman poets and historians who flourished between the reigns of Claudius and Commodus. There are, indeed, diversities of gifts among them, but there is an extraordinary similarity in the character of their minds. If all memorials of the authors had perished, no attentive reader could doubt that Quintilian, the Plinys, and Tacitus, belonged to the same age, or that Lucan, Silius, and Valerius Flaccus held similar canons of poetry. Nor was Christianity itself, in spite of its occasional denunciations of the world and its rulers, averse to syncretism, on certain conditions, with the empire. Its records were addressed to all mankind: its missionaries had penetrated into every region, and it found everywhere, short of the verge of barbarism, the human race gathered into two principal hemispheres of government. From the Hyphasis to the Atlantic — the arena in which the new religion moved principally — two empires, and two alone, were to be found. Each minor body politic had been drawn into one or other of these mighty circles. He who was neither the subject nor the ally of the Cæsar whose throne was on the Seven Hills, was the slave or the friend of the great king of Susa or Ecbatana.

The unity of the political world paved the way for the unity of creed and ritual. And in this respect Christianity possessed over its antagonist an advantage almost in itself alone decisive of victory. Although not without internal divisions, it possessed certain primary and universal truths common to all its sects:

it regarded Pagandom as its common foe, and it marched in a compact mass to the assault of the established religion. Its adversaries, on the contrary, had no common principle of union; neither code nor charter of opinion; their philosophy was caviare to the general, and their ritual an empty, and often an absurd and offensive, pageant to the instructed. Even when Cicero was drawing up his manuals of ethics and theology for the use of his countrymen, and interpreting, not very successfully, to their more practical understandings, the subtle speculations of the Greeks, mankind at large had become weary both of their priestly and their philosophical teachers. The latter they knew for pedants, the former they more than suspected to be quacks. Consciously or unconsciously, they required a law by which to steer amid the ebb and flow of opinion, and since philosophy doubted, while Christianity decided, the latter rapidly attracted to its banners all who desired relief from doubt.

So far we have attempted to compress the argument between the old and new belief, as it related to religion and philosophy. But this is by no means the only ground on which the apologists and their opponents contended. Each side in these controversies produced a list of crimes committed ordinarily by the adverse faction, and Octavius and Cæcilius respectively bandy reproaches of fraud, cruelty, and licentiousness. This, indeed, is the favorite ground of attack and the most secure position of defence with all the Christian writers. Yet to us, who command a view of the entire battle-field, the assault probably appears more effective, and the position stronger than they appeared to contemporary eyes. So much, at least, we infer from the anxiety with which, on these points, the apologists prepare them both for defence and reprisals. The attack was comparatively easy. The arts, the literature, and the social life of Pagandom, even in its better ages, were all deeply infected with impurity; and at the time when Minucius wrote, a fresh stream of Syrian corruption had recently been poured into Rome by Elagabalus. Yet rife and even anomalous as were the vices of the Roman world in its period of decay, we should perhaps accept the relations of the apologists with some caution. Seneca, in his caustic and antithetical way, has sketched the portraits of certain prodigies of immorality in his time; but he has also drawn the lineaments of many noble characters among his contemporaries. The most delightful portions of the letters of the younger Pliny are those in which he describes the life of the country-gentleman — if we may transplant the term — of Italy, the accomplished Terentius and his no less accomplished wife, Pliny's neighbors at Comum, and Spurinna, an Etruscan Squire Allworthy. In Macrobius and Aulus Gellius we have glimpses of circles where high intellectual cultivation went hand in hand with at least decorum; and even in Apuleius we meet with records of unobtrusive virtues in the heart of social corruption. We are not in a position to decide whether these are rare or ordinary exceptions; but at least these casual examples of worth afford a ground for doubting the wholesale denunciations of the apologists. Fashionable literature — such as the poetry of Ovid, Martial, and even Ausonius — is but an indifferent test of the morality of an age. It may have floated down to us, because it was from the first popular by virtue of its corruption. Paul de Kock and Dumas will probably survive, as they long since supplanted Fenelon. Neither is history necessarily a sure guide, since it deals only or chiefly with the eminences of social life, and these, like the dregs, are, for the most part, in corrupt eras, the chosen haunts of vice. We read Tacitus and Suetonius with some distrust; and we extend our distrust, in some degree, on similar grounds, to Tertullian and Augustine, when they declaim upon manners and morals. They had a case to make out; and they had plenty of witnesses to call, and they have had the Christian world ever since for their jury and judges. Compared with other apologists, Minucius is moderate in his assault upon the vices of his time; and the tone of his reproaches is that of an earnest but good-natured man, displaying as much pity as anger in his rebuke. The defence of the Christians, again, may appear to us easier than it really was at the time to its actual champions; for they were committed, in limine, to two formidable objections. First, in denying the truth of the state-religion they denied the authority of the Cæsar as supreme pontiff, and thereby exposed themselves to the penalties of the lex majestatis, the law of high treason; and, secondly, by setting themselves against the entire texture and machinery of Paganism, they assailed the whole system of gentile, local, and national worship, and accordingly so far arrayed themselves against so many of the elements of social order. Consequently we find, both in the dialogue before us, and in longer and more animated manifestoes, elaborate, exaggerated, and punctilious expressions of loyalty to the emperors, in their civil capacity, as the rulers appointed by God. No Jacobite was ever more zealous and laudatory toward his exiled prince, than Tertullian shows himself to the Cæsar of his day; especially after some civic picture of the everlasting torments in store for two thirds of the Cæsar's subjects, and by implication accordingly for the Cæsar himself, if he sanctions or partakes in such and such abominations. So that the Christian apologists ran inevitably upon the horns of this dilemma—professing themselves the most obedient and orderly of citizens, they did their best to pull down the social machinery of the world; and, avowing themselves the most loyal of subjects, they assailed the most sacred attributes of the Cæsar, his pontificate and his apotheosis. This was indeed bearding the lion in his den; these were worshipful truths to tell the master of thirty legions and of any number of lictors, with sharp axes upon their shoulders, to boot. Upon the whole, we are inclined to think that, all circumstances considered, the Cæsars, from Nero to Constantine, were a tolerant race of despots. Francis I., of France, to expiate, in the eyes of Christendom, his alliance with the Sultan against Austria; Henry VIII., to maintain his own divine right to curb men's consciences, and Philip the Second and Third of Spain, to clear their dominions of Jews and Moriscos, committed more wholesale atrocities than were perpetrated by the Pagan emperors, and without their excuses for ignorance or panic. Fortunately for the apologists and their brethren, the age in which they wrote their fiery declamations was not a reading age, and the sovereign and his ministers were generally too deeply engrossed in business or pleasure for the Christian defences to reach the imperial or ministerial bureaux regularly with the other police and provincial reports. We know from Pliny's letters, when they did reach head-quarters, how greatly they perplexed the circumspect and humane Trajan, and how reluctantly he signed the rescripts for punishing the offenders against the majesty of Jupiter and his own.

We have endeavored to place before our readers the argument of the Dialogue of Octavius in the light in which it was probably regarded by contemporaries. We, who see the results only of the diffusion of Christianity, who live in a social system which presupposes its truth and partially adopts its maxims, and whose private as well as public morals profess to be founded upon its laws, can but imperfectly appreciate the position of its early champions, unless we place ourselves, so far as we can ideally, upon the ground occupied by them. We repeat our thanks to Mr. Holden for placing within the reach and drawing the attention of the student to this classical writer. We trust that he may be induced to extend his labors in this direction, and employ his various and accurate scholarship upon other popular treatises of the patristic age. Our universities have been too prone hitherto to regard the writings of the Fathers as merely foundries for Church of England artillery against dissent, and we are glad to receive from the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press, as an earnest of better things in future, this edition of a Christian apologist, who illustrates the history of opinion without adding fuel to controversy.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS. — Jan. 11. — J. M. Rendel, Esq., President, in the chair. "On the Nature and Properties of Timber, with Notices of several Methods, now in use, for its Preservation from Decay," by Mr. H. P. Burt. The author examined the different species of home and foreign grown timber, their various properties, uses, tendencies to decay, under certain circumstances, the most apparent causes of dry rot, the formation of fungi, and the action of wet and of heat; noticing the extraordinary duration of specimens of timber found in Egypt, in the ruins of Nineveh, and in the more recent monastic and castellated edifices of this country. The chemical constitution of wood was examined, in order to trace the origin of decay, and to lead to the consideration of the most efficient means of arresting it. The necessity for some efficacious and yet moderately cheap system of preserving timber, was insisted on, from the great demand for railway and other engineering works, not only in Europe, but even in the East Indies; where it was remarkable, that the wood which would resist the climate and the ravages of the white ant, was only to be found at such distances inland, that the expense of carriage, in a country devoid of good means of communication, rendered it more economical to buy fir timber in the north of Europe, convert it to the required dimensions, and saturate it with creosote in England, and convey it by sea to India, for the use of the railway now in course of construction in that country. The earliest records of preserving animal and vegetable substances were traced back to the Egyptians, whose mummies were embalmed by being boiled in pitch, found floating in the lakes; the linen and the timber, so preserved, gave the first idea for adapting the process to the wants of the present period, and several of the patents granted were enumerated and commented on; the greatest space being devoted to those of Kyan, for chloride of mercury; Burnett, for chloride of zinc; Margary, for acetate, or sulphate of copper; Payne, for the use of two solutions in succession, mutually decomposing each other, and forming an insoluble substance in the pores of the wood; and Bethell, for creosote, or oil of coal-tar; — which last had, by its extensive employment in harbor, railway, and other engineering works, proved, that when properly executed, the preservation of the timber from decay and from the ravages of insects might be considered complete. The paper was illustrated by a series of models and drawings, showing the various apparatus for the several processes, enlarged diagrams of microscopic views of sections of several kinds of timber, both in the natural state and after being creosoted; experiments on the degrees of saturation by the process, and on the transverse strength of the timber; with the results of the improvements introduced into the system by the author, whose experience had been very extensive. — Athenæum.

FLIES IN AMBER.

BY PROFESSOR ROBERT HUNT.

STRANGE mysteries appear to surround this curious natural production. It long stood between the three kingdoms of nature, like the Egyptian sphinx, an unsolved enigma: hence amber attracted the attention alike of the poet and of the philosopher, and it became the basis of more than one romantic story. Eventually, by subjecting amber to a peculiar kind of optical analysis, the enigma was solved; and, by its action on polarized light, it was determined most certainly to be a vegetable resin.

A fine transparent piece of amber appears as though it were a thing of yesterday — the gathered tears of some oriental gum tree, full of sunlight: yet it is as old, it may be older, than the hills. The flies in amber tell us thus much — there they are:

We know the thing is neither rich nor rare,
But wonder how they have become entangled in the now stony resin. It must have been distilled from the branches of trees, and, hanging thereon like honey dews, have enticed, and afterwards entangled them in its viscous mass. Severe has been the struggle, in many cases, by the poor prisoners; they have sought to regain their liberty, and sacrificed their limbs in the effort. It is no unusual thing to find flies of all sizes, and even sturdy beetles, who have been caught in the slimy juice, with their legs and wings torn off and scattered around them; yet was the struggle in vain — they remain entombed, mummified with more than Egyptian art, as beautiful and as delicate as they were in life; dismembered things, preserved to tell the story of a very ancient existence.

The forms are numerous, the varieties of flies in amber are very various; yet there is scarcely one of them which is identical with any living creature. The entomology of the amber mines informs us that they were the winged denizens of the air, and the creeping things of the earth, at a time when a tropical climate extended as far north as the Baltic Sea. That indeed they lived in ancient forests, far back in geological time, when south-eastern England had not yet risen from the ocean, and when, probably, a line of cliffs, extending from Weymouth to Scarborough, were still beaten by the waves of a wide-spread sea. Of these imprisoned specimens a curious history is yet to be written; but it is with other flies in amber that we have now to deal — with mysteries more occult than these, and principles which appear to have a world-wide application in each varied form of development.

The study of the psychological phenomena of the Grecian mind brings us acquainted with some beautiful manifestations of that exaltation of human intellect which advances beyond ordinary reason, and assumes many of the characteristics of inspiration.

In the writings of the philosophers of Greece, and in their poetical mythology, we find numerous examples of the outshading of philosophic truths, which inductive science has since rendered familiar to the world. It would appear, that, by careful culture of the powers of the mind, the lovers of wisdom became enabled to think out great truths, which are now developed to us by the mechanical process of experiment.

The Greek mythical creations display the resistless powers of supreme intellect in developing life, and order, and beauty, out of the chaos which belongs alike to every theogony. They are all sublime outshadings of the spiritual nature which was seen to exist behind ordinary nature. They show, as through a veil, the workings of those subtle agencies by which the great phenomena of creation are produced. The philosophers taught the people to believe that everything in nature was under the guidance of an especial spirituality; and thus were created those "spirits of air, and earth, and sea," which were the presiding powers of the organic and of the inorganic worlds. Even where observation led to the discovery of a fact, it was clothed in this spiritual vesture, and it became to the Greeks a divinity. Thus, a fine old Grecian, Thales of Miletus, who was probably examining the flies in amber, discovered that when this substance was rubbed, it acquired the power of attracting light bodies; and he interpreted this truth, by supposing amber to possess a spirit, which, being irritated, left its transparent prison, and, gathering up all floating bodies near, flew back with them again.

Electron was the Greek name for amber, and electricity was the epithet by which Thales and his disciples distinguished the spirit they had learned to raise. We have lost the history, if one ever existed, of the progress made in tracking out this wonderful spirit in its devious workings and wanderings; we only know that for nearly two thousand years this fact remained barren of all results, and that the mystery in amber was regarded as one of the unknown things which are dreamt of in our philosophy.

Eventually, an English dreamer, a pensioner of the Charter-house, called Stephen Gray, in 1720, informed the world that something of the mystery of electricity he had solved; and he showed that the same spirit which dwelt in amber was also found in glass, hair, silk, and feathers. Twenty years passed, and some ingenious men at Leyden thought they could devise a plan for eliminating this spirit of the amber, and for collecting and retaining it when once developed. A large glass globe was fixed on an axis and turned rapidly; a gun-barrel, suspended by silken strings, was hung near it, a wire fastened to the gun-barrel, dropping into a glass of water at the other end. The glass globe was excited, as old Thales excited his amber, by friction with the hands; and the person holding the glass of water, upon applying his finger to obtain the spark from the barrel, received a shock, which convinced the terrified experimenters that the spirit was a giant in its wrath. The most exaggerated statements were published in all the large cities of Europe. The glass globe and the Leyden phial, as it was called, was exhibited in Paris and London, and crowds of spectators flocked to witness the discharge, and to feel the "fearful" shock. The spirit of the amber was now fairly developed, and its powers were examined by experiment, guided by the new ideas. Men no longer used thought as the only element in the discovery of knowledge; they had begun to employ their senses and to cultivate habits of observation.

At length, a great single-minded man, who had made his home

*In lands which echo further west
Than the Greeks' island of the blest,* seeing through some of the mystery which enveloped this subtle spirit in amber, resolved on determining by an experiment, beautiful in its simplicity and grand in its danger, the relation which it bore to the awful spirit of the thunder-storm.

The sculptor has idealized the noble form of the impious Ajax defying the lightning; how much more dignified would be a statue of the philosopher compelling the thunder of the heavens to speak aloud its secrets! Benjamin Franklin stood forth from among men in the boldness of his views, and he saw, or thought he saw, in the attractive principle of electron, a power of universal diffusion, and he resolved to examine for himself. He had previously made himself acquainted with the laws by which electricity appeared to be guided, and availing himself of this knowledge, Franklin devised his grand experiment.

He mounted a kite into the air, insulated its string, which served as a conductor, and, waited to see the result. For some time he waited in vain, the evocator received no answer to his call, the spirit refused to obey his summons. But when man calls on nature in the purity of his soul, and solicits earnestly a development of natural truths, nature rarely fails to vouchsafe a reply.

Franklin stood watching his arrangement; presently every fibre of his kite-string was seen to stand on end, and, on applying a pointer to the ball to which it was attached, he was saluted with a discharge of electric fire of precisely the same character as that which had been previously developed from resin and from glass. Here we had a modern Prometheus, indeed, stealing fire from heaven. Thus it was proved that lightning was only a grand manifestation of the same phenomena which had first excited the attention of Thales of Miletus. The danger incurred by the illustrious Franklin was soon fatally proved by the death of a continental philosopher, who repeated his experiment. Professor Rickmann had reared high in the air an electrical conductor, and connected it with some experimental arrangements in his study. Proceeding without sufficient caution, the discharge from a passing thunder-cloud flowed through the conductor, and, penetrating the body of the philosopher, destroyed his life.

Further researches in the same direction confirmed the great result of Benjamin Franklin, and proved that the earth and the air were equally under the influence of this all-pervading element. It was shown that no body existed in nature through which this subtle principle was not diffused, that changes were constantly being produced by the interference of other physical powers, and that in the efforts made to restore equilibrium we had the manifestations of electrical phenomena.

During all the stages of animal and vegetable growth, electricity is either absorbed or given off, and no change can take place in the form of matter without its effecting a corresponding change in its electrical relations. Thus water is converted into vapor, and it takes from the earth some of its electricity. This ascends into the air, and floats as clouds, accumulating in this way its quantity of electrical power. Circumstances may arise through which the electricity is quietly returned back to the earth, or such as may determine a concentration of the electrical element in the atmosphere. It floats on, dark and lowering, with its stored artillery, until, becoming overcharged, it bursts forth in fury, and too frequently performs the work of devastation.

A hill, a tall tree, a pointed spire, becomes the object of heaven's wrath, and it is torn and splintered by the violence of the disruptive discharge from the cloud. We have learnt something of this, and we are profiting by our knowledge. The electricity does not—it cannot—pass by the solid matter of the object upon which it falls; consequently, it endeavors to find its way into the earth by the interstitial spaces between the particles of the solid matter. These channels being insufficient to convey it, they are split and rent in all directions. There are certain bodies which, by their peculiar molecular constitution, have the property of allowing this fluid to pass through it very freely; and if we place such a mass of matter as is sufficient to convey all the electricity of a thunder-cloud to the earth, it will pass along it quietly and harmlessly. Hence we raise a little above the highest point of a building a rod of copper, and continue it to the lowest point, connecting it with the moist earth. In our ships we carry a band of the same metal from the topmast to the copper sheeting beneath the water, and thus all is rendered secure.

There has been a popular error that lightning conductors may become lightning attractors. There are no such thing as attractors of electricity; it strikes a tall tree or church spire, because such objects offer the easiest road for it to return to the earth and restore the electric equilibrium. The lightning copper conductor bears precisely the same relation to the atmospheric electricity, that the pipes which we place from the roofs of our houses, and continue to the earth, do to the rain which falls from a condensing cloud. Neither the rain nor the electricity seeks the channels, but they are provided, and through these they flow.

By a good system of lightning conductors, any extent of country might be protected from thunder-storms; indeed, science proves that it is within the power of man to establish such channels of communication between the solid earth and the ambient air as to maintain a constant balance in the electrical conditions of both, and thus prevent the development of the thunder-storm.

The vineyards of the south of France formerly suffered severely from devastating hail-storms, produced by the sudden congelation of the water of the rain-cloud by its being robbed of its latent heat through a sudden electric discharge. Experience has taught the vine-growers that, by raising lightning conductors over their gardens, they quietly discharge the surplus electricity in the air, prevent the congelation of the water, and consequently remove the cause of injury. The paragrailles, as they are called, are the safeguards to the vine-grower, and where they are plentifully distributed, severe hail-storms are now rarely known.

Thus it is that, by investigating some of the most minute and apparently uninteresting phenomena, we arrive at great truths. The attractive power of amber, first observed by Thales, has led to the solution of the mystery of the thunder-storm; has instructed us how to disarm it of its terrors; and there are yet other points of interest, to which we shall return, showing the advantages which man has derived from studying the flies in amber.

From Chambers' Journal.

A WORD ON BRISTLES.

WE went one day to call upon a mercantile friend, and found him in his store. The place was greatly choked up with casks—quite an imposing array of them; but when told, in answer to our inquiries, that they were full of nothing more than hogs' bristles, the story of much cry and little wool passed across our memory, and, unbending into a smile, we remarked to our friend, that hogs' bristles were probably not a very valuable commodity. "Oh! so, so," replied he; "we are not very full at present; you do not see before you more than some fifty or sixty thousand pounds' worth." Fifty or sixty thousand pounds' worth of hogs' bristles! That seemed fabulous; and it was only by slow degrees, and after much cross-questioning, we arrived at the conviction, that the small article which serves as a jacket to the hog, as a needle to Crispin, and the subject of our paper, is in itself important enough to give the dealers in it a high rank among the merchant-princes of London.

How many who daily use an assemblage of bristles or brushes, named, from these materials, brush,—whether hair-brush, tooth-brush, nail-brush, clothes-brush, hat-brush, or scrubbing-brush,—give a single thought as to its origin, or suffer the thought, if entertained, to go beyond the truism, that the hair comes off the hog's back! Even the gentleman to whom we were indebted for a sight of his stores, frankly confessed that his knowledge of a hog's bristle was much more complete with regard to its quality and value, than to its production and physiology. We may mention, however, that, unlike hair, wool, and other analogous animal coverings, it has two capillary vessels instead of one. It differs, also, in having (technically) a "flag," or a separation of the end into several parts. The rough projections on the surface of other kinds of hair, revealed to the eye by the microscope, and to the touch by drawing them between the thumb and finger, are absent in the bristle. With the cobbler, the flag serves to interweave and fasten his threads, while he sews with the root-end; just as if a tailor were to thread his needle at the point, and work with the eye. All this we introduce parenthetically, just to show the reader that we are "well up" in the subject, and that he may rely upon our learning.

One would imagine that so common a thing as a bristle, identified with the morning-experience of the man who shaves, and of the maid who scours the floor, would have its history narrated in every book of reference upon our shelves. Just so thought we when we shook our friend by the hand, and started off to verify what he had told us, and to add to the stock of knowledge already amassed. Our Britannicas, Metropolitans, and Jury Reports, however, were searched in vain for additional lore. So unimportant in its details is the subject considered, that it figures in books only as an item among other things, and, by means of books, can be traced back to the chief place of export — no further. But there it forms a something worth observing.

We had been through a friend's warehouse, as we have said, and had been astonished over and over again, as we peeped into a tub, and were told that the bristles it contained were valued at from one to two hundred pounds. Having passed a small dark counting-house, whose aspect hardly testified to the real extent of bristle transactions, we were initiated into the chief arcana of the craft. Craft is the proper word; a bristle has to undergo so many processes before it reaches the hand of the brushmaker, that it becomes really a manufactured ware. Arranged on a series of shelves were many bundles, not striking in their appearance, yet very striking as an exemplification of the unthought-of value of familiar things. These bundles represented a goodly number of Russian rubles. They were of various sizes, tied up very neatly, and, in appearance, like corpulent dusting-brushes without handles. Some of them were as they had left their own shores, others had undergone a good many operations — washing, cleansing, combing, bleaching, dyeing. They come over occasionally just as they have been pulled out of the hog's back — dirty, mixed with wool, and saturated with a disagreeable dust; the last a thing which often draws worse than blessings from the dressers, who, to the great prejudice of health, necessarily breathe it into their lungs. Hogs in Siberia, and in other parts where the climate is cold, have an under-coat of woolly hair, of little value in trade, although sometimes it is curled, and serves to stuff cushioned furniture. It has to be combed from the bristle either here or abroad; but as the wool adds materially to the weight, and allowing it to remain saves a good deal of trouble, the folks abroad often remember to forget this part of the manipulation.

Bristles are of various colors — black, white, and intermediate tints. Upon the color the value in some degree depends. White is most valuable, and yellow second; black and gray are inferior. The color of the light varieties is improved by bleaching, and defective colors are dyed black. Incidentally, we wonder that old-fashioned sulphur is still used as a bleaching agent, and that the more effective power of the modern chlorides has not been applied. Is it that the trade, in its manipulations, pursues the even tenor of its way just as in its closeness as a craft? Nearly all the bristles come from Russia. It is commonly said, that a squirrel might leap from tree to tree between St. Petersburg and Moscow and not touch the ground. The same trees whose branches form tenements for the squirrel, tempt innumerable herds of swine to make their habitation beneath. Germany exports the greater quantity next to Russia. The notoriety of Westphalia hams, generally accredited bear hams, is our guarantee for the prevalence of hogs in that country. Included in the supplies is much that is gathered in the provinces of Austria, particularly in the south countries and the mountains of Transylvania. Forests abound in these parts, and the wild boar is common; about one third is forest-land, and food for the hog is profuse. Oak-apples to the extent of 200,000 bushels are thence exported annually. The fact will serve as a clue to the boars' means for nourishment; for where there are oak-apples, there will also be mast — the favorite food. France and Belgium provide a few fine sorts, which overmatch in delicacy but do not approach in quantity the amount from other sources. A small box upon the merchant's bench — say, three feet by one, and one foot deep — as beautifully packed with small pencils of hair as a case of perfumery or chemicals, all as beautifully white as bleached bristles can be made, illustrated well the characteristic délicatesse of the French. Of late years, some have also arrived from America, chiefly from Cincinnati, but in parcels so small, that they hardly form an item in the trade. It is rather remarkable, that the huge continent, covered as it is with mighty forests, where countless hogs run wild, is not more prolific in bristles. Its go-ahead inhabitants have assuredly found out their value, for what involving a profit cannot they espy? Pig-meat is at a discount, and only eaten, as a rule, by the poorest; yet bristles are purchased by America, and in larger parcels than by any other country, next to England, which possesses almost a monopoly of the trade. The Russian and British markets are linked together, and have very little connection with any other in this article. So far as Russia is concerned, the same might be said, indeed, for the whole commerce of the empire. The balance of dealings with any other country almost invariably goes through an English banker.

Not many years ago, the bristles which now come over so nicely prepared, arrived in a higgledy-piggledy state. All lengths and qualities were tied together with a garter — we fall back on our friend's experience — a piece of rag, hide, tow, matting, or any other rude band. The difference is at present so great, that the brushmaker now seeks to emulate him who was once his pupil. The Russians have little claim to originality, but they can copy so well what they see done, that they often excel their preceptors in skill. The value of a bristle is materially increased by the dressing it undergoes. From time to time, a perceptible difference shows itself in all Russian merchandise, as the dealers gain information about the subsequent processes and uses of the articles. The factories of the country are very freely open to the inspection of foreign merchants, for, as our friend remarked, they have everything to gain and nothing to lose from the intercourse.

Some of the bundles shown to us, not the largest, had a circumference of two feet. All the bristles were placed in one direction, and tied round the base with cord made of twisted bark. The roots of the bristle remained, clearly showing that the porcine race are subjected to being plucked, just like a goose of the fens, or a young collegian. It puzzled us a good deal to know how so large a quantity could be made up in one bundle. When a bundle was opened, however, it puzzled us still more, for the mass consisted of several varieties kept quite distinct. The centre-plug of a bundle was of one quality and color, while round it was a casing of another kind, which, again and again, had a concentric band of other hues.

We incidentally mentioned that the bristles are brought over in casks. Arranged in our friend's capacious rooms were half a thousand of them, weighing four or five hundredweight each — a stock about enough, we remarked in our simplicity, to supply every awl with wax-end hairs for life, and the whole world, including savages, with brushes. Yet this was not a large stock. The trade had been brisk throughout the season, and had reduced it; while an early winter in the north had frozen in the fresh consignments, and prevented the replenishment of the stores. Some of those we saw were strong horny spines, seven inches long. Some even reached ten inches; but what they gained in length they lost in wiriness — a great desideratum. The best bristles vary from five and a half to seven inches.

The English pig, which is domesticated for its flesh, supplies no bristle worth preserving, it is the semi-tame herds in the vicinity of St. Petersburg, and in the interior of Russia, which provide the bulk of the bristles; the strongest come from the wild boar, and are used by the shoemaker for his thread, and by the shearman in the brush with which he lays the nap after shearing cloth for the last time. The names distinguishing the various qualities, even of the produce of Germany, are Russian. After the fashion that obtains in zoological collections, a twofold nomenclature is used. The first name refers to the merchant or place, the second to the quality. Here is a specimen. "Mesdrikoff's Okatkas" are highest on the list; then follow successively, "Moscatineff's first sort;" "Koschinikoff's Suchoi;" "Siberian or Veliko Looki, second sort;" "Mettschoffsky's Brack or Rifings" — that is, refuse.

The half-wild animals referred to are bred near the Salgans, or tallow-houses of Russia; buildings used for boiling down fat oxen, which are so numerous as to be slaughtered for their hides and tallow. In the melting season, many herds of swine are farmed by the proprietors, and fed upon the refuse. A month or two will make them so sleek and greasy, that they are driven off to the steppe, and given a few seeds of corn, to refine their flavor. They are so fat, that it is easy to conjecture the hair to have no very tenacious root. With the owners of these animals, the bristle harvest takes a place analogous to shearing in England; but, as we remarked, it is only in the aggregate we know much about the matter. Bristles, in their history, have escaped the notice alike of travellers, authors, and merchants. An author, however, states from hearsay, that a large number of the creatures being driven into a confined spot, the atmosphere is heated to a degree that irritates the skin and makes it soft; and when in this condition, the crop is gathered, and the animal set free.

Every peasant, from the Baltic to Kamtschatka, knows that bristles are available for trade. Agents traverse the continent, and gather in the results of cottage economy in the bristles that have been laid aside. These, with other rural produce, are then transferred to the great fairs of Russia, and disposed of on a gigantic scale. In our own country, where trade is dispersed, we can have no proper idea of the business done at these fairs; at that of Novgorod, it is said that sales are transacted to the extent of 7,000,000*l.* sterling. Purchased by merchants principally at these fairs, bristles form an important article of export from Russia. In 1852 the quantity exported from St. Petersburg alone amounted to 2,187,516 lbs. Think of nearly 3,000,000 poundweights of hogs' bristles leaving one port of one country in one year!

Russian trade, however, depends upon the frost; even hogs' bristles are at its mercy. Winter sometimes approaches so rapidly, that the calculations of the merchants are at fault. The breaking up of winter is equally peculiar, one day serving to crumble into floating mountains what was the day before a continent of ice. Last season, the winter set in so severely, and so early, that many merchantmen were caught and locked in the ice; and our friend himself has at present a store of bristles ice-bound. It will serve to show the magnitude of this extraordinary trade, when we say, that the project was seriously entertained of cutting out the ship, rather than suffer a delay of six months in the consignment. What is more, the project would actually have been carried out if the frost had not been too sharp upon the enterprising projectors. Altogether, 3000 poods, or 108,000 lbs., have been thus kept back at the depot by the frost.

THE LOVE-TEST.

AN ALLEGORY.

A NOBLE maid in olden time,
When lowly love was deemed a crime,
Looked with a gracious eye
On one, whose soul with thoughts sublime,
And ardent hopes, beat high.

Yet was his birth beneath her state,
For her proud sire could boast a great
And royal ancestry,
While his were poor; and ruthless fate
Denied nobility.

Yet worthy of her love, as well
His deeds in arms and arts might tell,
Though but in youthful prime;
And he was known to much excel
In lore of that old time.

Her modest heart to him denied
A secret love; though, with the pride
That turned her sire from worth,
She might not hope to be a bride
To one of lowly birth.

The father, as the tale was told,
Trembled with rage, as calm and bold
He spoke his tender love;
And bade him, ere the day grew old,
Such fond devotion prove.

“Carry the girl to yon hill-top—
And, if you neither faint nor stop,
Yon lady is your own;
But fail—and banish every hope
That mercy shall be shown.

The forfeit then shall be thy life,
And thou shalt wed another wife,
The cold and cheerless grave!”
He dares the chance, and woos the strife,
His hope and love to save.

At once the trial must begin:
And anxious crowds are grouped within
A space the hill beneath;
But small their hope that he may win
So sweet release from death.

The hill was high and steep; the road,
That seldom was by traveller trod,
Was rough, and all o’ergrown
With weeds that grew in slippery sod,
Among the clay and stone.

The lady trembling stood, her hand
Locked in his own; around them stand
The crowd with pitying mien;
The haughty father gives command
To end the anxious scene.

She lies within his proud embrace,
And, sweetly blushing, hides her face,
Some secret tears to shed;
While he to mount the rugged place
Begins with careful tread.

With joyful looks, as though it were Reward enough his love to bear,
He braves the steep ascent;
And seeks his eager strength to spare,
Lest it be early spent.

Soon half the height is gained, but still Rears up its head that fatal hill,
As if their hopes to blast;
But yet, with proud, unconquered will,
He goes secure and fast.

The wondering crowd that gaze below
With pitying eyes as he doth go,
Behold him on his way;
Some watch his path in silent woe,
Some Heaven’s succor pray.

The strongest man the country round
Would not, to reach that lofty ground,
So burdened, strength preserve:—
They little know how love is found
The heart it fills to nerve.

They see her wipe his heated brow;
They see her kiss his forehead now;
Then hold her arms on high
To aid his strength, and lighten so
The toils that on him lie.

Still on he goes, the top is near—
When, with a sudden thrill of fear,
They see him stagger wide;
His strength is failing fast;—oh! where Shall succor be supplied!

But even yet he totters on;
And see, the highest point is won;—
He falls, and she beside him:
His tender love to be his own
No more shall be denied him.

Up to the hill the people speed,
And bid them rise;—they take no heed,
So close and still they lie:—
They’ve won each other for their meed,
But ’t is beyond the sky!

WOULD YOU REMEMBER ME?

BY J. E. CARPENTER.

Would you remember me, take for a token
A flower from the garden, a rose from the tree,
And when the blossom lies scentless and broken,
Withered and dead—’t will remind you of me.

Would you remember me, walk by the ocean
When the rich sunset falls over the sea;
The weeds at your feet, cast ashore by its motion,
The sport of the waves—they’ll remind you of me.

Would you remember me—should it be only
Where in the summer I wandered with thee;—
Then, if you feel in the world you are lonely,
Check not the tear—’t will remind you of me.

Would you remember me when we are parted,
Never, perchance, more each other to see;—
Mingle again with the young and light-hearted;
The mirth and the song will remind you of me.

FALCONRY.

THE pean of the Falcons is being sung again. An amusement originally derived from the East, where the "Grand Seigneur" once boasted of a retinue of 6000 falconers, and still almost universally practised in countries where people are too indolent for the more active sports of the field, is about to be brought back from the same country, and is again spoken of as a most noble and gentle pursuit—fit for "knight and ladye fair;" a source of healthy and innocent enjoyment, and, above all, "a pageant of past glory."

Knox, in his pretty little treatise on "Game Birds and Wild Fowl," has given a graphic account of this exhilarating sport; Mr. W. B. Barker, who has had much experience of the art as practised in the Levant, has devoted two interesting chapters to the subject in his work on "Cilicia;" and we have now before us a still more graphic and amusing sketch of Oriental falconry, in Mr. Burton's "Falconry in the Valley of the Indus."*

It would be more difficult, indeed, to imagine scenes for sport of any description more prolific or more gorgeous than are presented by the long Valley of the Indus.

It was a heart-gladdening spectacle for a sportsman. The pure blue sheet of water, lined with a fringe of vivid green, was literally covered with feathered life. The king-curlew with his ruby crown, and the common curlew so celebrated, despite his homely garb, for the soaring and racing chase he affords, were pacing the banks in busy troops. Gulls and graceful terns hovered over the marsh, here alone in the air, there mingled with flights of red and white Brahminee ducks, wheeling about in search of a spot to light on. The tall Sarus stood in pairs, now plunging their bills into the shallow waters, now scattering pearly drops from their pink throats; the bittern's ruff peeped out of the green weeds, and the snowy white cloak of the paddy-bird glistened dazzlingly amongst the russet-colored uniforms of duck and diver, snipe and snipe, plover and wild goose. Lank herons were there, and stout, matronly pelicans gazing stolidly before them, with bustards large as turkeys, and a goodly array of plump little teal; the painted snipe with beautiful dark colors ornamenting his wings; the mallard with his gorgeous plume, and many varieties of quiet-looking cranes swam and dived, and shook, and splashed, all screaming, each in his own tongue, their natural joy in a life to them at that moment full of charms.

The fates protected the denizens of that marsh. Hawks generally dislike flying at birds over water; and unfortunately for us the thick vegetation of the leeward bank prevented our taking the wind of the water-fowl.

This became apparent, when a couple of match-lock balls whizzing through the air, and the loud report ringing upon the surface of the Jheel, startled its occupants from their proper occupations. Those that caught sight of the hawks fled shrieking down the wind towards another pond, in a straight line, so that pursuit would have inevitably entailed the loss of a Bashah. Others, with instinctive cunning, wheeled round and round the crystal floor, never passing its limits, till fear allowed them to settle again. A few, but so few, exposed themselves to danger, that we lost nearly two hours in "bagging" half a dozen snipe and teal.

Presently we left the marsh. Our Bazar had remarked, with many curses, a huge "tiger of the air," an Ukab towering in his "pride of place," high above the dense vapors and the reflected heat of the plains. He was apparently determined to dine on a Bashah, for, fast as we shifted our position, he followed us from Jheel to Jheel, and ended by triumphantly ejecting us from his hunting-grounds.

The Ukab, or Scinde vulture, alluded to in this extract, is a mortal enemy to every species of hawk: witness the following example, related to Mr. Burton, by the Ameer Ibrahim Khan Talpur:—

"Well, Sahib," continued the Ameer, speaking by jerks, as his breathlessness allowed him; "one day I flew my beautiful Bahri after a little heron, which we all expected to see killed in a moment. They took the air well together, when, of a sudden, 'See the Ukab! oh, the Ukab!' cried the Bazar. True enough! High above us was the wretch, a black dot in the blue sky, looking out, like an Afghan, for what he could plunder. We shouted—we waved the lure; unfortunately my poor Bahri was so eager after her quarry, that nothing could tempt her out of destruction. Then the Ukab disappeared from our eyes, and we thought that the Maloon had been frightened by our noise. The falcon and the little heron kept rising and rising, till we lost sight of them also. Presently, by the Prophet's beard I swear to you, Sahib, as we stood looking upwards with straining eyes, a speck appeared like a fly in the air larger; and larger it grew; the instant after, plump fell a body at my feet. It was poor Sohni, my falcon. The accursed vulture had shattered her skull with his foul beak. And since that day I have liberally dispensed Kisas to all his breed."

Mr. Burton and Mr. Barker both agree that the round-winged hawks have been much neglected in this country. Both in the Levant and on the Indus they are principally used, although by far the more expensive to purchase, reclaim, and keep. "I doubt," says Mr. Burton, "whether Falco gentilis in the West ever gave better sport than does one of Ibrahim Khan's favorite goshawk's."

Our old authors appear to have been fond of commending the goshawk. Tuberville, in the "Book of Falconrie," speaks highly of its qualities. Others designate it a "choice and dainty bird." "Most majestic," says Mr. Burton, "was her attitude as she sat upon the arms of royalty, clasping it with her singles (toes), and finally resisting the wind — chevuachant le vent, as French falconers express it — with the stiffness of an eagle." Sir Thomas Sebright, however, one of the few living falconers, expresses his surprise that any one should use goshawks for sport; and others insult the bird by declaring that she is only a big sparrow-hawk. The fact is, Mr. Burton says, that a good goshawk is an excellent bird, but, at the same time, as difficult to find good as she is common. Mr. W. B. Barker, who has trained a German goshawk from the Zoological Gardens, and introduced two trained birds into this country from the Taurus, says, that without wishing to detract from the merits of the peregrine or lanner, that, generally speaking, the goshawk will answer the purposes of most sportsmen; and if ever falconry, he says, is revived in England, this bird will be the one to which we must have recourse.

* Falconry in the Valley of the Indus. By Richard F. Burton, Lieut. Bombay Army, Author of "Goa and the Blue Mountains," &c. John Van Voorst.

The goshawk of the Indus is so game a bird, that it will kill even the antelope; a fact of which Mr. Burton gives us a very graphic pen-and-pencil illustration. We can only extract the first:—

"Stop!" said the Ameer, painfully excited. "You, Gul Mammad, ride softly round, and place yourself behind the brow of that hill. You, Fauju, to the opposite side."

My friend's acute coup d'œil had marked a pair of antelopes quietly grazing in the bit of green valley far beyond. A glance through the glass assured me that he had not erred; what to the naked eye appeared two formless, yellow marks upon a field of still undried grass, became, by means of the telescope, a pair of those beautiful little beings our poets call "gazelles."

Ibrahim Khan disposed his force skilfully. Reserving the falconer and a Kuttewala with two fierce, gaunt Kelat greyhounds, he stationed his men in a circle concealed from the sharp eyes of the antelopes, leaving a gap to windward of them to prevent the scent reaching their nostrils, and to serve as a trap for them to fall into.

Presently the horsemen, emerging from behind the rocks and hill tops, began to advance slowly towards the quarry, and in a moment the startled animals, sighting the forms of many enemies, sprang high up, and bounded towards the only way of escape.

As the doe passed us at headlong speed, the Ameer turned round so as to conceal her from the view of the goshawk. A few moments afterwards I gave the signal; he bent forward over his mare's neck, and, directing the Shahbaz towards the buck as he flew by, threw up the bird from his wrist with a shout.

The two greyhounds, free from the leash, dashed forward at that moment. All was hurry and excitement. Horsemen and footmen crowded in pursuit, every man straining his eyes to keep the quarry in full view.

The rocky ground, unfavorable to the pursuers, was all the antelope could desire. His long thin legs, almost disproportioned to the size of the body, were scarcely visible, so rapid were their twinkling motions. Here he cleared a huge boulder of rock, there he plunged into the air over the topmost twigs of a euphorbium bush; here he threaded his way through the pebbly bed of a torrent, there perched for an instant upon a stony ledge, he fearlessly prepared to foot the slippery descent beyond. Such a country could not but be puzzling to dogs; though ours were wary old greyhounds that had hunted by sight for years, they fell far behind, and to all prospect the gazelle was lost.

"She has eaten too much — a blight upon her mother!" cried a furious voice by my side. The Ameer was right. Had his bird been sharper set, the chase would have lost half its difficulty.

The Shahbaz, who at first had flown gallantly at the quarry, soon began to check, and as we were riding far behind over the difficult ground, appeared inclined to abandon her game. But when, escaping from the punchbowl of rock, we reached a long level plain of silt, the aspect of affairs improved.

At a distance, which was palpably diminishing, we saw the goshawk attacking her game. Now she swooped upon its back, deeply scoring the delicate yellow coat as she passed by. Then she descended upon the animal's head, deafening it with her clashing pinions, and blinding it with her talons. This manœuvre, at first seldom practised out of respect for the dagger-like horns, whose sharp, black tips never failed to touch the pursuer's balai, or pendant feathers, was soon preferred to the other. As the victim, losing strength and breath by excess of fear, could no longer use its weapons with the same dexterity, the boldness of the Shahbaz increased. She seemed to perch upon its brow; once or twice it fell, and when it arose, its staggering, uncertain gait gave evidence of extreme distress.

Then the dogs, who had become ferocious as wolves, gained sensibly upon their victim. The sound of their approach but added to its terror what it took from its speed. Even before they had fastened their fangs upon its quarters, the unhappy gazelle was stretched panting and struggling, with the Shahbaz straining every nerve to pin its head to the ground.*

The death of the gazelle is now considered the highest triumph of eastern falconry:

Meer Ibrahim Khan Talpur the remainder of that day was almost as lively a companion as a subaltern newly returned from "seeing service." He slew his antelope some twenty successive

* Mr. Barker thinks that Mr. Burton's Shahin must have been a lanner, or a peregrine. Goshawks cannot, he says, take gazelles, which never start at a lesser distance than 300 yards, and the goshawk cannot fly fast enough, or far enough, to overtake them. In the Levant, the Barbary peregrine is called Shahin, or Sheheen.

deaths, praised to the skies everything that was his especially; more especially his Bashahs, his falconer, his dogs, his dogkeeper; most especially as her due, his goshawking. As regards the latter, a little romance was allowed to mingle its alloy with the pure vein of veritable history. Every bough we saw on our way home reminded him of some doubtful exploit performed by the same Shahbaz. At dinner, the gazelle steaks brought her mention prominently forward, and the music, wine, and joviality of the evening elevating him, also tended in no small degree to elevate her and her qualities. At last it was proposed to try her upon one of the wild goats that roam over the deserts separating Cutch from Scinde.

"Her success," said the Ameer, "is certain."

"Certain," repeated Kakoo Mall.

"Certain," nodded Hari Chand, whispering; "the gazelle of this year, next year will be a Gorkhar!"

Whether the sneer has, or has not been justified, I know not. Perhaps it may so happen that in some day to come the Ameer Ibrahim, seduced by the gobemouche auditory of a wonderful British traveller, may point to the bird in question with a—

"You see that Shahbaz? Well, Wallah! By the beard of the Prophet I swear to you, five years ago she felled a wild ass. You may believe me; although a Beloch, I do not tell a lie. Billah! A 'man-with-a-hat' was with me when it happened. Ask Burton Sahib, if it did not."

Then will Kakoo Mall, if he be living, ejaculate "certainly," and Hari Chand, if he be present, exclaim "certainly;" and, in a word, every man and boy that has ears to hear and eyes to see, will rescho "certainly," and swear himself an eye-witness of the event, to the extreme confusion of Fact and Fiction.

We doubt much, however, if the reader will peruse this account of the death of the antelope without a pang. Mr. Burton says, "There is an eternal sameness in the operation of shooting, which must make it—one would suppose—very uninteresting to any but those endowed with an undue development of destructiveness." And Colonel Bonham, of the 10th Hussars, we are told by Mr. Knox, has laid aside the gun and the rifle for the enjoyment of the "noble craft;" but the gun has at last the advantage of putting a bird, generally speaking, out of misery at once. Who can read the following conclusion of a combat between a Khairu, a hobby-hawk, and a crow, without feeling for the victims of the sport?—

The battle is not finished. Corvus, in spite of his fall, his terror, a rent in the region of the back, and several desperate pecks, still fights gallantly. This is the time for the falconer to assist his bird. From the neighboring mimosas, roused by the cries of their wounded comrade, pours forth a "rabble rout" of crows, with noise and turmoil, wheeling over the hawk's head, and occasionally pouncing upon her unguibus et rostris, with all the ferocity of hungry peregrines. We tremble for Khairu. Knowing her danger, we hurry on, as fast as our legs can carry us, shouting, shooting pellets, and anathematizing the crows. We arrive, but hardly in time. As we plunge through the last bushes which separate us from the hawk, twenty cawers rise hurriedly from the ground; the Bazdar hurries to his Laghar. The quarry lies stone dead, but poor Khairu, when taken up and inspected by thirty pair of eyes, is found to have lost her sight, and to be otherwise so grievously mauled, pecked, and clawed, that the most sanguine prepare themselves for her present decease.

Alas, poor Khairu!

It is undoubtedly very picturesque to read of knights riding out with hawk on fist, and knight's lady on fiery jenet, with merlin clasping her embroidered glove, the look of the thing, the pomp of its apparatus, and the antique costume impart a kind of black-letter interest to the good old sport; there was excitement, also, in witnessing the combined working of horses, hawks, and hounds, but we doubt if of the kind well suited to "ladye fair." The effect upon the temper of the Ameer of Scinde appears to have been anything but agreeable. A sparrow-hawk had been thrown at a pigeon.

Unfortunately, however, for the hawk and my friend's temper, she had not been seen "sharp set" that morning. This at once became apparent from her manoeuvres. Instead of grappling with the quarry, she, "checked first at one bird, then at the other, amused herself with following them on the wing; and, lastly, when tired of the unprofitable exercise, she "raked off," and, retiring to one of the Peepul branches, took up a position there with such firmness of purpose that all the falconer's "Ao Bachehs" and violent swingings of the lure were unavailing to dislodge her.

The Ameer's brow clouded; certain angry flashes escaped his eyes, and low growlings threatened an approaching storm. For a Beloch to make such a goose of himself! Every one stole furtive glances at the blunderer, the lean nephew; and even he, despite his habitual surliness of demeanor, could not help showing in looks and manner that conscience was stirring up uncomfortable sensations within him.

"Give me the bow," shouted the Ameer in his fury, "and let me do for that brother-in-law of a bit of carrion at once."

The Bazdar wishing, but not daring to deprecate such an atrocious act of sacrilege as the shooting of a hawk, slowly handed a polished horn kaman to his master, and a tako or blunt arrow shod with a bit of horn. The Scindians are particularly expert at the use of this weapon; they throw the missile transversely so as to strike with the side, and when a large covey is the mark aimed at, they sometimes bring down as many as three or four birds with a pair of shafts. So it happened that the Shikrah, who was quietly "mantling" upon a clear branch in a nice sunny place, had the life summarily knocked out of her by the Ameer's tako.

Falconry, as a partial sport, is, however, well worthy of preservation, more so than the situation of a grand falconer without falcons. The enclosed state of our country makes it objectionable for the peregrine, which cannot be easily followed; but the goshawk can be followed at a hand-canter, and Mr. Barker tells us that there is at the Zoological Gardens a precious and beautiful specimen of the Australian goshawk, which is perfectly white, with eyes the color of bright rubies, and which he thinks would, from his large hands and small body, be swifter in flight, and, on the whole, a more efficient bird than our goshawk. "It forms," says Mr. Barker, "in my opinion, the beau-ideal of perfection in a hawk. I consider it worthy of a princely hand, and should be happy to see his Royal Highness Prince Albert patronize the training of this bird to afford amusement to our young Prince of Wales."

AN OLD MAID'S MUSINGS.

BY ELIZA SPROAT.

Sitting in the twilight,
Looking out into the rain,
Through the blurred and dripping dimness
Of my window-pane;
Waiting in the chilly twilight
For the supper bell to ring,
Float a flood of fancies o'er me —
Thoughts of the spring.

Oh, the early spring-time!
In the woodlands, even now,
Life is rising, tightly swelling
Twig and bulb and bough.
Through the clods the moss is pushing
Homeward birds are on the wing;
Earth is quick with coming glory —
Oh, for the spring!

Spring has something sweeter;
Leaves enfolded, thick and brown,
Bursting soon, will drop their shadows,
Softly trembling down.
Birds will bloom and skies will deepen;
Waters flash and woodlands ring;
Through long grass the brooks will rustle —
Oh, for the spring!

Life has something sweeter;
Strange, to feel old fancies start,
Violet-sweet, of youth and passion,
From my wrinkled heart!
May gone, whose flowers were kisses —
May, whose songs but one could sing;
Heart abloom, so sudden blighted —
Ah, my lost spring!

Still something sweeter;
There's a home-love underlies
Passion, as the fruit that greeters,
When the blossom dies.
Plans of homestead, long forgotten!
Plans that fancy used to bring Round me in the fragrant twilight
Of my lost spring.

Still something sweeter;
Other loves about me stand;
Thrills a round cheek on my bosom —
Feels a little hand.

Baby eyes in mine are smiling;
Baby fingers round me cling;
Baby lips are lisping, "Mother" —
God! my lost spring.

TURNER AND CLAUDE.

Is Genius a modest maid?
A coyly-peeping peering flower?
Content, unseen, to bloom and fade
With nought but sweetness for her dower
If poet ever so indited,
Was poet ever more benighted?

Was great Napoleon diffident?
Was Milton blind to mundane glory?
Did Luther need encouragement?
Was Chatham deemed a bashful tory?
Was Turner (painter much lamented)
Through great humility demented?

What time this mighty painter died
He willed the nation pictures twain,
Provided they were hung beside
Two specimens of Claude Lorraine:
Or failing this he judged them meet
To form a painter's winding-sheet.

That strange old man was passing-prond
Who left, with calm premeditation,
His finest work to form his shroud,
If thwarted by a thankless nation;
—A man indulging in such quirks
Must, must be wrapped up in his works!

At Charing Cross are duly hung
This noble pair of pictures;
Some critics have their praises sung,
And some have dealt in strictures;
Some Turner choose, a few award
The laurels to his rival Claude.

Poor Claude! sad victim to the freaks
Of "rough and ready" dilettanti,
Who scrape and scrub thy ancient cheeks,
And then find out thy claims are scanty,
So hung (to dry) what Institution
Could fail to blame thy execution?

Rise up — some ghostly vengeance take —
Resume thy brush, assert thy due,
The nation's faith thou need'st not break;
So prove thyself a Turner too.
Thy works restore, or turn them all,
Both thine and Turner's to the wall!

From Bentley's Miscellany.

THE LEWIS—WHAT IS IT?

I WONDER how many London people are familiar with this name, "The Lewis." How many will ask, "What is it? Is it Lewis the Great? Is it Lewis Napoleon? Is it a fish, a man, or a place?" A few who remember their geography—a canny Scot or so from the West Highlands; or those who are "well-up" in their Boswell, and recollect Johnson's Tour in the Hebrides, may just conclude, that I mean the island of that name, far up amid the stormy seas of the North Atlantic. But with great respect for the Fellows of the Geographical Society, some even of whom have probably bestowed too much attention on the remoter provinces of Japan, or on that "interesting tract" between the Himalayas and the Arctic Seas, to be acquainted with our Caledonian dependency, I believe most people would have stared, as much as I did myself, when, at the beginning of last long vacation, I was asked by a kindly erratic and peppery Highlander, to accompany him to his native place "in the Lews."

"I would be delighted, indeed, if I knew where it was," was my (I hope) polite reply.

"What, not know where the Lews is! That comes of a Southern education. It's sometimes called 'The Lews,' or the Island of Lewis, and surely you must have heard of it."

I had a vague notion of proving my topographical acquirements by a neat and succinct description of the ancient Eubœa, or a particular account of Samos, or Melita, but, on reflection, thought it better to confess ignorance, and to content myself with muttering a modest hypothesis, that it was "somewhere about the Orkneys." Then did I hear my friend launch out with all the eloquence of enthusiasm on the charms of this new "Isle of the Blessed." He told me of its desert wastes of moor and mountain—of its streams "barbecued" with salmon, and all varieties of trout—of its rugged shores lashed by ceaseless billows, the noise of which would have set old Homer on some new word to convey it—him who threw away that splendid "poluphoisboio" on the gentle murmurings of the Ægean—of the uncertainty of regular postal communication—of the absence of "The Times" and politics—of mountain-mutton, oat cakes, barley-bannocks, pure whiskey, grouse-pies, whales, seals, curlews, duck, deer, feræ naturæ, in man and beast—in fact, he vividly sketched a state of deliciously civilized barbarity and unbounded hospitality. What more tempting picture could he draw to a briefless barrister, whom no county court attorney had smiled upon in his hermitage, up three pair of stairs in Pump Court—where could one better escape duns, and the unprofitable tumult of the Forum? It was delightful to think of such a recondite solitude, especially to one like myself, whose wickedest and most determined spirits of hard reading had been often interrupted by the fancied echoes of a grouse's wings, as he started up crowing defiance from the most learned pages of "Hearne's Contingent Remainers," and who had often "worked" a salmon over the most lively chapters of "Sugden on Power." "I'll gang, my chief, I'm ready," was the word; and two days after beheld me steaming away down the muddy canal from Glasgow to Greenock, on board the little steamer "Islay." The morning was fine and bright, but with the peculiar atmospherical dispensation that prevails in Scotland, the moment we shot out on the full bosom of the river, and got a glimpse of the glorious scenery on its banks, a "thick horror" fell upon us, and land, sea, and sky were wrapped in a mantle of pea-soup, with a lining of fleecy clouds, anything but water-proof. It was pleasant to know that "Dumbarton was" over "there," and the Kyles of Bute were "close here," as it exercised the imagination, and encouraged fancy to fly under difficulties, but all we could see with the physical eye was a wall of fog around us, and now and then the obscure hull of a fishing-boat or merchantman, or a drab-colored sea-gull wallowing about in the air, half in doubt whether it was sky or water; the big burly buoys tied by the tail, and using desperate efforts to set themselves at liberty, and make a night of it.

Why is it that the passengers under such circumstances always stay upon deck as long as they can? Why do they stare moodily into the sky, where they know they can see nothing? The wettest, windiest, dismallest day that ever came out of heaven, you will be certain to behold on the deck of any steamer, ocean or river, a set of dripping lunatics in pea-coats and waterproofs, trying to look hardy and nautical, when they might be dry and comfortable "below stairs" in the cabin. The "Islay" was no exception to the truth of the remark, for her quarters presented the customary array of well-ducked passengers, looming very hazy, large and moody in the vapor.

There were two students from Edinburgh "Free Church," and of a serious turn of mind, who were rendered prematurely unhappy at the awful prospects that await the great mass of humanity in the other world, on account of their not belonging to that small but select Christian community; a number of "ministers" hastening from some great Convention of their body at the capitol, a laird with a tendency to a short pipe and a long black bottle, and a very drunken "docthor," who was apologizing to every one for insulting them, and inviting them soon afterwards "to have it out on deck"—a very ferocious sporting major, with gun-cases and fishing-rods enough for all Scotland, and a few "merchants" of the isles. The Mull of Cantire soon exhibited its magical effects in reducing all on board to a common state of suffering and indifference to life, and the nautical characters, who spoke learnedly of "tideways and nasty short chopping seas," were soon left alone in their glory above, while even the ministers were driven from their "wee crack" and toddy by the only demon (I venture to hope) they could not face—that evil son of Neptune who as yet laughs at our science and our ruling of the waves—"sea-sickness." The very expressive name of this marine county may teach one what he has to expect, and though it is suggestive of a deuced good pun or two, my recollections of it forbid the attempt, lest I should be punished when next I get into the power of the presiding Triton. Night passed in wailings for the steward, who, when his victims became unable to shout lustily, wisely retired to bed, and, in despairing soliloquies, most of them evidently composed under the influence of a monomaniacal disregard for the first law of nature. Next day was wet, foggy, and blowy, instead of being merely foggy and wet. Now and then we saw black stumpy rocks, against which the slow surge rose and broke in sheets of foam, "the lather of Neptune's beard," or the clouds broke, too, for a little, and, lifting up, disclosed on the right hand, rising close to us from the sea, the sides of massive mountains, heaped up like giant waves, adown the heather-clad steep of which tumbled numberless impromptu cataracts, filling up the watercourses with tumultuous streams, running riot among stones, rocks, and boulders, till they found rest in the bosom of the ocean; but ere the eye had rested on it for a moment, the watery veil swept over it again. The strong-winged gannet skimmed past us, or dashed down like a bolt of lead into the sea just by the ship, and presently sprang up with a herring, mackerel, or pollock in his bill; little fleets of divers, guillemots, or puffins, lay to, or bolted under water as we splashed by, and occasionally we came near a ledge of sharp rocks, on which a whole army of hungry black cormorants sat moodily in the rain, like a lot of apothecaries without business. At intervals of three or four hours we rushed into an island harbor, got a glimpse of some whitewashed houses on the shore—saw a face of a few natives—the women always washing and "beetling" clothes; and the men looking as if they would be much the better for undergoing the same process; disembarked a couple of captains and ministers, and a load of herring-barrels—took in more captains, maybe a major, certainly some more ministers, and more herring-barrels, and having hove-to for "the lady in the boat," who is always late, and renders the very existence of marine commanders wretched, rushed out on the sea into the fog again. Skye and Mull, and many places of note, were thus visited, but their beauties were all lost on us, while we were twice very nearly lost on their dissecta membra, which ran out like the fangs of some hungry beast to seize upon us. Once, as we slowly backed away from one of these long black teeth, warned of the danger by the gurgling splash of the tideway over it, a huge mass of brown roundness heaved itself above the water for an instant with a lazy roll, and up with a mighty breath spirted a blast of air and water from the end of it, full two fathoms high!

"A whale!—a whale! And a monster too!" But he had no mind to be made into train-oil, and, with a sullen angry plunge, down he dived again right across our bows, giving a graceful wave of his tremendous tail in the air by way of a parting salute, and as an indication of his general sentiments on the subject of steamboats and the mercantile marine. We heard the fellow puffing and blowing, and blasting, like an alderman running after the last bus to the City, for some time, and a strong impression was left on my mind as to the undesirableness of being a herring, or, indeed, anything swaller than a whale in these seas, if one were compelled to be a subject of King Proteus.

Seals now and then shoved up their knowing heads, to take a glimpse of us, and with one glance of that lovely, mild eye, saw all they wanted, and returned to the pursuit of salmon as ardently as Mr. Scrope himself; but, notwithstanding such interesting visits from the mammalia of these waters, I was not sorry when, on the third day of the fog, we felt our way into Stornoway, the capital of the Northern Hebrides.

I had become quite tired of the smell of whiskey-toddy, and the talk of the ministers and the sporting major—"Killed him, sir! Dead! Egad! At seven—ty-three yards! The best shot!" &c.—while the ministers were continually spinning yarns of a serious character, or engaged in vivid descriptions of the "respectable characters" in their parishes, which seemed always, somehow or other, to be connected with the possession of a certain amount of pecuniary resources.

It must be admitted that Stornoway, notwithstanding the notion of the natives that in regal splendor it is superior to the great metropolis itself, is not possessed of much natural beauty or artificial attractions. There is an absurd-looking castle, brun-new, with the usual allowance of cruel-frame turrets, donjons, and embrasured parapets (placed at a moderate distance from the mud-bank, which is left high and dry twice a-day, for the use of the inhabitants), with a little lawn in front, and an air of parvenu impudence about it, which contrasts strangely with the stolid look of the great white-washed blocks of houses, perched higgedly-piggledly up and down the substitutes for streets. This is the mansion of the proprietor of the island, and is of his own manufacture. Much more creditable to his taste are the various works he has carried on in the neighborhood; the patent ship in the harbor, which is, however, more for ornament than use; the good roads in embryo and in posse; the market-place, the chapel, the gas-lamps.

The island, which belonged in the good bad times to the Mackenzies of Seaforth, is as big as many a German principality, being about forty miles long, with a breadth varying from twenty-four to ten miles. It is now the property of a gentleman, who is at the head of a great mercantile house, engaged in the opium and Chinese trade. Stornoway, the capital, is its sole town, and has a population of—

But I am becoming statistical. I was very near entering on the kelp question, on emigration, education, straw-plaiting, crofters and tacksmen, and the reclamation of land.

Poor, dear, dirty, hospitable, busy, herring-curing, cod-drying, ling-splitting, fish-selling, and smelling Stornoway! with your institutions and commerce, and mermaid population, and old tower, and nasty suburbs, with your floating hulks, fitted up as shops and habitations, so that one may see on the stern of a quondam herring-boat, "Dougal Mackenzie, Merchant, licensed to sell Snuff, Whiskey, and Tea;" or read on the bows of a ci-devant collier, "Angus Mackenzie, Potato Merchant and Shoe-maker." I must leave you, though I bear with me many a pleasant memory of jolly evenings (the mornings were sometimes less agreeable), good grog, and kind friends! The fiery Highlander was driving his fiery little horse at a great pace. We had travelled over some miles of road, bounded on the one side by the sea and on the other by a wild expanse of bog, which rose in the distance into rounded hills, all impurpled with the rich heather-bells. Now and then we had passed a clump of wigwams built of mud, and rarely possessing windows; the smoke issuing from holes in the roofs, which were composed of great flakes of straw tossed on in bundles, blended with squares of turf and fastened down by hay-ropes ballasted with heavy stones. It was wonderful to see what healthy young Celts rushed out to gaze on us, and what clean faces we could see peeping out modestly from the doorways, while the strong frames of the men we met showed that health had not deserted these unpromising abodes. Patches of fine oats and potatoes were scattered at long intervals over the vast sea of moor like little islands, but not a tree or shrub was to be seen. Even in the most miserable parts of Ireland one could scarcely find such apparent desolation. The worst cabins in Kerry were as good as the crofters' huts, but I am bound to say the dress and aspect of the people of The Lewis was much better, and bore signs of comfort unknown to their Celtic brethren in the western kingdom. The young grouse flew "cheeping" across the road, roused by the noise of the wheels, and curlew and whimbrels got up from the dykes as we passed with a wild, startled cry; huge flocks of plover, sandpipers, and sea-larks whirled about with whistle and scream over the face of the dark bog, the snipe flashed up from the rills and piped a shrill treble for their long-billed partners in the rushes—now and then you caught sight of an orderly line of mathematical wild geese flying in an isosceles triangle, as if bent on doing the pons asinorum, and making as much noise as if Rome was in danger, and mallard, teal, and widgeon quacked and flew around in all directions—altogether it seemed as if it was a capital country for a man to live in, if he could only turn his mouth into a bill, and get waterproof leggings and a swimming-belt.

"I must get out," quoth I.

"For what, man? You're miles from the place."

"Nevertheless, cross this stream, oh, child of the mist! I will not, till I have one whip of my Martin Kelly over that water, and try the attractions of a green-bodied wren with Lewis trout."

The stream in question was about six feet broad, so brown you could not see the bottom, and splashing from pool to pool till it flowed into the sea about one hundred yards from the spot where we had stopped, which was close by a line of stones that served as a bridge when the water was high. At present they were useless, for I had just seen a wee lassie run across like a redshank, and scarcely covering her ankles in the water; but I had seen, too, the whirls of the fish up and down the stream.

"De'il tak' me, but you're just mad, there's not a trout the size of a sprat in the whole burn."

But I was not to be intimidated. My little rod was put together in a minute, reel put on, and in two points the gut casting-line flashed brightly in the sunshine. "Saw you ever the like of that?" The flies had not touched the water ere splash, splash!—two yellow-bellies were fixed hard and fast. The eyes of the Highlander were very big indeed—not half so big, however, as those of a shock-headed boy, who had joined him in a grin of derision, and had pronounced many decided opinions in the Celtic with respect to my proceedings, which had been duly interpreted for me by my friend.

"He says you'll not catch one; there's not a fish."

At this point, however, I had two of them, small to be sure, but in a minute more they were kicking about on the turf. Another cast. "By Allah, see this! here's a fellow—a white trout, as I live—up in the air, flounce, dash, dive! up again! you'll soon be tired, my fine fellow, and the pool not being bigger than the wash-hand basins in Trafalgar Square, I must kill you for spoiling my sport."

The fight was a short one. The Limerick still held fast, and a two-pound trout walloped about on the gravel; in a few minutes, I tried a little pool close at hand, out of which I tossed trout after trout, till in ten minutes I had taken thirteen! I am not proud, I hope; but I must admit that I felt very like a hero, as, I suppose, heroes feel, when I stowed them away in the gig, and heard the wondering remark, "Well, how the de'il you managed it, I can't tell." That night, in a low-browed, comfortable room, with the clear peat-fire burning cosily, good tobacco, and unrivalled whiskey at hand, after a glorious dinner of real Scotch broth, real fish—not the flabby imitations got up for the London-market, but firm, crisp, yet tender as game, with hare, venison, great grouse pies, recondite compounds of cream, bitter marmalade, honey and jams, we caroused after the fashion dear to our forefathers. Had Ossian been wandering past he might have heard the strains of a Highland song, by a gillie, in the corner, succeeded by a brindisi, or a bit of Bellini; smelt a deal of tobacco and toddy, and seen a great deal of gun-washing and flask-filling for the morrow; as it was, the witnesses of the scene were the two large dogs, two or three hare-footed gillies, an "own-man," and a pet sea-gull; the latter of which seemed to take a great interest in a bag of No. 6 shot and some Eley's cartridges. "Back from the moors."

Here's a bag of game!—three brace and a half of ducks, a teal, three widgeons, a curlew, two whimbrels, a heron, a leash of hares, a jer-falcon, six and a half brace of grouse, fifteen golden plovers, thirty-two sand-larks (killed in three shots), a nondescript, hit in a pool, and taken out by a dog, said by the gillie to be a "Choraghebhagh," as near as I can spell it—a field-fare, and a brace of snipes; besides stalking a deer and putting a dose of No. 3 into his stern, as he went away from me, and firing at the place where an otter had dived!—Glorious sport!—"Dinner's ready—your whiskey (a dram) and hot water up stairs. To-morrow we'll try for a salmon, and let the moor rest for a day."

THE Australian papers bring sad intelligence of the long-lost Dr. Leichardt. The Moreton Bay Courier says, "We learn, with deep regret, that the reports of the melancholy death of Dr. Leichardt and his companions have proved but too well-founded. A correspondent at Drayton informs us that Mr. Hely's party had returned from the search, bringing with them bones, watch-key, &c., belonging to the missing party. Mr. Hely had gone on towards Sydney by the most direct route from Surat, for the purpose of making his report; and we are thus left for the present without further information concerning this melancholy event." The report here spoken of as concerning the full particulars has since made its appearance. The Adelaide Observer writes: "Mr. Hely's official report is before us. It is a voluminous but able document; but all we can do at present is, to state that the details furnish a mournful confirmation of former distressing (though unauthenticated) intelligence." These melancholy tidings will awaken many emotions; for the whole story of the enterprise, in which it is now feared that the adventurous explorer has sacrificed his life in the interests of science, reads like a chapter in romance. The way in which he nursed his zeal for Australian discovery—his industry, promptitude, and success—the care with which his journeys were prepared—his return over three hundred miles of ground to the nearest frontier station to report the wonderful fertility and beauty of the countries which he had found—a return, he said, prompted by the fear that there might be none from the greater journey which he contemplated, and that thus his discoveries up to that point might be lost—his leave-taking with this consciousness in his mind—and his final disappearance into the wilderness out of which he was never to emerge—all these things tend to invest his memory with the interest that ever clings to a devotion so exalted. Men like Dr. Leichardt are the true heroes of a young country—and his name should be remembered on that vast continent at the antipodes with affectionate gratitude. — Athenæum.

At the recent annual public session of the Russian Imperial Geographical Society, held in St. Petersburg, it was stated, that the great scientific expedition about to be sent by that body into Eastern Siberia and Kamtschatka was on the immediate eve of setting out. The expedition comprises twelve young men who have been trained by the society expressly to the duty of taking astronomical, magnetical, and meteorological observations. It was further stated, that another expedition would be despatched to examine the condition of the fisheries in the Caspian Sea—and a third, to explore in a geological point of view several regions of European and Asiatic Russia. — Athenæum.

THE LEGEND OF THE MARIE-STEIN.*

A NORWEGIAN BALLAD.

On Gousta's height,
In the still moonlight,
The shadowy rein-deer roam,
And the dark lake gleams
In the fitful beams,
And the glacier torrents foam !

The gray clouds rest
On the mountain crest,
And the eagle hoarsely screams,
Where the wild wind sweeps,
And the white snow sleeps
As the soul in hallowed dreams !

Like giant old,
On the lonely wold
Rises the blasted pine ;
And the bitter wings
Where the birch-tree clings,
Above the Marie-Stein.

And the spectral shadows haste,
Shrieking o'er the moorland waste,
Amid the drifting snow ;
And when the night with morning meets
The Rinkan's thundering voice repeats
The maiden's tale of woe !

The leaves were red upon the tree,
The waves were white upon the sea,
The kine had left the upland plain,
The summer flowers were on the wane,
As winding up the green pathway,
Beneath the birch-tree's dropping spray,
A maiden went with noiseless tread,
The dead leaves rustling o'er her head
With a sad and moaning sound !

But there was a light in that maiden's eye,
She heard not the moaning sound ;
She saw not the cloud in the lowering sky,
Or the leaves upon the ground ;
Her waving hair of golden brown
Was twined with ribands gay,
As Northern maids are wont to wear
On feast or holy-day ;
And gladsome was her heart I ween,
Its full throb wildly beat —
To-night long pent-up tears will flow,
Long parted lovers meet !

Thrice o'er the forest pines had swept
The winter's chilling blast,
Since at the twilight's saddened hour
These twain had parted last !

* The Marie-Stein (Mary's Path or Cliff) is a rugged and dangerous mountain-path, almost overhanging the reeking abyss of Rinkan Foss, in Norway, leading from below the Fall to the heights above. The memory of the beautiful Mary of Westfoldalen and her hapless story still lives among the peasantry in the neighborhood of the valley of the Maan, and the Rinkan Foss.

Oh, could these true young hearts have known,
Rushing with feverish haste,
The coming grief — or had they seen
The future's dreary waste !

Beside the Rinkan's mystic fall
Sitteth the maiden lone,
And round her sighs the Autumn wind
With a low, foreboding moan ;
Down, down with a booming roar
Came the whirling wreaths of foam,
And the mist-cloud, like a spirit,
Rose from its cavern home,
As if it spoke amidst the din,
In solemn tones and mild,
And asked the reason of the strife
Of waters raging wild !

And soon the twilight's darkening shade
Hung like a phantom shield
Upon the embattled hills of snow
Above the Gousta-Field ;
But still the maiden lingered there,
And darker grew the sky,
Then strange thoughts struggled in her breast
And trembled in her eye !

" Oh ! wherefore comes he not ? " she said,
" The night is stealing fast ; "
But it was the echo answered her
And the lonely mountain blast !
" Wherefore, oh, wherefore comes he not ? "
The maiden sighed again —
But hark ! oh, is it the fall of his eager step,
Or the sound of the coming rain ?

'Tis he ! 't is he ! far up the cliffs,
Grasping the shattered pine,
Her lover hastes with a fearless bound
O'er the track of the Marie-Stein ;
Nearer and nearer yet he comes —
" To meet and never part ! "
Oh, what a wild and joyous cry
Bursts from that sinking heart !

He heard that well-remembered voice,
The voice he had longed to hear,
And it sent through his inmost soul a thrill
Unfelt for many a year ;
" I come, I come, " his eyes grew dim,
Her form flashed on his sight,
He stretched his arms, and with a shriek
Plunged from the dizzy height !
Down, down to the reeking gulf,
The lover's stormy grave !
The white spray wreathed — he slept beneath
The Rinkan's foaming wave !

When the snow lay on the wold,
And the winter's wind blew cold,
And the bare and leafless trees
Sighed wildly in the breeze,
Day by day a form was seen
Bending 'neath the waving pine,
Watching on the Marie-Stein !
Weary, weary, watching ever
For the one who cometh never !

Like a vision fair she seemed ;
 But those eyes, oh ! how they gleamed
 With the wandering light of madness,
 Softened only by their sadness,
 And the shadow of despair
 Hiding darkly — ever there !

Day by day, year by year,
 Summer green, and Autumn sear,
 Wandered still that woman's form
 In the calm and in the storm ;
 Through the dark and misty night
 Gleamed her robe of spotless white,
 And her streaming hair which fell,
 Like a shroud, above the swell
 Of that yearning breast of snow
 Beating so wild and sad below !

Many years have passed away,
 How many it were hard to say ;
 But time hath told upon that brow,
 So high and saint-like even now,
 And touched her pale cheek, once so fair,
 And changed to gray her golden hair ;
 But still upon that mountain path
 The hunter pauses with a start
 And a tremor at his heart,
 To meet those eyes so wildly cast
 A moment on him — but he's passed,
 And with head bowed down and silent
 Passeth on that vision mild,
 Through the tangled bushes wild !

Many years have passed away —
 On that wild and mountain track
 Haste the rein-deer as of yore,
 But the sad and weary-hearted
 Wanders there no more ;
 In her grave the maiden lies,
 In the grave of time
 Lieth now the aged head,
 And the gleaming eyes are quenched,
 But the spirit is not dead !

In the dim and shrouded twilight,
 When the soul to thought is given,
 And the feelings sad and chastened
 Make it more akin to heaven ;
 When the pale stars glimmer forth
 From the soft and hazy skies —
 Beaming on the sleeping earth
 Silently, like angel eyes ! —

Then, when all things are at rest
 But the Rinkan's troubled breast,
 Heaving, heaving !
 Like a wounded giant,
 Yet defiant,
 Hoarsely breathing !
 The peasant seeth through the mist —
 But it may be phantasy —
 Spirits twain — one with long and shining hair,
 Meeting in the wreathed air,
 Melting dimly then away,
 Mingled with the glittering spray !

SONG.

CLOUDS SHINE AND FLY.

BY THE LADY EMMELINE STUART WORLEY.

CLOUDS shine and fly,
 Leaves flush and fade,
 Swans sing and die —
 Naught here hath stayed.

Snow gleams and melts,
 Bright founts are dried,
 Rich rainbow-belts
 Pale in their pride.

Stars leave the sky,
 Swords flash and rust,
 Towers reared on high
 Heap dust on dust !

Waves dance — and break,
 Fair fruits decay,
 Sunset's rich streak
 Turns to faint gray.

Gales sweep — then sigh
 To a drear hush,
 Meteors driven nigh
 Fail in mid rush.

Sounds swell and pause,
 Smiles, tears become,
 Still the worm gnaws
 Where tempts most bloom.

Chords thrill — and snap ! —
 Dews glance, and go,
 Sails fill — and flap —
 Brave trees lie low.

Suns rise and sink,
 Flowers blush — and droop,
 Flames leap, and shrink ;
 What of man's Hope ? —

Loveliest things part
 When they're most bright ;
 So from Man's heart
 Dreams take their flight.

When they're most dear,
 Fairest and best —
 Leaving him drear,
 Flies each bright guest.

Clouds shine and fly,
 Founts flow and waste,
 Swans sink and die —
 Bright dreams ne'er last.

Swifter than all,
 They still decay,
 Change, fade, and fall,
 Things of a day !

THE CROWN MATRIMONIAL OF FRANCE.

FOR upwards of sixty years has France exhibited to the world the spectacle of a phantasmagoria — wild, fitful, and incoherent as a nightmare-dream. The horrible and the pathetic mingled with the grotesque; things incongruous and unexpected succeeding each other with transformations as rapid as legerdemain; massacres and festivals; miseries and orgies; reckless license and stringent despotism; strange visions of murdered sovereigns, and ephemeral consuls and dictators. Dynasties changing like the slides in a magic-lantern; an emperor rising from the chaos of revolution as from a surging sea; sinking, re-appearing, then again sinking. A long-guarded captive seating himself on the throne of his captor; a Republic with the anomaly of Equality for its motto, and a Prince-President at its head; and Absolutism established in honor of Liberty and Fraternity.

Party colors glance on the sight like the tints of a quick-shaken kaleidoscope; the white of the Bourbon lilies, and the blue of the Napoleon violets; imperial purple, tri-colored cockades, and Red Republicanism. Another shake of the kaleidoscope, and again the purple predominates. But the present resumé of the empire has not the prestige of its original, whose birth was heralded by glittering trophies, and the exciting strains of martial music. No! Here is an empire created by slight of hand amid no prouder minstrelsy than that of the violins of fêtes.

With a new slide of the magic-lantern we behold an imperial wedding, surpassing in brilliant externals even the nuptials of the Napoleon and Maria Louisa. But the bridegroom is not Napoleon the Great, nor is the bride a daughter of the Cæsars. We must give the bridegroom due credit for proving that he still possesses some freshness of feeling, not yet wholly seared by coups d'état and diplomacy, and that he amiably prefers (for the time, at least) domestic affection to self-interest and expediency. But how long will he be permitted, by the most changeable, the most uncertain people on earth, to enjoy his love-match in peace! With the populace it may be acceptable, so long as it gives them pageants to "assist" at, to gaze upon, and talk about; but the alliance of an emperor of France with a Spanish countess, the subject of another sovereign, is not glorious enough for the other classes, who are really aristocratic in their hearts, notwithstanding occasionally short freaks of democracy. Republican governments have never governed the French; they are only impressed by the opposites of democracy, by the prestige of rank, titles, and distinction. Louis XIV., a far more mighty sovereign than Napoleon III., and who, on his firmly established throne, was servilely worshipped as the "Grand Monarque," never dared to avow his clandestine marriage with Madame de Maintenon. Napoleon I. showed how well he understood the genius of the French people, when he replaced his really beloved Josephine by the daughter of an emperor, and required his brother Jerome to put away his first wife, Miss Patterson, for a German princess.

Louis Napoleon himself seems to have had his misgivings as to the effect the step he contemplated would have on the mind of the nation; and the fall of the French funds, from the time the marriage came on the tapis, was full of significance. Instead of following the usual example of monarchs, and simply announcing his intended marriage, he proceeded to make his notification a pièce justificative, full of explanations and apologies, in which his anxiety betrayed him into inconsistencies and errors of judgment. At variance with his hereditary pretensions as Napoleon III., he rejoiced in the character of parvenu, and then boasted the "high birth" of his consort. He endeavored to frame his speech, as though he had taken for his text Ovid's maxim —

Non bene conveniunt nec in una sede morantur Majestas et Amor. — Madam. lib. ii. 816.

Yet he has labored to overload love with the most far-fetched and dazzling majesty. He complacently instanced his grandmother, Josephine, as beloved by France, though not of royal blood; seemingly oblivious that Napoleon I. had not stooped from the throne to raise her (she had been his wife ere men dreamed of him as a monarch) — and that his policy soon compelled her to descend from the throne, and give place to a prouder bride. Louis Napoleon has promised that the Empress Eugénie will revive the virtues of the Empress Josephine: far wiser had he not touched on the topic, to remind his bride that the reward — the earthly reward — of those virtues was divorce and a broken heart; and to remind his people how easily the non-royal wife could be moved aside, whenever the interests of the crown or the nation should require it. He who has declared that "the empire is peace," has dropped ominous words of "the hour of danger," in which the good qualities of his Eugénie will shine forth; in contrast, he evidently meant, with the incapacity and selfishness of Maria Louisa, when France was invaded by the allies; but how utterly distasteful to the French public must that ill-judged reminder be! He spoke, in his ante-nuptial speech, of the unhappy fates of the illustrious ladies who had worn the crown of France — a suggestive theme, in which we are about to follow his lead; but from his lips the subject seemed peculiarly ill-chosen and ill-timed. Verily, his Imperial Majesty has been singularly infelicitous in his selection of topics. In every country of Europe there are still men whose hearts can respond to the sentiment —

Dulce et decorum est PRO PATRIA mori. — Hor.

Such men would have esteemed it more judicious to have avoided any mention of the deceased father of Eugenia de Montijo, than to have announced him as one who, in the struggle of Spain for independence, fought against his own countrymen, and with the invaders of his native land. The unnecessary allusion to the bereaved Duchess of Orleans is in such bad taste, that to comment on it would be a continuation of the fault.

But we must excuse the inconsistencies of a man too much in love to see the import of all he said; and we must not, in common courtesy, omit for his bride the customary compliment to all brides, the expression of our good wishes. We wish her happiness, and the more willingly for the sake of the good blood in her veins — the blood of worthy, sagacious, and patriotic Scotland (derived, not from her father, but from her mother, a Kirkpatrick). May the "canny drop" be allowed free circulation through her heart! Yes, we wish her happiness willingly, but very doubtfully; not because she has wedded a Bonaparte, for the men of that name have not the reputation of unkind husbands (even to the wives they repudiated), and she might be very happy with Louis Napoleon in another sphere; not merely because her position is trying, and apparently insecure, but because she places on her head the crown matrimonial of France — a circlet with which some dark fatality seems connected; for, among the many fair brows on which it has rested, there are very few that it has left without a blight or a wound.

When our memory passes in review the royal and imperial wives of France, we are surprised to see how many have been divorced, how many broken-hearted, how many have left a disgraceful name behind to posterity. And among the smaller number, the innocent and the happy, how many have been snatched away by a premature death, or have been early and sadly widowed! The crown matrimonial of France has been borne, by the majority of its wearers, unworthily, unhappily, or too briefly. For some it has been imbued, as it were, with a disfiguring stain; for others, lined with sharp, cruel thorns; for others, wreathed with the funeral cypress. If history, holding her mirror to our view,

Bids us in the past descry
The visions of futurity,* with such a history of French queens and empresses before our eyes, it is but natural that good wishes for the bliss of Empress Eugenia should be damped by doubts and fears. By casting with us a quick and comprehensive glance over the memoirs of the royal ladies to whom we have alluded, the reader will be convinced of the great preponderance of cares, crimes, and sorrows, over peace, innocence, and felicity, in their lives. We will commence our summary with the reign of Charlemagne, as a remarkable era, and sufficiently early for our purpose.

Charlemagne, A. D. 768 (date of his accession).

His first wife was HERMENGARDE (daughter of Desiderius, King of the Lombards), whom he had been persuaded by his mother, Bertha, to wed, contrary to his inclinations, and whom he divorced in two years after his accession, on the plea of her ill health. She had the grief to see her father dethroned by Charlemagne, whose prisoner he died. The desolate Lombard princess died in obscurity.

The second wife, HILDEGARDE, a noble Swabian, was fair, wise, and good, but was calumniated by Taland, a half-brother of Charlemagne, who (in revenge for her disdain of his own proffered addresses) accused her of criminality with a foreign knight, during the king's expedition against a German tribe. Obligated to conceal herself from her incensed husband, she lived in great poverty, till her accuser, struck with remorse after a dangerous illness, declared her innocence. In memory of her restoration to her home and her good fame, she founded, in Swabia, the Abbey of Kempten; in the annals of which religious house is written the history of her patience and her suffering (during her concealment), and her noble forgiveness of her persecutor. But her recovered happiness was brief; she was snatched by death from her numerous children at the early age of twenty-six, in 784.

FASTRADE, the third consort, daughter of Raoul, Count of Franconia, so disgusted the people by her arrogance, that a conspiracy was formed to dethrone her husband on account of her influence over him. This plot, though abortive, caused Fastrade much mortification and anxiety; and she died very young, in 794, as much hated as her predecessor had been lamented.

LUTGARDE, a German, the last consort of Charlemagne, handsome, generous, and literary,* loved her husband; and to enjoy his society, usually accompanied him to the chase. But he was faithless to her, choosing for his favorite one of the ladies of her train. Whatever mortification Lutgarde might have felt was soon terminated by death. She died young and childless (in A. D. 800), after a union of little more than four years.

* She enjoyed the friendship of the learned Alcuin (disciple of the venerable Bede), at whose persuasion Charlemagne founded the University of Paris.

Louis I. (le Debonnaire). 814.

His first wife was HERMENGARDE, daughter of Ingram, Count of Hesbay.* She has left an unenviable reputation as cruel and despotic. When Bernard, a petty Italian king, who revolted against Louis, had been conquered, Hermengarde sentenced him and his adherents to death; and though the sentence was commuted by Louis, she caused the eyes of Bernard to be pulled out, and such tortures to be inflicted on him, that he expired in consequence. She herself died soon after her victim; having, however, been more fortunate in her lot than her predecessors, for she had enjoyed a peaceable wedded life for twenty-one years.

Her successor, JUDITH, daughter of Welf of Bavaria, was an artful and licentious woman, whose bad conduct caused her step-sons (children of Hermengarde), to revolt, filling the kingdom with trouble. They published her profligacy with Bernard (the son of her husband's tutor), whom she, by her influence over Louis, caused to be created Duke of Septimanie. She was taken by her step-sons, and imprisoned in a convent at Poitiers, and compelled to pronounce the vows; but was liberated by her husband when he had put down the revolt, she having solemnly sworn to her innocence. Again the young princes revolted; and Judith, again captive, was sent to Tortona, in Italy, and her young son Charles separated from her, and shut up in a monastery; the unfortunate Louis himself being confined at St. Medard; from whence he was released only on submitting to some very abject conditions. He received back his wife and her son, but soon died of grief. Judith survived him but three years; having, however, lived to see the murder of her favorite Bernard, by the hands of her son Charles, who stabbed him for a revolt. She has left an odious name in the records of history.

Charles I. (the Bald). 840.

He married first HERMENTRUDE, daughter of Odo, Count of Orleans. She was prudent and good, but her life was one of sorrow. Her eldest son, Louis, had an impediment in his speech; her second son, Charles, died young; her third son, Carloman, rebelling against his father, because the latter required him to become a monk against his will, was taken prisoner, had his eyes put out, and was imprisoned in the Abbey of Corbie. Her only daughter Judith, widow of Ethelbald, King of England, eloped from the court with Baldwin of Flanders, causing great scandal and trouble. Hermentrude had not the consolation of her husband's affection; for Louis formed an attachment for Richilde, sister of Boson, King of Provence, and ill-treated Hermentrude, whom he sought to divorce, but found public opinion too strong in her favor. The unhappy wife died, overwhelmed with cares, A. D. 869, and was buried at St. Denis.

In three months after her death Louis married RICHILDE, who hated, and was hated by her stepsons, and fomented great disorders in the royal family. Having accompanied the king in his expedition against the countries on the Rhine, on his defeat she was obliged to fly from Heristal in the middle of the night, without clothes or money; suffered great hardships, and lay in by the roadside, with no one near her but one attendant. All her children (four sons and a daughter) died young. After her husband's death she lived a most licentious life, and pillaged and fired houses in her Bacchanalian riotings, until the Bishop of Rheims threatened her with excommunication unless she restrained her disgraceful conduct.

Louis II. (the Stammerer). 870.

ANSGARDE, the daughter of a Count Hardouin, was privately wedded by Louis, during the life of his father, Charles the Bald, and bore him two sons, Louis (afterwards king), and Carloman; but being of an inferior rank, Charles compelled her husband, whom she tenderly loved, to divorce her, and to espouse

ADELAIDE, daughter of Count Begon, whose life was embittered by her doubtful position; for, on the death of Charles the Bald, Ansgarde obtained from Pope John VIII. the establishment of her children's* rights, because Charles had not applied to the ecclesiastical power to sanction the divorce between her and his son Louis. Wherefore Adelaide was generally accounted only the concubine of Louis, and the deserted Ansgarde as his lawful wife. Adelaide, who suffered great uneasiness of mind, was encephalic at the time of Louis' death, in 879, and had a posthumous son, Charles, surnamed the Simple.

Charles III. (the Fat.) 884.

He married in 877 RICHARDA, a lady of Scottish birth. She was esteemed for wisdom and virtue; but was accused by her feeble-minded and credulous husband of infidelity with his prime minister, Luitgard, Bishop of Verceil. Richarda in vain protested her innocence, offering to submit to the ordeals of fire and water; she was divorced, and retired to a convent in Alsace, which she had founded, and lived there ten years in retirement.

Charles IV. (the Simple). 893.

offers nothing remarkable. She had four daughters, but no son; and died 918, after a marriage of eleven years.

His second wife was OGINA,* an English princess, sister of King Athelstane. Her royalty was clouded. Her husband was dethroned by his subjects, and imprisoned at St. Quentin, where he died in great misery. Ogina, divided from him, fled to England for the protection of her only child, Louis, thence surnamed Outremer, or "beyond sea." On her son's recall, after thirteen years of exile, she returned to France, where she married (at the age of forty-five) Herbert Count of Vermandois, then but twenty years of age, and son of Herbert de Vermandois, who had betrayed and imprisoned her royal husband, the dethroned Charles. This ill-assorted marriage alienated the love and respect of her son, King Louis. Ogina lived happily, however, with her young husband, but only for two years, as she died in childbirth, 853.

Louis IV. (Outremer). 936.

He married GERBERGA of Saxony, daughter of Emperor Henry the Fowler, and widow of Gilbert Duke of Lorraine, who was drowned in attempting to cross the Rhine on horseback, to escape the pursuit of Louis d'Outremer, then at war with him. Gerberga defended her dead lord's fortress so gallantly, that when King Louis at length succeeded in taking it, he admired the spirit of his fair adversary so much that he offered her his hand and throne. She was loved and respected by Louis, whose friend and counsellor she was; but her lot had many cares. The king, in an expedition, was made prisoner, and remained a year in captivity; her young son Charleman died while a hostage for his father; others of her children also died young; and she survived her affectionate husband.

Lothaire. 954.

Married, in 966, EMMA, daughter of Lothaire, King of Italy. She was depraved, and gave cause of scandal with Adalberon, Bishop of Laon; and then poisoned her husband, in the hope of reigning in the name of her son, an only child, Louis le Faineant, or the Idle. Louis, on his accession, threatened Adalberon and herself with punishment; but he, too, died by poison; and the Duke of Lorraine, uncle to the king, imprisoned both Emma and Adalberon, and treated them with severity. Emma escaped from prison in 988, but became a miserable outcast and wanderer, and died in the following year.

Louis V. (le Faineant). 986.

He married BLANCHE,† daughter of a noble of Aquitaine. She was very beautiful, but

† By some writers she is called Constance.

the marriage was an ill-suited one; for Blanche was animated, and Louis inert, and so much disliked her vivacity, that he often retired from her company to a country residence. She became corrupt in her conduct, and attached herself to the Count de Verdon, and afterwards to several others. At length she poisoned Louis, after a short reign of fifteen months; and in him ended the Carolinian race.

Blanche re-married with Hugh, eldest son of Hugh Capet, the next heir, for whose benefit she removed her first husband, but shortly afterwards died childless.

Hugh Capet. 987.

His queen was ADELAIDE of Guinne, who appears to have lived in tranquillity; but enjoyed her elevation to the throne only two years, dying in 989.

Robert (the Devout). 997.

His first wife was BERTHA, daughter of Conrad of Burgundy, and widow of Odo, Count of Blois. But the Pope, Gregory V., pronounced their marriage invalid, because Robert had been sponsor to one of Bertha's children by her first marriage, which circumstance had constituted what the canons of Rome termed "a spiritual affinity" between them. But the royal pair was strongly attached, and refused to separate. The Pope laid France under an interdict; Robert and Bertha retired to the Castle of Vaivert, near Paris, where they were rendered miserable by crowds of their subjects daily haunting them, with piteous entreaties that they would consent to part; and so terminate the evils the kingdom was enduring from the interdict. All their friends and attendants fled from them; and they would have been utterly desolate, but for two servants who remained to aid them, but who, notwithstanding, viewed their wretched master and mistress with such horror, that they passed through the fire for purification everything which had been touched by the excommunicated couple. The king remained firm, refusing to forsake his unhappy wife; she lay in of a premature birth from grief, and Robert being assured that she had produced a monster with the neck of a goose,* he considered this (fictitious) occurrence as a proof of the wrath of Heaven, and at length consented to give her up. In two years after, Bertha, still loving, and who still called herself queen, went to Rome to solicit the new Pope (Sylvester II.) to establish her marriage; but while she was urging her suit, Robert made another alliance, and the unhappy Bertha retired to a convent, and died 1016.

* A similar legend was related of Bertha, queen of Pepin, and mother of Charlemagne, who was said to have borne a child with the leg of a goose. And, strange to say, Bertha herself is represented in effigies still extant, with one foot that of a goose.

CONSTANCE, Robert's second wife, daughter of William Count of Provence, was beautiful, but haughty, violent, and hard-hearted. Robert disliked her so much that he would never term her wife or queen; and took, to console him, a mistress, Almafede, who had been betrothed to a Count de Beauvoir, at which Constance was so much chagrined that she caused the count to be assassinated, in revenge for his having yielded his claim on the hand of Almafede. Robert, in consequence, sought to divorce Constance; but the bishops of the realm interfered to prevent him. Thirteen persons, accused of heresy, being sentenced to the flames at Orleans, in 1022, Constance chose to be present at this dreadful spectacle; and perceiving amongst the condemned, one Stephen, who had formerly been her confessor, she was so much incensed against him, that she attacked the wretched man on his way to the scene of his torture, and thrust out one of his eyes with her staff. Her eldest and favorite son died young, leaving the succession (to her great chagrin) to her second son, Henry, whom she hated; and she fomented strife in the royal family by her endeavors to place on the throne her youngest son, to the prejudice of Henry; and she excited her children to rebel against their father, and to quarrel among themselves, till they were obliged to fly far from her baneful influence. After her husband's death, she conspired against her son, then reigning; but was defeated, and closed an odious life at the Castle of Melun, 1032, and was buried at St. Denis.

Henry I. 1031.

He married ANNE, daughter of the Grand Duke of Muscovy, whose life with him appears to have passed in tranquillity. But after his death, having contracted with Raoul Count de Crespy, an ill-advised marriage (for which she was excommunicated, and was finally divorced), she displeased her son, the reigning monarch, and finding herself deserted by her former friends, she retired to Russia, separated forever from her children.

Philip I. 1060.

His first wife, BERTHA, daughter of Fleuri, Count of Holland, lived happily with him for many years, till his affections were alienated by Bertrade, wife of Foulques le Requin, Count of Anjou; and, accordingly, he divorced Bertha, to make way for the beautiful but evil-disposed BERTRADE, who, being repudiated by the complaisant Foulques at the king's desire, married the latter in 1073, a step which roused the indignation of the nobles and the Pope Urban II.; and Philip, compelled by excommunication, submitted to divorce Bertrade, and restore her to her first husband. During her short union with Philip, Bertrade had plotted to cause his son Louis to be detained a prisoner in England, whither he had gone to attend the coronation of Henry I.; but being thwarted by the good faith of the English king, she administered to Louis a poison, which he discovered in time to defeat, by an antidote, but his face ever after remained colorless. Bertrade incurred reproach and contempt for continuing to receive the visits of Philip at the chateau of the Count Foulques; but after the king's death, she became a prey to remorse, and retired to a convent, where she inflicted on herself such severe penances, that she fell a victim to her austerities, and, in 1117, closed her evil and troubled life.

Louis VI. (le Gros, or the Fat). 1108.

He married ADELAIDE, daughter of Humbert Count of Maurienne. She was lovely and amiable, and forms an exception to this gloomy list of regal consorts, for she lived happily and worthily with Louis. One grief, however, she felt in the premature death of her eldest son, Philip, by a fall from his horse. After the king's decease, she married Matthieu Sire de Montmorency, Constable of France, from whom, after fifteen years, she separated, to retire to a cloister she had founded.

Louis VII. (the Young). 1137.

His first wife, ELEANOR of Aquitaine, disgusted him by the gross improprieties of her conduct in the Holy Land, whither she had accompanied him, and where she had incurred scandal with the celebrated sultan, Saladin, and others; and even with her own uncle, Raymond of Poitiers. Louis, therefore, divorced her, and she immediately married again with Henry II. of England. But the shadow of the crown matrimonial of France rested upon her still; witness her well-known unhappiness with Henry, their mutual dislike, her jealousy, the discords she excited between her sons and their father, and her deserved and long imprisonment. CONSTANCE, daughter of Alphonso, King of Castille, second wife of Louis, was worthy of the influence she possessed over his heart; but their happiness was very brief, being terminated in four years by the early death of Constance in childbirth. She was buried at St. Denis. The third queen of Louis, ALICE, daughter of Thibaut, Count of Campagne, and niece of our English king, lived peacefully, as it appears, and, surviving her husband, was regent for her son.

Philip II. (surnamed Augustus). 1186.

His first wife, ISABEL, daughter of the Count of Hainault, was married to him when both bride and bridegroom were only twelve years of age. Philip having afterwards quarrelled with her uncle, the Count of Flanders, the girlish queen, then but seventeen, was accused by some malicious persons of taking part with the count against her husband, who, imbibing a dislike to her, exiled her from court, and sent her to live in a kind of disgrace at Sens. At length relenting, he recalled her; but her young and clouded life was terminated by her dying in childbirth at the age of twenty-one. Her successor was INGERBURG, daughter of Waldemar, King of Denmark. She was beautiful, with a profusion of fair hair, and was scarcely seventeen when married. The day after the nuptials she was crowned. During the rites Philip was observed to gaze upon her, and then to turn pale; and became so troubled, that he could scarcely be induced by his ministers to allow the ceremony to continue. But in a fortnight afterwards he called a council and divorced the poor young foreigner, who, on learning from an interpreter what the proceedings meant, burst into tears, exclaiming in a broken dialect—"Bad France!—Rome!" implying that she appealed to Rome from the injustice of France. But Philip brutally imprisoned her in the convent of Cisoien, near Lisle, and left her in such penury, that she was often dependent on her needlework for her food. In 1196, Philip married AGNES, the lovely and amiable daughter of the Duke of Merania. But Pope Celestine, at the instance of Canute, Ingerburg's brother, annulled the divorce of the latter, and dissolved the marriage of Agnes and Philip. The king refused to renounce his new wife, and shut up Ingerburg in a still more rigorous imprisonment than before, at Etampes. The kingdom was laid under an interdict, and a council was called at Soissons, where the cause of Ingerburg was pleaded so earnestly, that Philip, without waiting for the termination, silently retired; and riding to the prison of the young Dane, placed her behind him on horseback, and, without any attendants or respect, carried her to Paris, and acknowledged her as queen. Agnes de Merania, seeing herself abandoned, died of grief soon after at the Castle of Poissi. After her death, Philip again cast off the so-often insulted Ingerburg, and again imprisoned her; but was constrained by the Pope to release and recall her to court, where she continued to reside meekly and patiently, ill-treated by the king, but pitied by the people. She survived her tyrant, who has incurred the odium of making three lovely and virtuous young women undeservedly miserable.

Louis VIII. (the Lion). 1223.

His queen, BLANCHE, daughter of Alphonso VIII. of Castille (and of Eleanor of England), was so fair that she was called Candide, and was good, prudent, and pious. She enjoyed her husband's love in a happy union of twenty-six years. Yet she was not exempt from royal anxieties; for during her regency for her son (St. Louis), she had many troubles, cares, and difficulties, on account of the insurgent nobles and the Bretons. She had lost four sons and a daughter in infancy, and she finally died of grief at Maubuisson, on hearing that her son, St. Louis, who had gone to Palestine, was a prisoner in Egypt.

Louis IX. (St. Louis). 1226.

When only nineteen, he married MARGARET, daughter of Raymond Berenger Count of Toulouse, who was herself but fifteen. She had every advantage of person, mind, and heart, and was ever beloved by Louis. But in her early days she experienced great vexation from her mother-in-law, Blanche, who so entirely separated the affectionate young couple, that she would not permit them even to converse together. On one occasion when Margaret was dangerously ill, and Louis had ventured to her room to inquire after her health, his mother, finding him there, took him by the hand to lead him out; and the poor invalid called to her in tears—"What, madame! will you not suffer me, either living or dying, to speak to my lord and husband?" After the death of Blanche, the domestic happiness of Margaret was unbroken, if we except her natural grief at losing six of her eleven children. But her greatest affliction was the loss of St. Louis, who died of the plague in Tunis. She died 1295, and was buried at St. Denis.

Philip III. (the Hardy). 1270.

His first wife, ISABEL, daughter of James I. King of Arragon, was only fifteen at the time of her marriage, and had a fair prospect of happiness, had life been spared. But she died at twenty-five, in consequence of a fall from her horse, which occasioned premature confinement. She was buried at St. Denis. The second queen of Philip, MARY OF BRABANT, daughter of Henry, Duke of Brabant, was handsome and intellectual, and was at first beloved by her husband. But a gulf was soon opened between them by the calumny of a man named La Brosse, an upstart favorite of Philip, who accused Mary of having poisoned Louis, the son of her predecessor Isabel. Philip imprisoned the queen, and treated her with rigor. But her brother, then Duke of Brabant, came forward in her defence; and, after a searching examination, La Brosse was convicted (by the confession of one of his tools) of the young prince's murder, and was hanged. Mary was honorably acquitted; but she had suffered severely, in mind and in health, from the trials and indignities to which she had been exposed. After Philip's death she lived in close retreat from the world. One of her daughters, Margaret, was the second wife of Edward I. of England.

Philip IV. (the Fair). 1284.

His queen was JOAN, daughter of Henry, King of Navarre. She had great talents, and a taste for the fine arts; and seems to have escaped, in great degree, the sorrows of the crown matrimonial of France. But she had only attained the age of thirty-three at her death. One of her daughters, Isabel, was married to Edward II. of England subsequently to her mother's decease.

We come now in order of time to four Burgundian princesses (two pairs of sisters), whose respective husbands filled the throne of France in succession, under the titles of Louis X. (le Hutin), Philip V. (the Tall), Charles IV. (the Handsome), and Philip VI. (de Valois). These ladies were MARGARET and JOAN, daughters of Robert II., Duke of Burgundy, consorts of Louis X. and Philip de Valois, and JANE and BLANCHE, daughters of Otho of Burgundy, and wives of Philip V. and Charles IV.

MARGARET was married when scarcely fifteen to Louis X. She was very handsome, and depraved in no ordinary degree. She, with her sisters-in-law, Jane and Blanche, inhabited the Hotel de Nesle, that stood on the Seine,* and that has acquired an infamous celebrity from the scandalous revels of these beautiful but wicked young females, who are said to have caused the guests they admitted secretly to be hurled down a trap-door and drowned in the river, if they unfortunately recognized in their fair and anonymous entertainers the wives of their princes. Margaret and Blanche had selected two favorites, Norman knights and brothers, named Philip and Walter d'Aulnay. The latter had been attached to a Mademoiselle de Morfontaine, who, finding herself neglected, was inspired by jealousy to watch her fickle lover, and thus discovered the double intrigue, which soon came to the knowledge of the king (then Philip IV). On the trial of the criminals, revelations especially disgraceful to the princesses were made. The brothers D'Aulnay were executed after being put to tortures too horrible to relate. Some persons proved to have been accessories to the royal intriguants were likewise put to death. Margaret and Blanche were degraded, and stripped of their inheritances; their heads were shaved, and they were imprisoned in a most rigorous manner in the Chateau Gaillard, about seven leagues from Rouen. Margaret was strangled by the hands of an executioner in her dungeon, by the king's order, in 1315, when only twenty-six.

BLANCHE remained a close prisoner for twelve years. She was then removed to the Abbey of Maubuisson, where she took the veil, but did not long survive her profession. Her two children pre-deceased her. She was never crowned as the consort of Charles IV., but the shadow of the crown matrimonial projected itself forwards, and fell upon her, as it were, by anticipation.

JANE was sentenced to imprisonment in the Castle of Dourdan. But she was the heiress of the province of Franche Comté, which her husband did not think it good policy to restore, as he should do if he divorced her. He therefore affected to believe her innocent of the charges brought against her, and applied to the parliament for her acquittal and restoration to her rank and honors. During the life of her husband, King Philip V., Jane lived decorously; but her after years proved the truth of the former accusations; for her widowhood was a career of the utmost profligacy. She died in Flanders at the age of thirty-seven.

JOAN of Burgundy, sister of Queen Margaret, and wife to Philip VI. (de Valois), bore a very different character from that of her guilty relatives. She was prudent and virtuous, and was beloved by her husband, but had the grief to see his kingdom overrun by the English. The fate and the criminality of her sister must have given her many bitter pangs. She died at fifty-five, and was buried at St. Denis.

After the execution of Margaret in the dungeon of Chateau Gaillard, her husband, Louis X., took for his second wife CLEMENCE of Anjou. But she had been only a few months wedded when Louis died, leaving her enceinte. The violence of her grief brought on fever, and her posthumous child died in a few days after its birth. She herself died young, in retirement.

After the demise of Blanche in her cloister, her widower, Charles IV., married MARY of LUXEMBURG, daughter of the Emperor Henry VII. She was amiable, discreet, and beloved, and died in childbirth, aged only eighteen, in a year after her marriage.

The third wife of Charles, JANE D'EVREUX, his cousin, was worthy of the love and esteem he bestowed upon her. But she lost her affectionate husband by death after three years only of union. Jane lived to the age of sixty, and was buried at St. Denis. The crown made for her coronation was used to crown the succeeding queens of France.

On the death of Joan of Burgundy, the virtuous sister of the strangled Margaret, Philip VI. married BLANCHE of NAVARRE, then only eighteen. But her regal splendors and domestic affections were overthrown by the death of Philip, in a year and a half after their nuptials; and she was left a widow and enceinte before she had completed her twentieth year. She had subsequently the misfortune to lose her only child, Blanche, in the bloom of youth. Queen Blanche lived in retirement, and died at seventy, and was buried at St. Denis.

John (the Good). 1350.

He was much attached to his estimable wife, BONA of LUXEMBURG; but the calamities of his unfortunate reign were a source of anguish to her, both as wife and queen. The realm was torn by civil factions, and devastated by the victorious arms of the English, under Edward III. Bona did not long survive the, to her, disastrous battle of Cressy, in which so many of the French nobles perished.

His second wife, the charming JANE D'Auvergne widow of Philip de Rouvres, Duke of Burgundy, had her share of sorrows, as queen, wife, and mother. She saw her royal husband defeated at all points by the English, taken prisoner at Poitiers, and carried to London, to endure a four years' long captivity; and the kingdom, in his absence, a prey to the horrible atrocities of the peasant war, called the Jacquerie. The dauphin, her step-son, treated her with disrespect, deprived her of the regency, and obliged her to retire to Burgundy. Her own two daughters died young; and when her husband was free to return to her, in 1361, it was with estranged affections, he having fallen in love, while in London, with a lady, to be near whom he returned to England and to captivity, in which he died. Grief shortened the days of his unhappy queen, who survived him but a year. She died in 1365, and was buried at St. Denis.

Charles V. (the Wise). 1369.

His wife, the accomplished and handsome JANE DE BOURBON, died in childbirth, leaving her husband inconsolable. Of her nine children, six had died before her. Dying in 1378, aged forty, she was buried at St. Denis.

Charles VI. (the Beloved). 1380.

He married the beautiful and depraved ISABEL of BAVARIA, notorious for her conjugal infidelities, her violence, cruelty, prodigality, and want of natural affection for her children. On account of her licentious conduct, the king caused her to be imprisoned for a time; his subsequent insanity, however, gave her power and liberty, which she abused. She was disgraced by her intimacy with her husband's brother, the Duke of Orleans, and then with the Duke of Burgundy, the murderer of Orleans. Her favorite, Boisbourdan, was put to death by order of the king, issued in a lucid interval. Another, Saligny, was arrested by the dauphin, who confined his mother in a prison, whence she was delivered by the Duke of Burgundy, in arms. France was overrun by the English, and deluged with blood by intestine factions; the people were starving, the king insane, and with his children often in want of the commonest necessities. Isabel and her son, the dauphin, detested each other; she endeavored to poison him, and failing, negotiated, in order to ruin him with the English, for the cession of France; and made a marriage between her daughter Catherine* and Henry V. of England. On the death of the lunatic and neglected king, Isabel, despised by the English, and abhorred by the French, fell into merited poverty and desolation; and when she died, none could be found to pay any regard to her remains, which were conveyed at night in a little boat across the Seine to St. Denis, accompanied only by one priest and the boatman.

Charles VII. (the Victorious). 1422.

He married MARY of ANJOU, daughter of James II., King of Naples. She was a woman of most exemplary conduct, good sense, and religious feelings, and was at first much esteemed by Charles, till he was alienated from her by his mistresses; then he treated her with the utmost disdain, and would not even speak to her; and his favorites (with the exception of the celebrated Agnes Sorel), emboldened by his example, behaved to the queen with great indignity. Yet she endured all with uncomplaining meekness, and declined the advice of her friends to withdraw from court, the scene of her griefs, lest it should injure the king with his people, who were suffering deeply from the English armies in their country; and, to add to her griefs, her son, Charles of Normandy, was poisoned. After the death of the king, Mary founded twelve chapelles ordentes, with twelve priests in each, to pray night and day for the repose of his soul. She died in 1463, and was buried at St. Denis.

Louis XI.

The first wife of this bad man was MARGARET, daughter of James I. of Scotland. She was witty and accomplished, but had no personal attractions, and was disliked and ill-treated by Louis. Having been calumniated, and without redress, by a gentleman named Count James de Tilly, she fell ill from chagrin, and was so weary of her sad existence, that she refused to take any remedy to save her life, saying, "Fie upon life! let no one speak of it to me any more." Mary died childless, and very young. She was never queen; but being dauphiness, was queen expectant; and the crown matrimonial had cast its dark shadow forwards.

* Her daughter Isabel had been previously married to Richard II. of England, who was dethroned by the father of Catherine's husband.

The second wife of Louis, and his crowned queen, was CHARLOTTE, daughter of Louis, Duke of Savoy. She was amiable, meek-spirited, and modest; yet her evil-minded husband treated her not merely with unkindness, but with brutality. He insulted her by his numerous infidelities, and kept her in such poverty, that her food was scanty and coarse, and her apparel mean and patched. When he was at war with the Duke of Burgundy, suspecting the queen to be well-inclined to the interests of his adversary, he imprisoned the unfortunate Charlotte in the Chateau of Ambois, where she suffered still greater distresses than ever. Of six children, she buried two sons and a daughter young. Her constitution was so broken by the inroads of penury and constant vexation, that she died in three months after the decease of the tyrant. Her tomb at Clergy was broken open and profaned by the Huguenots in the subsequent religious wars.

Charles VIII. (the Courteous). 1443.

His consort was ANNE, only child of Francis II., Duke of Brittany—a princess distinguished by brilliant advantages of mind and person. She was at first attached to the Duke of Orleans, afterwards Louis XII., but was required to relinquish him; in order to marry Charles VIII., to whom she made an affectionate wife. In her early years some clouds dimmed her horizon; but subsequently hersky was calm and bright. Charles was, for some time, a negligent and unfaithful husband; and she lost all her children, three sons and a daughter, in infancy; the loss of the young dauphin, in particular, afflicted her severely. At the close of his life, Charles became more sensible of his wife's merits, and more endeared to her; and she grieved sincerely at his premature death. But her destiny was prosperous; she retained her rank as queen consort, by becoming the wife of her first love, the Duke of Orleans, who succeeded Charles on the throne; and over the heart and mind of Louis she ever preserved a strong influence. Yet she died early, in childbirth, when she had scarce numbered thirty-eight years; she was buried at St. Denis. The predecessor of ANNE, with Louis XII., had been JOAN, the sister of Charles VIII., and daughter of Louis XI., whom Louis, when Duke of Orleans, had been reluctantly forced to marry when the princess was but twelve years old. This ill-fated lady was remarkably plain, and even somewhat deformed; but wise, pious, good, and tender; and was, unhappily for her peace, affectionately attached to a husband to whom she was an object of dislike.* She was allowed, for a brief space, the empty title of queen, of which Louis XII. was in haste to despoil her, for the sake of her brilliant rival, her brother's widow, Anne of Brittany. The new king assembled a council to sanction his divorce from Joan; and the proceedings took a peculiar course, that were torture to the mind of a delicate and sensitive princess. After her divorce was pronounced, Joan retired to the Convent of the Annunciation at Bourges, where she lived in the odor of sanctity, and died at the age of forty-one.

The third wife of Louis XII. was MARY, daughter of Henry VII. of England—an unwilling and sorrowful bride, constrained to marry, in the bloom of seventeen, an infirm old king, while her heart was given to Charles Brandon, afterwards Duke of Suffolk. Her love for Brandon, who had accompanied her to France, was discovered by the Countess of Angouleme, whose son Francis was heir to the crown, Louis having no male offspring; and the young queen had the mortification to find herself placed under a rigorous and humiliating surveillance, established by Madame d'Angouleme, who had determined to keep watch over her conduct. However, the death of Louis, after a brief union of only three months, terminated her restraint, and her unwelcome royalty. She wedded her first love; but numbered no more than thirty-seven years at her death.

Francis I. 1515.

His first queen, CLAUDE, daughter of Louis XII. and Anne of Brittany—amiable and mild, but not handsome—was neglected by her husband for his many mistresses. Of seven children, she lost four, and died forsaken and spirit-broken at twenty-five, and was buried at St. Denis. Her successor was the handsome and accomplished ELEANOR, sister of the Emperor Charles V., and widow of Emanuel King of Portugal. Notwithstanding all her attractions, she received neither attention nor respect from Francis; who, ungrateful to her for all her exertions to maintain peace between him and the emperor, seemed as though he studied to distress her by his public and various profligacies; and she was, in particular, deeply pained by the ostentatious appearance of the Duchess d'Etampes (Anne de Pisseleu) at court. Eleanor felt the sorrow of being separated from her first lover, Frederick, brother to the Elector Palatine—of losing an amiable, respectable husband, who loved her, and whom she esteemed — and of being parted forever, by state policy, from her only child, the Portuguese infanta, Maria, on account of her marriage with the French king, who proved to her so unworthy a husband. After the death of Francis, Eleanor, weary of court life, devoted herself to religious observances.

Henry II. 1547.

His queen has left a detestable memory in the records of Europe. CATHERINE DE MEDICIS, daughter of Lorenzo Duke of Urbino, and niece of Pope Clement VII., handsome, talented, and wicked, in a corrupt and turbulent time, seems to us like a blood-red meteor gleaming from a black and stormy sky. By her own criminal conduct she gave a pretext to her husband for his undisguised infidelities with ladies who were more the queens of his court than his wife was permitted to be, and she was often threatened with divorce. Catherine, ambitious to reign under her son's name, wickedly strove to incapacitate her children from power by a bad education; she indulged them in idleness; early initiated them into luxury and licentiousness; and seared their feelings by bringing them to behold, as spectacles, criminals tortured and executed, and animals tormented. But as she sowed she reaped. Her sons, broken in constitution from their dissipated habits, died early, and without heirs; by which she saw the sceptre pass into the hands of Henry of Navarre, whom she detested, the husband of her daughter Margaret, who was scorned by that husband for her profligacy, the result of her education; and she saw her innocent daughter Elizabeth, unkindly treated by her morose consort, Philip II. of Spain, who suspected a female brought up under the auspices of Catherine de Medicis. After the death of her husband (killed in a tournament), Catherine fomented the feuds of the Guises and the Montmorencies, that distracted France; and instigated her son, Charles IX., to the massacre of St. Bartholomew; which subsequently so preyed upon his mind, that on his death-bed he drove her from his presence with horror. His brother and successor, Henry III., being defeated by the League, and obliged to quit Paris, in consequence of his mother's intrigues and bad advice, forbade her to reappear at the council, reproaching her with such severity, that irritation, at the words of the only child she had really loved, brought on a fever of which she died; despised for her lapses from virtue, and execrated for her many cruelties. She was buried at St. Denis.

Francis II. 1559.

This only amiable son of Catherine de Medicis was married at fifteen to the beautiful Mary-Queen of Scots, who had been educated with him in France. They tenderly loved each other; but in two years after their marriage, and one year after coming to the throne, Francis died childless, to the great grief of his young widow. Mary frequently indulged and solaced her affection by composing little poems to his memory, and singing them to her lute. As a specimen of these effusions, we translate one of the shortest with which we are acquainted: —

When slumbering on my couch I rest,
In dreams thou still art near;
My hand by thine is warmly prest,
Thy kind voice glads mine ear.
By night, by day, in good or ill,
Repose or toil, thou'rt with me still.

It was with deep regret that Mary, compelled by the machinations of the queen-mother, Catherine (who dreaded the influence of her talents and her beauty at court), found it necessary to leave France, which she loved as the scene of her youthful happiness, and return to Scotland. The crown matrimonial of France had fallen from her head, yet its thorns claved to her, even when she crossed the seas; for much of her subsequent and well-known misery is attributable to her French education, and to the manners and ideas she had learned in the French court, which had unfitted her for the more sober and decorous country of her birth.

Charles IX. 1560.

ELIZABETH, his consort, and daughter of the Emperor Maximilian, was good, sensible, and pious; but, though respected by the king, she was very unhappy. The profligate court was a scene shocking to her piety and purity, and she lived in it, but not of it, a very solitary life; seldom speaking, and then only in Spanish, her vernacular tongue. Though she bore meekly with the mistresses whom her husband paraded before her, she was deeply hurt by his infidelities. Charles, on his death-bed, confessed himself unworthy of so amiable a wife, and regretted the sorrows he had caused her; sorrows which left such enduring traces on her mind, that though young when widowed, she retired into a perfect seclusion, refusing the proffered alliances of the kings of Spain and Portugal, and founded at Vienna a convent, in which she devoted herself to religious exercises till her death, at the age of thirty-eight.

Henry III. 1574.

His wife, LOUISA, daughter of Louis, Duke of Mercœur, of the house of Lorraine, had a cheerless lot. She was separated from her lover, the Count de Solm, to whom she was about to be united, and wedded a man who, though at first dazzled with her beauty, soon wearied of her melancholy and of her inanimate manners; and the queen dowager, Catherine, by her mischievous interposition, estranged him still more from his fair bride. Louisa had the misfortune to lose her only child at its birth; and the murder of the Guises, her beloved relatives, by the treachery of her husband, filled her with horror. She felt great indignation at the insolent conduct of Henry's mistresses at court; and he, in revenge for her complaints, dismissed all her attendants, leaving her in a state of solitude. She sunk into melancholy, became negligent of her dress and appearance, and seemed anxious to forget she was a queen. After the murder of Henry, by James Clement, Louisa dedicated her life to religious seclusion, imposing on herself so many pilgrimages and austerities, that she shortened her days by them, and died 1601.

Henry IV. (the Great). 1589.

MARGARET DE VALOIS, his first wife, daughter of Henry II. and Catherine de Medicis, corrupted at an early age from the bad examples around her, was noted for her abandoned conduct; yet her beauty and her talents won for her much admiration and even literary homage. Political considerations occasioned her marriage with Henry of Navarre, when her heart was devoted to the Duke of Guise; an ill-omened marriage, celebrated hurriedly and without the usual regal pomp, and stained soon after with the blood of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. Margaret and Henry hated each other for their mutual infidelities. To compel her to consent to a divorce, that he might marry his favorite, Gabrielle D'Etrées, Henry treated Margaret with contempt, exposed her to want, allowed his mistresses to insult her, and at last imprisoned her in the Castle of Usson, where she suffered great privations. After the death of Gabrielle, Margaret yielded her consent to her divorce, retaining, however, the useless title of queen, but seeing the real regal honors transferred to her successor, Mary de Medicis. Margaret lived to behold the annihilation of her house, and even the extinction of the name of Valois; all her flatterers forsook her; she existed poor and neglected; and solaced herself partly in devotions, partly in revelries unsuited to her age, sex and position; and partly in composing poems and memoirs commemorative of her many lovers, several of whom died violent deaths. She is said to have habitually worn a large farthingale with numerous pockets, and in each pocket a box containing the embalmed heart of some one of her deceased favorites. As she advanced in years she became hypochondriac and gloomy, and died at the age of sixty-three. She composed for herself an epitaph,* from the original French of which we make the following translation:—

* This epitaph is in Margaret's handwriting, in one of her MS., preserved in the "Bibliothèque

EPITAPH.

This flower of Valois' tree, in which hath died
A name so many monarchs bore with pride,
Marg'ret, for whom fair wreaths the Muses wove,
And laurels flourished in the classic grove,
Hath seen her wreaths, her laurels withered all,
Hath seen at one rude stroke her lilies fall.
The crown that Hymen in too fatal haste
Upon her brow 'mid wild disorders placed,
The same rude stroke to earth hath cast; and now
Despoiled she lives, like wind-swept, leafless bough.
She, noble phantom, shade of what had been,
A wife, but husbandless—a realmless queen,
Lingered amid the relics of life's fire,
And saw her name before herself expire.

Margaret was buried at St. Denis.

In the Anthology of Constantine Cephalus we have met with a Greek epitaph (by Antipater) on an unfortunate bride, which contains a few lines singularly applicable to the disastrous marriage of Margaret de Valois, in which both bride and bridegroom were equally unwilling, and which was peculiarly calamitous, as the prelude to, and the signal for, the carnage of St. Bartholomew. That the reader may judge of the applicability, we give our translation of the Greek lines:—

Canst thou, O Sun! this vast calamity
With patience see!—Woe worth yon nuptial torch;
Whether it were unwilling Hymen's hand,
Or willing Pluto's, lighted up its blaze.

MARY DE MEDICIS, second queen of Henry IV., and daughter of Francis, Grand Duke of Tuscany, was very unhappy. She was eclipsed in her own court by her husband's mistress, the Marchioness de Verneuil, who publicly treated her with disrespect, and mimicked her Italian accent and manner. The queen complained of the favorite's insolence, and her remonstrances caused violent quarrels between her and the king, who frequently threatened to divorce her, and illegitimize her son, the dauphin, in order to marry the marchioness. Mary's temper was soured, and her mind rendered irritable by her constant vexation and apprehension. After Henry's assassination she had the affliction to see her friends, the Marquis Concini and his wife, put to death by the order of her son; by whom, also, she herself was twice imprisoned on account of her disagreement with his prime minister, Richelieu. She witnessed the misery of her daughter, Henrietta Maria, wife of the unfortunate Charles I. of England, and she became an outcast. Dismissed from England by Cromwell; obliged to quit Holland from Richelieu's influence; denied by her son a shelter in Paris, where she had reigned, she retired to Cologne, where, deserted by all, she suffered such poverty that, in the last winter of her life, she could not purchase fuel, but was obliged to burn her scanty furniture. Her privations brought on dropsy, of which she died. We have ourselves stood in front of the plain-looking, mediocre house in Cologne, occupied by the exiled queen before she retired to the convent in which she died, and have recalled to memory the expressive epitaph composed upon her fate; we offer the reader our translation of it from the original French:—

BY AN UNKNOWN AUTHOR.

The Louvre saw my splendors—like a star
My husband's deathless glory shone afar:
Two kings* my daughters wed; my son's proud name

Shall live in light upon the page of fame.
Ah! who amid my grandeur could foresee
An exile's death, a foreign grave for me?
Cologne, thou guardian city of the Rhine,
That gav'st a tomb† to this poor frame of mine,
If e'er the passing stranger seeks to know
The tale of all my greatness, all my woe,
Tell him, a queen lies in this narrow space,
Whose blood runs warm in many a royal race;
Yet, in her dying hour, bereaved and lone,
No spot of earth had she to call her own.

Louis XIII. 1619.

His wife, the handsome and majestic ANNE of AUSTRIA, daughter of Philip III. of Spain, was married at fifteen to a cold, unfeeling man; and they lived in a constant state of estrangement, increased by the mischievous interference of Mary de Medicis, who took pains to incense her son against his young wife. Anne was accused of participation in a conspiracy of the Prince of Condé to dethrone Louis. She endured the humiliation of being reprimanded in open court; and was often moved to bitter tears by the sarcasms of Louis, who dismissed all her Spanish suite, and thus rendered her very solitary. Even her correspondence with her father, her only solace, was interrupted; her papers seized, and herself imprisoned for a time at Chantilly, on an accusation of Richelieu, that she revealed the affairs of France to her father. Her married life was joyless; her regency, in her widowhood, stormy. The revolt against her minister, Mazarin, forced her to quit Paris, and she endured much personal privation. At the close of her life (painfully terminated by cancer), she was consoled by the filial love of her son, Louis XIV.; but she forms no exception among the unfortunate queens of France. She was buried at St. Denis.

Louis XIV. (the Great). 1615.

Spain. Though mild, amiable, and affectionate, she never possessed her husband's love, but was slighted for a constant succession of mistresses, whose presence in her court was a continual outrage to her feelings. She lost the greater number of her children very young, and died broken-hearted at forty-five. She was buried at St. Denis.

Louis XV. 1715.

His wife, MARIA CHARLOTTE LECKZINSKA, daughter of Stanislaus I., the unfortunate King of Poland, was attached to the Count d'Étrées, an officer of the garrison of Weissenburg, where the Polish king and princess resided during their exile; and she was on the point of being united to him, when her hand was demanded for the King of France. She spoke six languages, was fond of painting, and had various accomplishments. Her prospects of conjugal happiness were soon destroyed by the depraved French courtiers, male and female, who made it their task and their triumph to seduce the king from her. Her feelings were wounded by seeing his meretricious favorites appointed to places at court which brought them into contact with her. She mourned over the untimely graves of her son, the dauphin, and his young wife, and several of her children. The sad and forsaken queen endeavored to amuse her mind by writing, drawing, and working for the poor, but she would never give fêtes. Grief for the tragical end of her father (burned to death by his robe-de-chambre taking fire), occasioned an illness of which she died, 1768. She was buried at St. Denis.

Louis XVI. 1774.

The woes of his beautiful and most ill-fated wife are familiar to the world as "household words." The name of MARIE ANTOINETTE recalls, rapidly and vividly, as a flash of lightning, agonies so varied, so intense, so uncommon, that the mind is struck with wonder, horror, and compassion, at the hundredth repetition, even as at the first recital. As "all rivers run into the sea, yet it is not full," so the floods of affliction flowed upon her from all sides, yet the ocean of her misery was never full till the last moment of her cruel martyrdom; and the tale of her sufferings, like an ocean, infinite and perennial, has never been exhausted, though the theme of a thousand pens.

Napoleon. 1804.

The smooth brow to which the blood-stained diadem of Marie Antoinette was transferred, seemed for a season exempted from the ordinary fatality. JOSEPHINE was happy in her children; happy in her imperial husband's love and his glory; happy in her extraordinary elevation; happy in the respect of her court, where no unblushing rival dared, as in former reigns, to parade within the circle of the fair sovereign. But the unseen and unsuspected thorn within the crown matrimonial worked its way. Who knows not the anguish of that unmerited and ungrateful divorce, to which she was forced to consent, by the man whom she had materially served, and whom she had so affectionately loved?

Her Austrian successor could not be accounted otherwise than unfortunate, since early deprived of empire, parted forever from a husband whose sincere wish it had been to render her happy, and bereaved by death of her amiable son, if she had but possessed ordinary sensibility. But cold, apathetic, and selfish, MARIA LOUISA evinced but little feeling for her every way blighted boy — none for his imprisoned and fallen father; and her subsequent connexion with her one-eyed chamberlain, Count Neipperg, disentitles her to our respect or sympathy. Doubtless the reader will remember how Byron has characterized her heartlessness in his "Age of Bronze," in the sarcastic lines that conclude thus: —

Her eye, her cheek betray no inward strife,
And the ex-empress grows as ex a wife!
So much for human ties in royal breasts!
Why spare man's feelings when their own are jests?

Louis Philippe. 1830.

But who shall withhold his pity from the respectable ex-queen, AMELIA, the last, and still living victim of the crown matrimonial of France? She, in her domestic affections, was happy till the diadem pressed her temples; then, she was destined to weep over the graves of her eldest son (Duke of Orleans), snatched away in the prime of manhood, and of her lovely daughter, Marie, in the bloom of youth, with her nuptial garland just wreathed; and at last to fly into a foreign land with her husband, from the rage of his revolted nation; and to remain in exile, widowed and dethroned.

And now, reader, have we not laid before you a black catalogue of those who have worn the crown matrimonial of France? Out of sixty-seven royal and imperial consorts, there are but thirteen on whose names there is no dark stain of sorrow or of sin. Of the others, eleven were divorced; two died by the executioner; nine died very young; seven were soon widowed; three were cruelly traduced; three were exiles; thirteen were bad in different degrees of evil; the prisoners and the heart-broken make up the remainder. All those who were buried at St. Denis — about twenty* in number — were denied the rest of the grave; their tombs were broken, their coffins opened, their remains exposed to the insults of a revolutionized populace, and then flung into a trench, and covered with quick-lime.

Does history show any parallel to this list of queens and empresses in any civilized country? With pride and pleasure we contrast with it our English history; for, though several of our queens have had sorrows, the number of the sufferers is smaller, and their griefs were (generally speaking) of a more chastened kind. Nor has the English diadem been disgraced by so many examples of wickedness, nor by turpitude of so deep a dye; and how few are the divorces! — none since the Conquest save in the reign of one king. We are not about to investigate the causes of the fatality so evidently attending the crown matrimonial of France, with whatever idiosyncrasy, so to speak, in the nation or in the court, it may be connected; nor why the dark shadow should spread into other lands when their sovereigns ally themselves with French royalty. But we cannot help observing the remarkable fact, that the shadow has rested upon our British crown when shared with a daughter of France. The two persons among our queens-consort notorious for their wickedness, were both French princesses, Eleanor of Aquitaine, divorced by Louis VII., and married by Henry II. of England, and Isabel (daughter of Philip IV. and Jane of Navarre), the faithless and cruel wife of our Edward II. — she whom Gray has apostrophized: —

She-wolf of France, with unrelenting fangs,
That tear't the bowels of thy mangled mate.

Richard II., husband of the gentle child-queen, Isabel de Valois (daughter of Charles VI. and Isabel of Bavaria), was dethroned and murdered. Henry V. survived his marriage with Isabel's sister, Catherine de Valois, but two years; and on his death, in the flower of manhood, England's glory was long obscured; and from the second marriage of the same Catherine, descended Henry VIII., the greatest tyrant that ever oppressed this realm. Charles I., husband of Henrietta Maria (daughter of Henry and Mary de Medicis), was beheaded. Constance of Provence, Isabel of Angoulême, and Margaret of Anjou, the partners of the troubled reigns of Henry III., John, and Henry VI., though not daughters of French kings, were, nevertheless, French women.

In retracing the miseries of the unfortunate royal marriages of France, our memory has involuntarily and naturally recurred to the familiar lines of Horace, descriptive of unions of an opposite character. If any one wishes to adopt those lines, as a good augury for the new "imperial bride," whatever doubts we

ESCAPE OF JAMES II.

FROM THE BATTLE OF THE BOYNE.

MR. URBAN—In the Autobiography of Joseph Pike, who died in 1729, aged 75 years, is the following note relative to one Francis Randall, which may be interesting to your readers,† as it introduces some particulars relative to the escape of James the Second from Ireland in the year 1690, after his loss of the Battle of the Boyne, which have not hitherto found their way into the pages of more popular historians, nor are they noticed in the excellent and elaborate edition of O'Kelly's Macariæ Excidium, published by the Irish Archæological Society in 1850.‡

“ Francis, son of Henry and Jane Randall, of Lyndhurst in Hampshire, came to Ireland with the English army in 1649. He appears to have joined the Society of Friends about 1655, having laid down his military profession on the conclusion of the Civil Wars. He settled at the ‘ Deeps of the Slaney,’ now Randall's Mills, near Enniscorthy, in the county of Wexford. He suffered much persecution for his adherence to what he believed to be his Christian duty, particularly in the reign of Charles the Second. In 1662, for not paying money for christening his children, and absenting himself from the public worship, he was excommunicated, and upon a writ, ‘ excom. cap.’ he was imprisoned in the gaol of Wexford for above two years, as well as

† It occurs at p. 105 of the fifth volume of “ A Select Series, Biographical, Narrative, Epistolary, and Miscellaneous, chiefly the production of early Members of the Society of Friends, intended to illustrate the spiritual character of the Gospel of Christ,” edited by the late John Barclay, of Stoke Newington.

‡ The following is James' own account of this journey in his Memoirs:—“ The King . . . setting out about five in the morning, marched leisurely to Bray, about ten miles from Dublin, where he ordered the two troops he had with him to stay till twelve at noon to defend that bridge as long as they could, if any party of the enemy should fortune to follow them; and then continued on his journey through the hills of Wicklow, with a few persons, till he came to one Mr. Hacket's house near Arolo, where he baited his horses some two hours, and then followed on his journey to Duncannon. The King . . . travelling all night, got to Duncannon about sunrise.”

subsequently for some time for the attendance of the religious meetings of the society to which he belonged.

“ In 1690, King James, when flying in distress after the Battle of the Boyne, and almost without attendants, not knowing on whom to depend for assistance to reach Duncannon Fort, near to which a French ship of war waited to convey him to France, recollecting that Francis Randall had often visited his camp to obtain the restoration of horses for himself and his friends, and the king believing he could depend on his fidelity, determined to trust his person in his hands, and accordingly proceeded from Enniscorthy to his house. But, being observed by a party of men employed by Francis Randall in fitting out a small vessel, they proposed seizing on him to obtain a large reward, when Francis Randall interposed, and would not suffer the least interference with his guest. On taking him into his house, observing the danger the king was in from the pistols in his belt being cocked, he took them, and, adjusting them, remarked the risk to the dejected monarch, who replied that he had not noticed it. After getting some refreshments, Francis Randall sent his son, with fresh horses, to escort him to the fort, which he reached in safety. The king left a token of his gratitude for Francis Randall's kindness, which is still in possession of his descendants.”

CHANGE AT THE WOOL-MILLS. — In consequence of an advance that has taken place in the price of olive-oil from 40l. to 70l. per ton, the manufacturers of woollen cloths have had recourse to experiments that promise to change materially the economy of the wool-mills. It has been found by one of them in the neighborhood of Thurlstone, near Pennistone, that milk mixed with oil answers the desired purpose greatly better than oil alone; and the consequence is, that the “ milky mother” is in great request by speculators in the districts of the mills. This discovery will probably reduce the sanitary influence ascribed to wool-mills in our last number, while it may perhaps give greater facilities for the revival of the old practice of oil-anointing.

STRAW PAPER. — This manufacture was first introduced about fifty years ago, but was only partially successful. By an interesting and important improvement in the mode of preparation, the use of straw as a material for paper may now be considered permanently established in England, Ireland, and the United States. So little difference is perceptible between rag and straw paper, that the latter is used by one of the London journals regularly. One peculiar feature of the manufacture is, that although the article can be produced at a price not exceeding that of ordinary printing paper, it is applicable for both writing and printing purposes. — Journal of the Society of Arts.

THE WOODEN SPOON.

ALTERED FROM THE SWEDISH.*

There is silence in the forests. Nothing is more beautiful than on a fine sunny summer-day to wander in the vast fir-forests of Sweden, especially those which are here and there broken up by patches of light-green grass, covered over by pieces of moss-grown rocks and tall birch-trees. It is so solitary in these few open places, that, unless a trap is seen, set in the winter to catch foxes, one might believe no human being had ever been there.

Every Swede feels a necessity for being alone at times with himself; he indulges a fervent love for that quiet, hidden nature, within whose shade he played when a child. Always, even in the most stirring scenes of life, he hears a voice from his silent forests, inviting him to peace and tranquillity, calling him back to all that is most beautiful, good, and holy in his experience.

There lies near to the mountain-chain that separates Sweden from Norway, a narrow dale, bounded by high hills; a light-green birch-forest spreads its shade round a small lake, which is so full of islands that the water seems to be divided into several sparkling mirrors reflecting them underneath. This lake is hidden among the mountains and almost endless fir-forests of Norrland. Few have heard of it, but those who once visit it will often think, amid the tumult of the world, of that wild, yet peaceful scene. Behind the birch-wood, the land rises in high terraces; fir and pine trees tower up there, and look like the forest's head—so dark-green and tall, so grave and solemn. But still higher on the mountain come the birches again, for these trees form in the north both the front and rear guard of the great fir-forests. High over all appears a peak of snow; and a hundred mountain-streams trickle through the dark trees, and carry their white foam over rocks and stones, to cast themselves into the lake, or join the river that flows from it.

It is well this place is so little known, or so much forgotten; were it otherwise, some speculator might erect a cottage on the banks of the lake, in Swiss style, in order to hire it out to an Englishman, who wished to get rid of his spleen by means of fishing. If I could guide you thither, however, you would immediately perceive one solitary red wooden house, which stands on the edge of the forest, and quite near to the lake. The ground at the back has been cleared, and is now divided into corn and pasture fields; the former of which sometimes yield more than the seed which was sown in them. One must not expect too much from good Mother Nature, up here in the north, for she is poor, good mother, very poor, and therefore, perhaps, all the dearer for what she gives. Almost the only communication which the inhabitants of this red wooden house had with the rest of the world was yearly, in the beginning of March, when "the house-father," its owner, had to travel between fifty and sixty miles off, in order to sell to "rich Erik," the farmer, a quantity of fish—a sort of char, which in these mountain-lakes are of superior quality—and some hundreds of ptarmigan, which had been taken in nets, and were to be transmitted to Stockholm. This journey was a great event in the Norrland "new-settler's" house: the two children, especially, were long beforehand engaged in preparing father's travelling necessities, and in feeding up the two reindeer which should draw the sledge, with all its precious load, to its destination. On the present occasion, father's journey had caused even more excitement, for he had gone so far as to the market-town—more than one hundred miles from his home.

"I think," said little Anna, one evening when they were looking for his return—"I think father will bring something grand for mother; yes, I think mother will get something."

"Ah! he may never think of that," said the mother, who well understood her little girl; "but perhaps you, child, may get something: father thinks of his little Anna—he does."

"Does mother think so? Do you hear, Anders! Mother thinks that father will buy us something fine. How grand it must be down there! There are many hundred people, father says, and he was there even before we were born. He was a farm-servant down there with a captain—a captain who had such a fine uniform, and a sword, and all that."

Anders, who sat and carved wooden spoons, looked up and laughed. "Anna! she wants to be so grand—she does. I wonder, now, what she will have—a necklace, or a ring on her little bit of a finger!"

Anna's cheerful face took a shade of displeasure. "So Anders talks! But I shall get nothing, for I can do nothing useful. It is different with Anders, who can sit and carve spoons, and set out nets in the forest, and is quite like a man; he is past thirteen years old, and I am not ten; and so"—

"You are both good, clever children, both of you," said the mother; "if you would only read your lessons, which always go heavily on."

"Yes, that is because I never can be at peace for Anders. Now, do not look at me,

* The beginning of this story is translated from a Swedish work by "Uncle Adam." Throughout the remainder the original idea only has been preserved.

Anders. I say, don't look at me, or I shall jumble the words all together." Anna began to read; the restless blue eyes wandered often from the crooked German characters of her book. She read a tale of a boy who was very good, and very poor. "Yes, that is a truly beautiful story," she said, hastily closing the volume; "but does it not appear wonderful that he should not be happy when he was so good?"

"Ah, child, do not believe that happiness and riches are always united," said the mother.

The girl looked at her, as if she did not quite comprehend her meaning. "Mother must know that it is happier to be great, and rich, and admired, than to be poor, and never thought of by any one."

"Sister Anna is like the wooden spoon," said Anders, without stopping his work.

"Like the wooden spoon! Am I like a wooden spoon? Well, that is amusing!"

"Yes. You see, Anna, there was once on a time a wooden spoon!"

"I will not listen to you, Anders."

"That is no matter. There was once a wooden spoon!"

"I tell you, I do not hear you, Anders."

"That, also, is no matter. Once a wooden spoon, that was so fine, so neat, so pretty, made of the best wood, and carved in the most beautiful manner—one could never see a more delicate and tasteful wooden spoon; and no one took it up without saying: 'Ack, how pretty it is!' Thus the little spoon soon grew vain and proud. 'Ah,' thought the beautiful wooden spoon, 'if I could only be like a silver spoon! Now I am used by the servants alone; but if I were a silver spoon, it might happen that the king himself should eat rice-milk with me out of a golden dish; whereas, being only a wooden spoon, it is nothing but meal-porridge I serve out to quite common folk.' So the wooden spoon said to the meat-mother: * 'Dear lady, I consider myself too good to be a simple wooden spoon; I feel within myself that I was not meant to be in the kitchen, but that I ought to appear at great tables. I am not suited to the servants, who have such coarse habits, and handle me so rudely. Dear mistress, contrive that I shall be like a silver spoon.' The meat-mother wished to satisfy her pretty wooden spoon; so she carried her to a goldsmith, who promised to overlay her with silver. He did so. The wooden spoon was silvered over, and shone like the sun. Then was she glad and proud, and scorned all her old companions. When she came home, she lay in the plate-basket, and became quite intimate with the family silver, wished the teaspoons to call her aunt, and called herself first-cousin to the silver forks. But it happened that when the other spoons were taken out for daily use, the silvered wooden spoon was always left behind, although she took the greatest care to render herself conspicuous, and often placed herself uppermost in the basket, in order not to be forgotten, but to be laid with the rest on the great table. As this happened several times, and that even when there was company, and all the silver was brought out, the poor wooden spoon was left alone in the basket, she complained again to the mistress, and said: 'Dear lady, I have to beg that the servants may understand that I am a silver spoon, and have a right to appear with the rest of the company. I shine even more than others, and cannot understand why I should be thus neglected.'

"Ah," said the mistress, 'the servant knows by the weight that you are only silvered.'

"Weight! weight!" cried the silvered spoon. 'What! is it not by the brightness alone that one knows a silver spoon from a wooden one?'

"Dear child, silver is heavier than wood.'

"Then, pray, make me heavier!" cried the spoon. 'I long to be as good as the rest, and I have no patience with the sauciness of that servant.' The mistress, still willing to gratify the desires of her little spoon, carried her again to the goldsmith.

"Dear heart," she said to him, 'make this silvered wooden spoon as heavy as a real silver one.'

"To do that," said the goldsmith, 'it will be necessary to put a piece of lead here in the handle.'

"Ah," thought the poor spoon, 'then must he bore straight into my heart'—for the heart of a wooden spoon always lies in the handle; that is to say, when wooden spoons have hearts—'but one must bear all for honor. Yes, he may even put a bit of lead in my heart, if he only makes me so that I shall pass for a real heavy silver spoon.' So the goldsmith bored deep into her heart, and filled it up with melted lead, which soon hardened within it. But she suffered all for honor's sake. Then she was silvered over again, and brought back to the plate-basket. Now the servant came, and took her up with the rest of the spoons, and saw and felt no difference; so she was placed with the rest on the great dinner-table, passed for a real, beautiful silver spoon, and would have been as happy as possible, if she had not got a lump of lead in her heart. That lump of lead caused a great heaviness there, and made her feel not quite happy in the midst of her honors. So time went on, and the wooden spoon continued to pass for a silver one, so well was she silvered, and so heavy had she been made. But the meat-mother died. At that, the silvered spoon, instead of sorrowing, as she once would have done, almost rejoiced; for every time she had lain shining on the great table, she had recollected that the meat-mother was the only person who knew that she really was nothing more than a simple wooden spoon; and so, if her mistress took another spoon instead of her, she became quite jealous, and said to herself: 'That is because she knows all about me; she knows I am a wooden spoon, silvered outside, and with a lump of lead within me.' But when the mistress was dead, she said to herself: 'Now I am free, and can enjoy myself perfectly; for no one will ever know now that I am not quite what I seem.' The goods, however, were now to be sold. The family silver was bought by a goldsmith, who prepared to melt it up, in order to work it anew. The unhappy wooden spoon was bought with the rest; she saw the furnace ready, and heard with dismay that they should all be cast therein. She was dreadfully alarmed, exclaimed against the cruelty practised towards the friendless orphans who had so lately lost their good protectress, and began to appeal to her companions in rank and misfortune, who lay calmly within sight of the furnace. 'They will burn us up!' she cried. 'They will turn us to ashes! How quietly you take such inhuman conduct!'

"O no!" said an old silver spoon and fork, who lay composedly side by side — they had been comrades from youth, these two, and had already gone through the furnace, I know not how often — 'O no! they will do us no harm. They may willingly melt us; the furnace will do us good rather than harm, and we shall soon appear in a more fashionable and handsome form.'

"The silvered wooden spoon listened, but was not comforted. It did not comfort her to find that silver would not burn, for she knew well that wood would do so.

"Ah," sighed the silly little spoon, 'I see it is not by brightness only, nor only by weight, that real silver is known!' The silver was cast into the furnace; but when the goldsmith came and took her up, she cried in great excitement, and with a trembling voice: 'Dear master, I certainly am a silver spoon; that is seen both by my appearance and weight; but, then, I am not of the same sort of silver as the other spoons; I am of a finer sort, which cannot bear fire, but flies away in smoke.'

"Indeed! What are you, then? Perhaps tin?"

"Tin! can the dear master think so meanly of me?"

"Perhaps even lead?"

"Lead! ah, the dear master can easily see if I am lead."

"Well, that will I do," said the master, and began to bend the handle, when snap it went in two, for wood will not bear bending like silver, any more than it will bear melting.

The wooden handle broke in two, and out fell the lump of lead. "So!" cried the master; 'only a common wooden spoon silvered over!'

"Yes," cried the poor spoon, which, so soon as the lead fell from her heart, grew quite light and happy — 'yes, I am only a common wooden spoon. Take away the silvering, dear master; cause me to be mended, and set me in the kitchen again, to serve out meal porridge for the rest of my life. Now know I well how stupid it was for a wooden spoon to want to pass for a silver one!'

"And so the wooden spoon should be me," said little Anna, pouting; "simply because I know that the rich live in gladness and joy, and the poor suffer sorrow and want."

"But we do not suffer want, dear child," said the mother. "We have all that is necessary, and even more. Wait a little: you shall see that father will have coffee and sugar home with him; yes, a whole pound of each sort, I doubt not."

"But, mother, I heard father himself say, that there are people in the world who drink coffee every day: they are certainly happier than we are."

"There is a doubt of that, my girl. God divides not so unequally as we think."

"God gives us always so much as ought to content us, but He cannot give us so much as that we shall be content, for thereto He will not constrain us," said Anders, as gravely as a judge.

"Hear Anders! hear him!" cried his sister; "he talks like the priest."

"Yes; for these words the priest said last year, when he preached down there at Björkdal, and we travelled to church."

"That I do not remember," said Anna.

"Oh, thou wert but a little girl; and then the priest's daughter was so grand that day."

"Yes, so grand! she had a fine necklace of red stones, or of glass, or some sort of red berries, but they shone like glass-stones."

"And you sat and looked at that," said the mother, "instead of hearing God's word!"

"She was only a child, mother," said Anders excusingly.

Just then the rapid sound of the reindeer hoofs was heard, and the jingling of the sledge-bells coming over the frozen lake, as if keeping time to that regular sound, while the hoofs struck one against the other in their hasty progress over the hardened snow. A few minutes more, and the house-father was at home. "Good-evening, old woman; good-evening, Anna. Thank you, Anders; yes, you may drive the reindeer to the shed. Well, all goes right at home?"

"Yes, dear Jaeris, all is well."

"You may believe, mother, there were people down there," continued the good man, as he threw aside his great goat-skin pelisse, and sat down to his supper; "yes, it is amusing to see folks at times, but I was glad enough to get away. Thank God, I am at home again!"

"That you may well say, Jacris; and I say so too."

"But do you know, mother," said the husband, who all the time loved a journey well—"do you know, I must make a long journey again this winter!"

"Where, then? A long journey! Where to?"

"Well, you see, there is a German, or an Englishman—it is all the same—who has bought up twenty-five reindeer, which he will have taken to Stockholm, in order to be sent out—where, I know not, but that is all the same. They must then export the mountain, and forest, and moss, also, I said to the agent. And he laughed, and answered: 'Rightly said, Jacris; but that is not our concern. Will you conduct the creatures to Stockholm?' So I agreed, for, you see, he would not trust them to any but a respectable person."

"What a long journey! It will be a dreary time," the wife replied.

"It will soon go over, little wife. It will be better for thee, who will be at home; worse for me, who must go out into that villainous world, which I have not seen for so many years—not since I lived with the captain, and followed him once to Stockholm; but I shall be well paid; and—Yes, mother, now comes the knot. I shall take Anna with me; you must have the boy at home, but some one must also be with me."

Anna flew to caress her father, kissed her mother, and clapped Anders. "Ack, but I am glad! I shall then see the king, and the king's wife—the dear little queen. I shall know them all directly, for I know already how they dress themselves."

"How, then, is that?" Anders slightly inquired.

"The king wears a red frock down to his knees, with gold seams, and stands always beside a table, on which a gold crown lies on a red cushion. The queen wears a red petticoat, also with gold seams; and has peaked shoes, with heels so high—so high!"

"And how knows little Anna all that?"

"Because there's a picture therein in the lid of mother's clothes-chest, and the king and queen are painted there, just precisely as they stand and go here in this world. Yes, I know all that; and I shall get to see it soon."

"Provided you do not first drop your little eyes out," said the father, laughing.

Eight days afterwards, Jacris and his little daughter set out with the drove of reindeer for the capital. The mother wept when she embraced her darling child; but the thoughtless little girl was so elated with the prospect before her, that she scarcely felt grieved at her mother's tears.

II. KAMRER MILLER.*

"It is six years this day since the death of our dear girl," sighed Mrs. Accountant Miller, as she drew from a drawer some small precious articles which had belonged to her only child. "To-day she would have been sixteen years old; a great girl she promised to be—but God willed it otherwise."

"Six years to-day," the Accountant echoed, "and still"—

"We miss our girl. It is just childish, Miller," she added, with a sorrowful smile, for she knew her husband missed the child even more than she did.

"You should be reasonable, dear Emily. See me now, I took it calmly and reasonably from the beginning."

"I do not grieve, Miller; but I love the child's memory."

"Yes, yes; but that memory is—is—Come, now, little Emily, let us drive out and take the air; the fresh air is always a good remedy."

The Accountants drove out in their comfortable sledge, up Drottninggatan, and out by Norrtull. They met a herd of reindeer, and stopped to look at them. Bundled up in the sledge sat little Anna, in her little goat-skin frock, a dark fur-cap on her head, with ears tied down at each side of the cheeks, which the winter frost left as red as a rose.

"Now just see! is she not like our Annette?" said the Accountant. "What is your name, little girl?"

"Anna—Jacris' dotter," was the reply.

"Anna! Do you hear, Emily! Our little girl was Annette; quite the same thing. How old are you?"

"Ten years, within a few weeks."

"Ten years? Emily, what do you say now?"

"The girl is truly not unlike our Annette," she replied.

The truth was, that the Accountant had long wished to follow a fashion very common in his country, and adopt a child for his own; he had never found one quite to please him; but Norrland's Anna, as he called our little friend, was precisely to his taste. Her

* The love of titles which pervades all ranks in Sweden, and the total abolition in discourse of that useful pronoun "you," lead to the absurd practice of addressing persons by the title of their office or employment, instead of their simple names; and these titles have their feminines, which must also be used. Kamrer, or Accountant, makes, in the feminine, Kamrerska, or Mrs. Accountant; the feminine of Kapten is Kapten-ska, or Mrs. Captain; a priest's wife is Prostinna, or Mrs. Priest; or more precisely, Priestess; and so on.

lively blue eyes, her quick concise answers, took his fancy at once; and he thought it perfectly unaccountable, that on the anniversary of Annette's death he should meet an Anna who so entirely resembled her. Thus his decision was made, and communicated to his wife, who willingly acquiesced in it. The Accountant opened a negotiation with Jacris for his daughter; the Norrland settler at first plumply answered "No;" but when he came with Anna to visit Accountant Miller at his house; when he saw all the comfort and even wealth that surrounded him, and was assured that he would bring up the girl as his own child, and eventually make her his heiress; and then thought of his own poor house in the mountains of Norrland, and of all the fortune he could hope to leave her — a couple of reindeer at the most, and a few rix-dollars — he doubted if he ought to oppose the child's good prospects. Anna's emotion was very lively; her cheeks were crimson; her bright eyes trembled in tears and sparkled in joy; she could scarcely speak, but the round red lips seemed to utter the same mixed language of smiles and tears. The decision, however, was made; and in its confirmation little Anna pronounced a tearful, yet unhesitating, "Yes." The new-settler of Norrland left his child with Mr. and Mrs. Accountant Miller; and Anna, of her own free-will, remained.

It became a happy house to the old couple when the little girl grew reconciled to her strange and grand abode — grand to her at least — when they heard themselves once more called papa and mamma, and were caressed by the child, whom they soon loved almost as their own. And into that little heart, guileless as it yet was, came another love, dormant till then — the love of the world — and mingled with all the love that was felt for Papa and Mamma Miller, and obscured the love that had been felt for the poor father and mother away in the hills of Norrland.

III. EIGHT YEARS AFTER.

"Who is that girl dancing there, in the gauze dress — that light pink gauze — with white roses in her hair?"

"Which? — there are so many pink gauze girls here."

"That very pretty girl with the fair curls, who is dancing with that fine-looking lieutenant."

"Oh! with Hjalmar. Yes, I see now; that is Accountant Miller's foster-daughter; not a relation, I believe — in fact, there is a strange story about that — some noble — it is easy to see she is noble, on one side at least."

"I should say the lieutenant has intentions."

"Intentions! he may have them if he will. A girl like that, and the heiress of that old Miller, who is at all events well-to-do in the world! That would be something too good for Lieutenant Hjalmar."

"Who is he, then, this Hjalmar?"

"He is nothing but what you see — a good-looking fellow enough; but for the rest, he is lieutenant in some land-regiment — up there in Norrland, or Helsingland, or perhaps in Lapland."

"Ha! in that case, such a girl could never think of flitting off there: so fair a flower must adorn the capital. Yet one might feel envious of that lieutenant too."

This conversation passed between two young men in civil uniforms, and with glasses stuck into one eye; they were looking on at that furious dancing which a ball-room in Stockholm displays during the winter season. Their remarks came to a stop here, for the young pair they were observing whirled out of the dancing-circle, whirling still, quite through the bystanders, into the clear space beyond. There the girl stopped to breathe, and the young lieutenant to wipe his hair with his handkerchief.

"Well, if he has not intentions, what makes him look with those earnest, serious, questioning sort of eyes, so fixedly into hers! And she — yes, just see now! — does she not seem to be under a conjurer's spell while he looks that way?"

"Serious or gay," replied the other young man, "I tell you the girl is too ambitious to think of him: he may look as he pleases, but she will aim at being Grävinan, or Frö-herrinnan at least." *

"You think so? Now, I think he will propose, and that she will consent; yes, perhaps this very evening," said his companion, directing the glass-covered eye after the lieutenant and his partner, as they retreated to an anteroom in search of a seat. They found the seat; but in Sweden no young girl can sit alone with a gentleman, even for a few minutes, and whether it were for this cause, or from any other, the lieutenant did not propose.

"What makes you so silent, dear child?" asked Mrs. Accountant Miller, as the sledge glided homeward from the winter-ball.

"Were you not amused?"

"O yes, mamma."

"You might well be contented, Annette" —

"Contented? Yes, mamma, certainly I am contented. Dear mamma must not imagine that I am not contented."

"You were perhaps the brightest flower of the ball-room," said Mr. Accountant: "it was truly amusing to see how the butterflies gathered round our pretty rose."

"Ack, he is not a butterfly!" sighed Annette — as Norrland's little Anna was now

* Countess, or baroness.

called—and she colored highly, and was glad that the stopping of the carriage at the Accountant's door prevented the words she unconsciously uttered from being heard. Out of all the assemblage, one alone dwelt in her thoughts; and Lieutenant Hjalmar was not a butterfly.

IV. ANNETTE'S ROOM.

It was a tasteful room, the pretty Annette's chamber: the walls decorated with engravings, and some paintings; the prettily-displayed toilet-table, with all its little elegances for use or ornament; and the many windows of a Swedish apartment, shaded with thin muslin curtains, as white as the scene that lay glittering beyond them. But what was rather curious, was to see, in a hidden spot, a pretty sketch of the lake and red wooden house in Norrland, of which we have already spoken in the commencement of our narrative—the scene where the story of the wooden spoon was related. It had been put up to please the Accountant, who had got a travelling artist to make the sketch, and had presented it to his foster-daughter on her name-day; but it was almost hidden, and kept as much as possible out of sight.

"Why do you keep that little picture so out of sight?" asked the good man once.

"It is so dear to me," said Annette, coloring, "I wish no one else to see it."

"A beautiful sentiment!" murmured the foster-mamma, much moved.

"A pretty thought!" said the foster-papa, gravely.

It is now the morning after the ball. The young girl sat on a sofa, just before the open door; she had sat down there in a moment of sudden thought; and thought had followed thought, so that she forgot to rise. Her unemployed hands, interlaced in each other, rested on her knees, her eyes looking earnestly forward, only fastened on the floor of the room. Annette was much prettier in this thoughtful mood than when she laughed and talked; she was much prettier in a simple morning-dress than in ball-room attire; there was something about her appearance that suited with simplicity better than finery; and there was more sensibility in her face when it was serious than when it was merry. Perhaps the reason of the latter was that, when she was serious, she thought of things which drew out all the hidden sensibilities of her nature. "What does he think of me? Does he think of me at all?" Annette was now mentally asking; "Does he think of me more than of others? If not, why does he look at me so earnestly, so inquiringly, as if there were always some question in his mind concerning me which he longed to make, or which he wished himself to answer? What if he should know all!—if he should know that I am not really the person I seem to be; that my position is a false one; that I am only a Norrland new-settler's daughter! How that thought haunts me! He, so elegant, so refined, evidently highly born—though that I have never heard; but it is so easy to know. Ah! if any where to see my brother beside him, or my poor father! I used sometimes to dream of my old home with pleasure, with tenderness at least; but now how ill-placed should I find myself there—how unsuited to it I should be! Yes, I was happy there once," she said to herself, nodding to the picture of the Norrland lake and dwelling; "happy and glad; and I thought of it once with pleasure; but now, now I fear continually. I fear when he gazes at me with those questioning, serious eyes, which seem to reach my very heart; I fear he may be thinking of this. And now, if my father should come here—the good, rough new-settler; or my brother, with his long hair down the sides of his face—if he should come up here and embrace me—the common peasant! ah! I should die of shame. And yet he is my father; and I have a mother too. How the memory of childhood will return! 'It is strange that it does not quite die out. Once it would come like a butterfly, fluttering round the soul, to draw some honey from its flowers. Alas! I believe the flowers are dead; there is no honey for memory to feed on now. How happy I used to be when Anders brought home some fish in the basket, or a hare that was taken in the snare! Then we had a feast in the house, and none of the great parties I mingle in now make me happier. Now I hear many whisper my name, and I fancy they may be saying: 'She is only called so; she is nothing but a laborer's, a new-settler's daughter.' And if he should say that—if he should hear it! But my mother, my poor mother! I loved her once so inwardly, so warmly; I can remember sitting on her lap and learning to spin, when she was at the spinning-wheel; and when I so often broke the thread, how patiently she would join it! Aok! And at the weaving-loom, also, how she used to make me believe I was weaving the piece for my own frock, or for father's or Anders' wear. Yes, all that I could think of once, and without pain; but now that I have gone out into the world, that I have been presented in society; now—yes, Annette, be sincere with thyself—now, since thou hast known him, since thou hast seen his eyes fastened upon thee, since thou hast wished to be his equal—his!"—The girl's thoughts dared not syllable to herself the word; she started from it.

But Mademoiselle Annette had not been at all aware that for one full minute at least she had been intently, perhaps admiringly, regarded through the open door. Lieutenant Hjalmar had come into one of the adjacent rooms, and when introduced into one room of a Swedish dwelling, you generally have a view of others. He stood and looked at the young girl, sunk in deep and serious meditation, and looking so unlike his pretty and lively partner of the evening before. Never had she seemed so pretty in Hjalmar's eyes, and never had she felt so dear to his heart. "How lovely she is! how sweet, how earnest, while she sits there alone, communing with her own good heart! Yes, with such a face, such a brow, such eyes, there must be a heart: she cannot be trifling, worldly, ambitious."

Now, had good Lieutenant Hjalmar pursued his reflections for five minutes instead of one, he might possibly have acted less precipitately than he did; but just at that instant Annette, starting away from the thought, or the word, that brought a blush to her cheek, looked up to meet the very eyes whose expression dwelt continually in her mind, regarding her just as if asking if such indeed were the current of her thoughts. Hjalmar advanced, making one, two, three, profound bows. He could not enter the room where she sat; but her extreme confusion, her deep blushes as she came tremblingly forward to meet him, her sudden, involuntary exclamation, showing that he himself had been the subject of those "communings with her own good heart," which he imagined made her look so full of sensibility and loveliness, — this pushed the lieutenant's resolution to the point; and forgetting the caution, the reserve, he meant to practise, he seized her hand, exclaiming: "Annette, dear Annette, let me speak to you; I have longed, anxiously longed to do so." Tears dropped from Annette's downcast eyes, and fell down her burning cheeks; it was well they did so, or surprise and emotion would have overcome her. Hjalmar loved her; Hjalmar asked her to be his wife; and — she consented. This was the way in which she understood his eager request to be allowed to speak. A faltering "Yes" was pronounced in answer to that request, and she could have wept many tears upon his breast, for her doubts, her fears were over.

But Hjalmar's mind had stopped far short of Annette's conclusion. He was anxious to speak with her, for he had long desired to give her a brief history of himself; but he had intended to do so more cautiously, and in a manner that should ascertain what her own mind was on a subject of doubt and anxiety to him. He had only led her into the outer room, when the door of the great salong opened, and Mrs. Accountant Miller, who had been hurrying out to receive him, entered it with a troop of visitors, who had just encountered her. By the barbarized word salong, for the French word salon, is meant the large and more public room of a Swedish dwelling, round which the other apartments usually congregate; it is the room of first entrance, and generally commands a view of some others, so that privacy in such a home is nearly unattainable. The young couple sat on thorns for the space of nearly half an hour; but the visitors seemed not at all conscious that they had given them the thorns to sit on. Their stay was the more provoking, because the lieutenant had to announce that some military duty called him out of town that afternoon, and he should be absent for a week or ten days. He looked at Annette when saying this, as if he would imply that his half-told tale must remain in that unsatisfactory state until his return; and then he rose, to make a great many bows, and retire.

Annette's cheeks were very red; but when her blue eyes glanced for one instant at his, they grew bluer and darker than before; for a whole stream of love and hope and happiness poured over her heart, and those pretty eyes were suffused by emotions that deepened their color.

And Lieutenant Hjalmar went on his way, strong in hope, and deeply in love. He loved Annette truly, passionately; but he loved her as a man ought to love; he would not, if he could, make her his wife, unless he knew he could make her happy in all respects, even by means of his circumstances and position in life; neither would he make her his wife, unless he was persuaded she possessed the qualities calculated to render him permanently happy. He had had doubts in each of these cases. The truth is, that Lieutenant Hjalmar, elegant, polished, fascinating, as Annette considered him — as indeed others as well as Annette might consider him — was himself a peasant's son. It is true his father was no longer poor, and had already been twice elected to serve as member in the Peasant's House of the Swedish Parliament; thus he bore the highly honorable title of Rix-man, or Parliament-man, conferred on all such members for the term of their natural lives, and by which they are always addressed. But though this was the case, he lived just as peasants do: he worked for his daily bread, and his good wife did so likewise. They were a worthy couple, and brought up their son well; spared no cost to advance him in life, and now were reaping the reward of their parental care and love, in the honest pride they felt in seeing him. Lieutenant Hjalmar loved and honored his parents; it was still his greatest happiness to visit them in their humble but comfortable home, and to roam with his good father through the fields, where he had often worked at his side when a child. Hjalmar's wife must love and honor these good parents, even as he himself did; without this, she could not make him happy; and this was the doubt he felt when he gazed on pretty Annette, and felt his love for her growing stronger and stronger the longer he knew her, and the more frequently he was in her society. People chose generally to say, that the adopted daughter of Accountant Miller was the child of noble parents; there was some mystery about her birth, and they solved it thus. Annette, at times, was changeable. On some occasions, warm sensibilities, simplicity, and generous feeling, would raise his love almost to its climax; at others, an air of haughtiness, a contempt for lowly life, an extreme tenacity in the observance of all the usages of what is termed good society, would cause it to sink to a lower point than it had been at before. Then he went to see her, thinking it should be his last visit; that it should determine him in his belief that Mademoiselle Annette was quite unsuitable to his peasant parents, and, consequently, not suited to himself; but he came away rather more in love than ever. He had long wished to speak to her of his own life, his circumstances, his parents, and resolved to do so without declaring his love. He had been thrown off his guard in his first address, when such an unlooked-for opportunity presented itself; but he should soon have recovered his self-possession, and Annette might have been saved from falling into a great error, had not that ill-timed interruption broken up their conference, and prevented the very sensible discourse he had meditated. Still he went on his way in hope and love, for he felt he was loved; and with such a conviction, was it possible not to hope — to hope all things!

V. — THE OLD HOME IN NORRLAND.

How goes everything up there in the old red wooden house, on the edge of the fir-forest in Norrland! The new-settler had gone on well; the cleared land had become productive; old Jacris possessed three cows and a horse, besides his reindeer; there was no want, no poverty, in the red wooden house; there was a good deal of industry, and industry had its reward. Some Stockholm traveller had at first brought tidings there of the child that had left it; the parents had heard how well, how happy, how charming, their little Anna was; and the mother had wept — whether tears of joy or of sorrow, no one said which — and Anders had laughed, and said the wooden spoon would be well silvered; and the father had looked grave, but remained silent.

The girl, however, did not write to them, and it was now long since they had ceased to hear anything of her. Mrs. Accountant Miller was jealous of every shadow of doubt existing as to the reality of her own mothership; she wished to forget that another possessed a truer claim, and therefore she never dreamed of reminding the adopted girl that any love or duty was owing to the peasant parents who dwelt away in the far north. The Accountant, indeed, had given her the picture of her childhood's home; but that was only an evidence of the sentimental turn which forms, more or less, a part of a true Swedish character, and which caused him to be rather pleased than otherwise to see that the girl still preserved some sentiment regarding her childish days — still possessed some love for that wild northern nature which she saw no more, but the whisper of whose silent forests she still heard in her secret heart, where the picture impressed in childhood's early hours was yet distinct, and perpetually appeared, even amid the allurements of artificial life, bringing up thoughts of pain, because bringing thoughts of a home she now wished to abjure.

But the old house-father, the hardy, laborious Jacris, died. Anders was now its head. A short time after the funeral, the old mother said to him: "But I know not how it is; I never can cease thinking of my little girl. Certainly she is happy; but surely she also thinks of her home — she must long after her parents."

"God knows, mother," said Anders, "it seems she has forgotten us altogether."

"Nay, Anders, that is impossible. God has not bound up family hearts so loosely. Do you know, Anders, I wish to see little Anna once more before I die! Dear heart! I cannot die before that; so much do I know."

"Well! but it is a long way off, and mother cannot go alone."

"Nay, that is understood; but you may find some goods to carry down there, and then I can accompany you."

"But, mother, if I were now to find you a good and kind daughter, who would take care of you in old age, and be altogether in Anna's place! You need not, in that case, undertake this journey."

"A daughter, Anders! How can that well be?"

"Yes — I think mother guesses."

"What then!"

"That I will marry."

"Marry! a child like you marry!"

"A child of twenty-one years, mother, can well give you a good daughter."

"Well — yes. Anna I may certainly never have again; still, she is always my child; and how that was — though God bless thy father where he lies! it never was quite the same between us after he left the girl down there."

"But it was for her own good."

"Yes; but I am the girl's mother, and God has not forbidden a mother to miss her child. There is no use in setting a strange branch in an old tree; that I said many times to Jacris; and though he cast it to the winds, it came at the last to his heart."

"That I never could remark," said Anders.

"But see now, Anders; I know that better. Yes, see now; the night before he died, when I thought he slept, he called me to him, and said: 'I can get no peace if you think I did wrong in leaving the girl down there. Perhaps now, in pride and overabundance, she may lose her eternal salvation. But, mother, tell me now, you believe also that I did that for the best?' What could I do but say the comfort-word! If he did wrong, he shall have no hard doom for that; for he meant well, and God looks at the intention, and not at the result."

"We shall think of this, mother—we shall think of it," said Anders, and clapped his mother on the shoulder; "for thou shalt not lie there and say so, when thou shalt come one time to die."

"God bless thee for that word, Anders; and so can I say to sainted Jacris when we meet there up; thou wert always a good boy. And so it is Hilda, Henrik's daughter, thou wilt have!"

"Yes, mother."

"And she has two cows, and a good fifty six-dollars beside!"

"Yes; but the best of it is, that she is a good and industrious girl."

"Yes, yes, my son. And we shall travel to see Anna, good Anders!"

"Yes, mother, if you wish that."

"Thanks, Anders, thanks. Thou wilt not marry for a year to come, I think!"

"Not unless you want a daughter sooner, good mother."

"Wait, wait a bit, good Anders," said Gumman Jacris.

VI. THE OLD MOTHER FROM NORRLAND.

"You have not, then, forgotten me? You have not quite forgotten the old mother in Norrland!" said a little, elderly peasant woman, gazing with tearful eyes into the pretty face before her.

"Nay, mother, nay; certainly not, mother dear," was Annette's reply. "Certainly not; but—yes, mother knows, mother can well understand, that the Accountant does not like"—

"Nay, Heaven keep us, child! No need to say that; he need not fear; I came not here to prevent your happiness, or to take you from your fine friends. No, even if you despised me, Anna—so that you were happy; but that you could not do—no, no; you could not despise your poor mother."

Annette was moved. "Despise you! No, dear mother, that can never be." She pressed the good woman's hand. "Mother will not think so; that were sinful, miserable in me. Despise my mother! No, no!"

The mother held the small fine hand in her dry fingers, and smiled and nodded her head. "Yes, I knew that. Anders said otherwise, but I did not believe him. Anders said—know you what he said, Anna!—he said you were the wooden spoon that wished to be a silver spoon, and so must have got a lump of lead in the heart. Do you feel any lead in the heart, child?" Annette trembled. "Nay, nay; there is no lead there. Anders was altogether wrong."

"Anders was right," thought Annette: "the lead is here." She would not say so, but she felt that, like the silvered spoon, she had only an imaginary value. She trembled lest the reality should appear; and, as she trembled, the lead was felt within. The girl cast herself on her mother's breast, and wept. Ah, if she had lain there longer! lain there till the good and wholesome feelings then awakened had ripened into steady and fixed principle—or, rather, until they had turned back into the principle implanted in her heart by God himself, when she lay first upon that mother's breast.

"Grieve not, my child—grieve not, my little Anna," said the mother soothingly.

Those words, "Little Anna," it was so long since she had heard them! In a moment the whole circumstances returned—the house of the Norrland new-settler, the rude employments, the coarse dresses; she looked at her mother's—the decent silk handkerchief plainly tied over her head; the homespun woollen gown; the thick wooden-soled shoes. She thought of Hjalmar—the handsome, elegant young officer—if he were to see that good woman, and know she was Annette's mother—if he should return before her departure! Annette raised herself from her mother's neck; she resolved to be reasonable, to act sensibly. The sudden change chilled the old woman's kindly affections; her "Little Anna" was now "Mademoiselle Annette" again—the reasonable, advising, sensible Annette. She spoke reasonably, sensibly, very sensibly indeed, to her poor mother; every word fell cold and chill, and convincing upon the good woman's heart. She was persuaded, or said she was persuaded, that all Annette said was right: it was much better she should not come to visit her daughter—much better that she should leave her quite to herself. They might write to each other, they might think of each other. Annette might—yes, it was just possible that she might soon marry, and then—but they must wait; and, meantime, the sooner mother travelled home the better—the better for both. And so Annette loaded the old woman with a quantity of fine little things, which certainly had no value in the estimation of the receiver, except that they were given to her by her only daughter.

And the peasant mother from Norrland went obediently away, leaving a thousand blessings on the head of her pretty daughter, and on those of the second parents who had brought her up so well — so grandly, at least, she added; and taught her a whole heap of beautiful things. The Accountant and his wife took a hearty leave of the good old creature, and were delighted to see how content and thankful she was, and how clearly she understood their conduct.

Just that sort of commendation they bestowed on her mother, hurt Annette the most; she felt what they did not perceive — namely, that the mother, full of self-sacrificing love, had appeared satisfied with all that was satisfactory to her child.

"She has gone away quite content," said the Accountant, rubbing his hands.

"Now you are mine, wholly mine!" said Mrs. Accountant, embracing her foster-daughter. "The old woman from Norrland has quite given you up." Now the lead made itself felt in the heart of the silvered spoon. Good Mrs. Accountant saw the shade on the young brow. "But, dear heart! I forgot. There is an invitation to President K——'s for Friherrinan's name's-day. It will be quite a festival, and a ball in the evening."

Annette looked up. "A fête at the president's! that will then be a most brilliant society!"

"Yes, child," whispered the foster-mamma; "and between ourselves — let it be between ourselves — Papa Miller and I said, when the invitation came, little Annette shall go there. Poor little Annette! she requires some restorative after these trying days. So papa went himself to get something quite new. Well, child, be not curious; you shall soon see."

In the evening came Accountant Miller, and brought a beautiful dress and some new ornaments. Annette forgot her troubles, her home, her mother; she forgot all but one thing — her love. In the fulness of her heart, she whispered it to her foster-parents; she told them of Hjalmar's; she obtained their consent. The lieutenant was not rich, but his partly self-elected bride would not be poor; and good-heartedness, and a little sentiment, influenced both the manner and conduct of our worthy Accountant, when called upon so unexpectedly to act the father's part on so important and interesting an occasion.

VII. THE PRESIDENT'S FÊTE.

It was the morning of the president's fête — a fine, bright winter morning. The roads were in good sledging order; the snow lay deep and hard. There was to be a sledging-party out to the royal domain of Drottningholm, a dinner there, and a dance at home in the evening. The dance was a matter of course; but it was to be a day of pleasure, to Annette at least, for Lieutenant Hjalmar was to come to Stockholm purposely for the occasion, and was to drive her in an open sledge to Drottningholm — an island in the Mälar, where the king of Sweden has a palace, and the people of Sweden have a good many restaurants. The plan was arranged by the gentleman who acted as master of ceremonies on the occasion, and who happened to be a friend of both parties. Annette was ready dressed, in a very pretty and becoming winter costume. It wanted still an hour to the time fixed for setting out; but Hjalmar had written to the Accountant, to say he would call some time previously, in order to "solicit leave to conduct Mamzell Miller in his sledge." Now, this "solicitation" was looked on by all the party as a mere harmless artifice; they every one thought the solicitation would have another object. "To conduct Mamzell Miller through the journey of life," said the Accountant, and laughed at his own wit. Annette opened the square of glass which is sometimes made to open in the winter double windows of Sweden. The Accountants were terrified at the rash experiment. She quickly pulled in her head again. Though the day was fine, the sensation is not agreeable when a head is projected from the amazingly warm rooms into the clear cold air. A sudden memory crossed the girl's mind; there was another, a very different sledging-party moving onward that day; a drive on such a day would be pleasant, a journey very trying; and her mother, her aged mother, was travelling homeward, her long and dreary way, through snowy forests and frozen lakes, back to the house which she had not left from the time of her marriage until she left it to travel down to Stockholm to see her child. That child thought of the wearisome days, the long cheerless nights, her mother must pass on her road, and she shuddered; a pain shot to her heart — she tried to think of something else.

The Accountant thought she was impatient, and remarked that she was ready too soon; that people were never so precise — an observation which Mrs. Accountant corrected, by reminding him that he used always to be before the appointed hour when he came to see her before their marriage. The Accountant admitted the charge; and while some tender memories of five-and-twenty years ago were thus awakened, and brought tears into the good man's eyes, and plump Mrs. Accountant clapped him, after the Swedish fashion, and said; "Dear thou! dear thou!" the foster-daughter sat plunged in thought, in which anticipated pleasure tried hard to overcome a repressed but ever-awakening sense of pain and remorse.

Nearly at the appointed time, not too late.

—a wonderful thing for a Swede—and certainly not too early, Hjalmar arrived. He looked perhaps a shade graver—more earnest than usual; there was nothing of elation, eagerness, scarcely any perceptible tenderness in his manner. Mr. and Mrs. Accountant were surprised, and not altogether pleased; Annette, however, was satisfied, and deeply happy. When the lieutenant took her hand, and looked into her eyes, she felt that she held his happiness in her keeping—that his gravity, his earnestness, arose from the fact that he had come there more than ever determined to seek it only from her. She was not wrong; consideration had deepened both Hjalmar's love and fears. That he loved Annette, with all her defects of character, more than he should probably ever love another woman, he was more thoroughly convinced; that he would not marry her, even if she would marry him, unless he found in her a mind accordant with his own views of life, and his own position in society, he was still more resolved. With such a state of mind his manner accorded; but that manner was rather perplexing to the worthy Accountant and his wife—his better-half in most senses. His most hearty, father-like reception had been ready; her part, as the gracious, yet dignified mamma, had been prepared; but somehow there was something so unlike the son-in-law expectant in the manner and address of young Lieutenant Hjalmar, that the parts of the kind consenting parents were involuntarily suspended, and the actors only felt confused and awkward, not knowing exactly how to fall in with the unexpected changes that had been made in the piece. They were each silently ruminating on the propriety of retiring for a few minutes from the scene, until the hero and heroine had decided on the plot, when, somewhat to their relief, and to Hjalmar's annoyance, an almost unknown visitor entered the room. It was a little, fat elderly lady, made almost as broad as she was long with wadded petticoats; who, having deposited a variety of outer clothing in the Tambour, or entrance-hall, came courtesying, apologizing, speaking very humbly, and looking very important, into the salong, where the party sat. It is rather disagreeable to enter a room where people are comfortably seated on sofas and chairs, and casting a surprised and inquiring glance at the intruder. Lieutenant Hjalmar was the only one of the party who spoke to the visitor, for he was slightly acquainted with her, and greeted her by name.

"I have not the honor"—said Mr. Accountant.

"We have not the honor"—repeated Mrs. Accountant.

"I have not the honor of being acquainted here," said the little woman, taking up the speech herself.

Annette took on herself the office of hinting, that Mrs. Accountant wished to know why she had the honor of a visit from Kaptenska Weinberg.

Yes, that was soon told; Kaptenska had called with compliments from mamzell's mother. Annette turned pale as death. Yes. Kaptenska was now sorry that she had not made the dear mamzell's acquaintance sooner; but the dear mamzell would certainly know, that she never could have guessed that Karin Jacris was the dear mamzell's mother. Yet so it was that Jacris, Mamzell Annette's sainted father, had lived as farm-servant with her sainted* husband, when the sainted Weinberg was Kaptens of a land-regiment in Norrland; and Karin—a good, kind, sweet little human being—had nursed her daughter, who thus proved to be Mamzell Annette's own foster-sister;—and—she would not just say it of her own girl—but the sainted Weinberg used to say, that Karin Jacris—

The Kaptenska's disclosures were interrupted by a deep sigh or sob. The dear mamzell fainted! Poor Kaptenska! She had long desired to get acquainted with her neighbors, the rich Accountants, who had such pleasant parties, to which her daughter might be invited; and when "the old Karin from Norrland," never imagining that Annette kept her birth and origin a profound secret, had called to see her old mistress on her way home, and had drunk coffee with her, and related to her the cause of her long journey, and told her the wonderful history of her beautiful child, the admired Mamzell Miller, her astonishment was only equalled by her delight; she beheld the door of Accountant Miller's house at once opened to her and to the foster-sister of their adopted daughter. It is customary among the Swedes, when they have met with a friend of the person they visit, to present that friend's compliments, although they have not been sent; so Kaptenska Weinberg felt no embarrassment in making her first speech. She was the friend of mamzell's parents; her sainted Weinberg had been a good master—she and her daughter must naturally be mamzell's good friends; and all that Kaptenska Weinberg had to do, was to lament that she had not known long before that the sweet mamzell's mamma was not Fru Kamreraka Miller, but good Gumman† Jacris.

Alas, the vanity of human expectations! Annette was laid on a sofa, and Kaptenska was almost turned out of doors by the enraged Accountant. Mrs. Accountant was nearly distracted; Lieutenant Hjalmar—calm, but very pale with apprehension, emotion, and an-uncertain sort of joy at finding his beloved was rather below than above the station of his own respected parents — hung over the arm of the sofa, wondering at the agitation that laid her there, at a loss to account for it, and unwilling, if he were able, to release the hand which Annette had almost convulsively clasped when he had caught her in his arms and carried her there. A burst of tears relieved her; the Accountant then drew the young man away, and the girl was left to weep her tears upon the bosom of the sympathizing and indignant Mamma Miller. Hjalmar gently pressed the hand that held his, as he drew it away. Annette felt and understood that pressure; it went to her heart; it redoubled her tears, but it did her good. She recovered; she sat up; she said to herself "Hjalmar will not change; his love will overcome all. Though I am in other eyes only a peasant's daughter, in his I shall be all I ever was — Annette Miller."

† Old woman—a term used to peasants

Ah, poor Annette Miller! while consoling herself thus, her lover, thrown into a great chair, was listening with an aching heart to the angry words and painful disclosures of the Accountant, who walked up and down the room, uttering words which were like death-strokes to the good lieutenant. It was not until the first ebullition of wrath and denunciation was over, that Hjalmar could clearly understand the language that pained him so deeply.

"Yes, that is all true; she is the daughter of these poor people up there in Norrland; she is ashamed of them — naturally. We have brought her up as our own; who has a right to come and say she is not so! She wishes to have no other parents; she denies them, looks down upon them — naturally. She is above them in all respects; poor little dear."

"She is ashamed of them!" said Hjalmar in a very deep-toned voice.

"Naturally. See now, my best lieutenant, I will conceal nothing from you — naturally, after what little Annette has let us understand. But see now, the girl has always passed for our own; we have educated her — how! that is not for me to say; you see what she is; certainly, she is not suited to these honest folk. What could she do up there in such a home as that! She could not put her foot within it. But what do you think! After more than eight years' separation, comes the old mother from Norrland — the father is dead, thank Heaven! — but the mother, it seems, cannot forget the girl, and away she must come down here to see her. You may think, my good lieutenant; poor little Annette! a mere good-natured, coarsely-dressed peasant woman, coming and calling her daughter, and wanting to embrace her, and weep over her, and make quite a scene; a girl who does not wish to have any parent but ourselves — no peasant parents at least! And here she sat, and held a long discourse to the girl about having God before her eyes, and not forgetting her eternal salvation, because the world was good and pleasant to her; just as if we had not brought up the child as well and religiously as we could. And she clung to us, and loved us so inwardly; she never could hear of that poor old home without shame. But now, the mother must come and disturb us all, saying she only wanted to see her child before she died — coming five hundred miles in mid-winter to see a girl who does not wish to have any parent but ourselves! Annette was anxious to get her off as quickly as possible — naturally; what could she do with her here! She could not present her even to the servants, and say; 'This is my mother — this worthy Gumman from Norrland.' So she gave her a little money, and sent her back again directly, she did not wish to have her here. That was most natural."

"Pardon me, best Accountant," said Hjalmar, when he came to a stop; "I cannot think it was most natural."

"The lieutenant, then, does not admire Annette's conduct?"

"That I cannot do."

"The lieutenant, then, does not love our girl so highly as she believes!"

Hjalmar's face blushed deeply. "I have never spoken of my love," he replied, "to her, to her foster-parents, to any one. I believed it was known to myself alone — its existence, its degree, its nature. I wish to speak to her; but it was of another, at least of a preliminary subject. With the Accountant's leave, I will now write to Annette; I will not now detain the Accountant longer from her."

Annette was better — her color had even returned. She came into the room, prepared still to go on the sledge-party, and expecting then to have a full explanation with Hjalmar, for which a drive in a sledge might afford a sufficiently convenient opportunity. After that pressure of the hand, she felt she could meet him as usual. So she came into the room; but Hjalmar had gone away. She was displeased at his precipitation; her sledgeing must be given up; but she would go to the president's ball in the evening; she would meet him there, and be very distant and cold towards him, and much more agreeable to her other admirers. She had no opportunity of thus revenging herself for the loss of her sledgeing-party; Hjalmar was not at the ball. Friherrinam K. had received his excuses; he was obliged to return to the place he had left.

To smile, to look pleased, to dance, with a load of lead in the heart — this cannot be very easy. In the heart of the silvered wooden spoon the lead had grown very heavy.

VIII. LIEUTENANT HJALMAR'S LETTER.

"BELOVED ANNETTE—For the first, the last time, permit me to call you so—my beloved. Yes, even now, are you truly, deeply beloved. But I write, not to ask you to return my love, not to ask you to be my own—my wife. That I can never do. Yet it may console you to know, that one heart has beat for you alone with emotions such as those which now almost overpower my reason and my purpose. Annette, I love you, passionately love you; but I love others also. I love and reverence the parents who watched over my childhood, who made my boyhood happy, who toiled hard to supply me with the means of improvement and advancement in my youth, who rejoice now with honest pride over the prospects of my manhood. These parents, Annette, are humble, hard-working, but independent peasants. Education and circumstances have raised me above them in the world's estimation, but not in my own; yet I also feel they have made a distinction between us; I feel—perhaps I should blush to say it—that good, estimable, worthy of love as she is, I could not choose for my wife a woman so plain, so unaccomplished, as is my own mother. I own this; yet I truly honor and love my mother; and never would I marry the most refined, the most charming of women, who could not do so likewise. How often have I gazed on you, Annette, when this thought has been in my mind, when I have been asking myself, could she despise my homely, humble parents? Would she feel ashamed of her husband's being a peasant's son? Ah, Annette, if such were your disposition, all your beauty, all your charms, even that sweet simplicity which at times—at times only—was apparent, and had so much fascination for me—all, all would be vain! Yes, so have I been thinking, when you have raised those pretty eyes, and I have seen that you felt the earnestness of my regards, and were perplexed by it. And when you have looked up so, I have forgotten all but my love. Again we have met; and some proof of vanity, love of the world, of its opinions and fashions, awoke my slumbering fears. At last love became too strong for silence, but not too strong for fear. I then resolved to trust in your sincerity, to speak to you of my own position, and to confide in the integrity of your nature, when, as I hoped, you should reveal to me something of your own heart in return. The moment for such confidence offered itself at one time when I was most off my guard. You know, however, how it was interrupted; but you never knew till now my motive in seeking it. It was not to declare my love; not to solicit yours; not to ask you to be my wife; but to let you know what my wife must be—to let you know that I was a peasant's son, and could only seek the love of one who would not scorn to be a peasant's daughter.

"Was it not well for us both, Annette, that that confidence was interrupted? Subsequent events proved how unnecessary it was—proved how loath you were to be a peasant's daughter—how loath you would be to be the wife of a peasant's son. When I heard that you, too, were a peasant's daughter, I rejoiced, for I thought our parents were equals. But I soon found—pardon me, still too dear Annette, it is with pain to myself I write the words—I found you denied, were ashamed of your own parents, despised your own mother! And I had hoped—blinded as I was by love—that you would honor, love, respect mine, even as I do myself.

"Now, then, still beloved girl, it only remains for me to bid you an everlasting farewell. I have promised myself never voluntarily to see you again; but I can promise you to think of you often, to pray for your good, and to desire, truly and fervently, that you may make another man happier than, I am now at last persuaded, you could have made me.

HJALMAR."

The lead had sunk deep, very deep; its weight was well-nigh insupportable in the heart of the poor silvered spoon. The furnace was ready.

Hjalmar received two lines in return for his long letter. They were these:—

"Only by one word you wrong me. That word is 'despised.' I have not 'despised my mother.'

ANNA."

"Anna!" said Hjalmar to himself, as, in spite of all his resolutions, he kissed the billet; "her name is Annette."

IX. TWO YEARS AFTER.

Two more years have passed. Two years can bring a good many changes—these two as well as any others. One or two of the changes we shall now mention. The first is a military one. The successor of sainted Weinberg, as captain of a land-regiment, is now a sainted somebody else to another mourning widow; and his official place is supplied by Lieutenant Hjalmar, who has for some two or three months been in possession of the "Kapten's Boställe"* in the same northern district. In Sweden, there is a sort of standing militia kept up, the soldiers and officers of which have land and houses for their pay—they unite the offices of farmers and soldiers. The navy also is supplied in the same way; and the men, who are liable at any time to be called on to serve in it, have their allotted dwellings on the coasts. A captain's boställe, or farm-house, is an object of no small ambition to an under-officer. A man so young as Hjalmar still was, might account himself peculiarly fortunate in attaining such a snug position. We shall look in at him now, and see what he is about in the Kapten's boställe. He is, at this present writing, sitting in the porch before his door, after dinner, engaged — notwithstanding his many virtues, we must confess it — in smoking. But no man is perfect. Kapten Hjalmar's eyes are so intently fixed on the vacant seat of the porch opposite to him, that one might imagine he is meditating the practicability of having a vis-à-vis in his delightful occupation; but men do look so uninteresting when they are puffing smoke in each other's faces — and the Swedes do so with such polite complacency — that I own I would rather see the other seat of that pretty porch occupied by some one who would prohibit the practice altogether. Whether the solitary Kapten knows what passes in his observer's thoughts or not, he appears to act somewhat in accordance with those thoughts; he rises, throws away the half-smoked cigar, as if resolving never to smoke another: the movement is so energetic, that he must be taking a resolution; and he goes into his house, calls the active young woman who, with her husband, forms its sole establishment — and telling her he is going northward to hunt, and will not be back for some days, slings a knapsack over his shoulder, takes his stick in his hand, and sets out towards the distant mountains, whose heads rise above the dark foreground of forest lying between them and him.

* Boställe—that is, the house and land allotted by government.

Captain Hjalmar is by no means a flighty or inconsiderate person; he said he was going to hunt: a horse is not required for that in Sweden, but a gun or dogs usually are, and Hjalmar has neither. In fact, a letter, which the Stockholm post brought him two hours previously, appeared to be more a necessary accompaniment to his hunting expedition than either of these; it was a mere lengthy scrawl from a brother-officer, who sent him the gossip of the capital to amuse his solitude. A Swede seldom thinks of riding except for a half-hour's gallop, just to tire a horse, and bring him in again. It answered the captain's purpose to go on foot, rather than to take his gig; but it was a tedious walk, more especially as, towards the close of the following day, a torrent of rain commenced. Evening had drawn on when he emerged from the gloom of the monotonous fir-forest, close to the banks of a pretty lake. On the opposite side stood a comfortable-looking red wooden house, at the back and one side of which were seen all the evidences of a tolerably thriving farm. The fire had been just kindled to dress the evening meal; the large logs crackled and sparkled on the open hearth, their blaze danced in the many windows, and through the open door revealed an inviting scene to the wet and weary pedestrian, who came slowly over the soft grass that lay between the house and lake. In this region, during summer-time, the words spoken of a better land may apply: "There is no night there." The light is not like that of the sun, nor yet of the moon: it is something between both — a light of poetry and dreaminess. But this evening a torrent of rain drew the mountain mists into the pretty vale, and the unusual gloom without rendered the interior of the red wooden-house more distinct, lighted up as it was by the blazing logs on the elevated brick hearth, while it concealed the person of the spy who, with the top of his stick pressed hard on his lips, stood seemingly breathless at the porch.

He saw the kitchen was occupied only by two women — an old and a young one. The first was preparing the supper; the girl was sitting at the spinning-wheel — an implement which, banished from other lands, finds refuge and employment in almost every Swedish home; the small hands and little feet were quite busily at work; but the pleasant hum stopped; and, looking towards the old woman as she bent over the hearth, the spinner replied to what had been said: "Yos, mother, it was hard, very hard at first, for you see I was not used to it; I had forgotten all the old ways, and I had learned a heap of things, and a great many habits, that were just of no use up here; and then, ack! yes, mother knows one must think sometimes; and perhaps I was a little dull, and seemed not quite as if I were at home here — but that goes better now."

"My heart's child!" said the mother, "thou hast always been good and kind, and clever too; and, going or staying, thou shalt have thy mother's blessing."

"But, mother, now that Anders is married, thou wilt not live here longer I think. Thou wilt come with me, mother, where I can do more than I can do here; I will work for thee then, and thou shalt rest."

"Ah, child dear, I thank thee — heartily do I thank thee; but see now, my girl, how this is: — Your sainted father brought me here when we first married; he was a good man to me, and a good father too. He died here, dear, and was buried not so very far off, in the parish church-yard. Now, if our Lord so please, I will die here too, and will be buried with him, where he lies in our church-yard — and so will I therefore live out my days here also."

"Then I will stay here too, mother — stay till God takes you to heaven," said the girl, and bent her head on the spindle, pressing her cheek on its soft burden, perhaps to wipe off a tear.

"God's peace!" said a rather husky voice, entering the door, with a salutation not yet quite out of fashion among the countryfolk of Sweden.

The old woman looked up to return it, and utter the customary word to the guest; "Be welcome." But the young one uttered a low cry, sprang forward, and Hjalmar's arms caught her to his breast. There were no questions asked, no explanations given; the kiss he pressed on her forehead told her all — she was beloved, forgiven, happy. To find her there was enough for him.

And wet, dripping wet, ran in Anders and his red-cheeked bride from their out-of-door employments, shaking their clothes, laughing, and complaining.

"But who have we here! Good-evening, good-evening; be welcome. But — now well! is it not our new Kapten from Björkdal?"

"Kapten!" said Anna, opening her eyes and looking at Hjalmar.

"Yes, and neighbor also, my beloved," he replied.

Anders stared amazingly at hearing the new Kapten apply the last word to his sister; he pulled his whiskers, looked odd, and ejaculated that all-signifying Swedish word "Jaså!" and then sat down to supper.

There is a good deal of room in a peasant-farmer's wooden house; but Anna slept that night by her mother's side, and "the new Kapten from Björkdal" slept well and soundly in her neat little chamber. When he left it at an early hour next morning, he found her in the kitchen preparing the coffee; Anders and his active wife had already been two hours abroad without that customary morning-cup.

"How early thou art out!" she said; "mother would have taken thee in coffee just now."

"Thou wilt give it to me thyself, my Annette, and then we will walk out together."

"My name is Anna, Hjalmar; I was baptized by that name; and now I am here again, I am also Anna again."

"Ah! that name stands here," he said, drawing out her two-line billet, which he had received more than two years before. "How often have I read these words, Anna!" — and he traced with his fingers the line, "I have not despised my mother" — "and each time I reproached myself with having caused them to be written, and each time almost repented of the promise I had made, never voluntarily to see thee again. Yet I would have kept that promise if I had not learned, only two days since, that thou wert no longer with the Accountant Miller. Hope whispered the truth, and I came to seek thee here."

The girl bent down her head; a tear fell on her cheek; it was kissed away.

"We will never talk of this again, Anna — never. Come, love, let us go out; see how charmingly beautiful it is out there!"

Anna tied the peasant girl's simple handkerchief over her head, and drew on her gloves. How pretty she looked with the soft black silk resting at the sides of her fair face — the bright glossy hair folded back so smoothly beneath it!

"Where are your curls, Anna?" Hjalmar asked, as they went out. "This pretty hair used to be all curls."

"Curls would ill become Jacris' daughter," she replied, with something between a smile and a sigh.

"But you must wear them again, dearest; I used to like these pretty curls so much! And a Kapteńska, you know, need not be quite a peasant-girl." The grave, earnest Hjalmar looked so smiling and so happy when he said this! But Anna blushed deeply. It was the first time that their marriage had been ever alluded to. The blush was understood. "Do you know, Anna, what was the first thought that came into my head this morning? Well, I must confess it. I thought how droll it was that I had never yet asked you to be my wife; that you had never consented; and it would be curious to be married without all that! I do not believe I ever yet asked if you loved me; I am sure you never yet told me you did."

Smiles dimpled her cheek, as, glancing for an instant up to his face, she asked in reply:

"Was it necessary, Hjalmar?"

Then Hjalmar told his companion how that letter from Stockholm, which he had carried with him from his boستälle, had contained, among other gossip, a story of pretty Mamzell Miller, who, after a serious illness, had disappeared from the capital, and never returned for the space of nearly two years, although the good Accountants persisted in saying, she had only gone to see some friends in Norrland, and would return at the end of that time.

And Anna told Hjalmar how, in that fearful illness, the first she had ever had, the consent of her foster-parents had been given to her returning for some time to her old and real home; but only on condition that when she came back to them — if she chose to come back — she should have no parents but themselves; she must have no more scenes with "the mother from Norrland."

They loved Annette truly and fondly; they could not bear to think of finally parting with her; but the truth was, that the house of the worthy couple had latterly witnessed more excitement and commotion than suited with their unromantic and steady-going lives. They attributed all this, from beginning to end, to the mother from Norrland; for they fancied the lieutenant had broken off with their Annette in consequence of Kaptenska Weinberg's intermeddling. Anna, believing that Hjalmar's letter was confidential, had never spoken of him more. To put an end to all this, they agreed that she should visit the old home, quite convinced that she would not remain there so long as she now thought. They thought it as well for her to be out of Stockholm, and freed from the unpleasantness of meeting Hjalmar at that time; and, in the firm belief that she would find the Norrland new-settler's house and life quite insupportable to her, they extended their liberality, and agreed that she might remain there, if she wished, even for the space of two years; provided that, at the end of that term, her decision should be finally made, and she should choose, for once and forever, whose she would be. She told him, moreover, how hard she had found it at first to reconcile herself to family manners and modes of life; how dearly her time had passed; how irksome her duty was. But how Anders, the good, rough brother, who was the good-natured torment of her childhood, and the dread of her fine-lady life — Anders, who had called her the silvered spoon, had been the one who contrived, without rubbing off the silvering, to get the lead out of her very heart. He smoothed her way; he considered her in all things; he submitted without affectation to her superiority, where she was superior, and yet made her feel herself of use to him at the time when he was really of use to her. He wanted to learn all that she knew or liked, and he ended in making her desirous to learn what he knew and liked better. In the end, Anna's natural good sense found out all this; the whole family became happier, for the good Norrland mother was happy when her beautiful child, who had been so "dreadfully grand," seemed to be less awkward and out of her element at home; and when Anna found that, from delicacy to her, the brother she had considered so rude, uncouth, almost uncivilized, had actually put off for a whole year the consummation of the wedded blessedness he contemplated with a good, round-faced, active, thorough-going girl of the neighborhood, all her childhood's love for him returned; and when love came to her aid, duty grew light.

So had she gone on in her Norrland home for nearly two years. But a hope had lain, as yet unextinguished, at her heart. Mr. Accountant Miller wrote, asking, in words, for her decision only, but evidently with a longing desire for her return. To go back to the Millers would be to go back to Stockholm; and Stockholm was still the land of hope to her. She resolved not to leave her mother; but at her entreaty Anders fulfilled his matrimonial engagement, and brought home his active, jocond bride. Then the poor girl thought she might realize her hope, and get her mother to remove with her. This, however, the mother had refused; and the alternative then lay between her own mother and her Norrland home, and Papa and Mamma Miller and Stockholm.

"And you had decided to be your own mother's, my Anna, just as I came in to ask you to be mine."

"Not to ask me, I think," the girl answered smiling.

"Well, to make you so."

The result of the morning's walk, and of a very long talk that took place on one of the many felled trees of the forest, was, first, that the consent and blessing of Gumman Jacris was to be demanded on their return to the house; next, that Anna should, as soon as possible, repair to Stockholm, accompanied by her mother, and there surrender herself to Mr. and Mrs. Accountant Miller, who must judge her as seemed to them right. If that judgment were favorable, which the girl felt sure it would be, she should remain under their protection until they surrendered her again to her husband. Anders and his wife should meet them on their return at the Kapten's boställe, and after spending some days with them, to celebrate the marriage, conduct the old woman back to the home where her husband died, and where she also, if it pleased her Lord, would die.

This plan was executed with a degree of despatch and precision quite creditable to such a slow-moving country as Sweden. Gumman Jacris gave her consent and blessing; and that very evening the ceremony of betrothal took place. Hjalmar thought it best it should be so, although there was some difficulty in getting a couple of rings for the occasion: this was managed, however, by the help of the old principle — where there is a will there is a way; and the day after, the young captain walked back to his boställe, and returned with the strong, but sufficiently comfortable carriage, in which he made his journeys. Travelling in Sweden is perhaps at all times pleasanter to natives than to foreigners; at all events, few of our readers have made a pleasanter journey in the far north than was made by Kapten Hjalmar, his betrothed, and the Gumman, whom they both now called mother. They journeyed all the way to Stockholm together. Anna returned to the charge of her foster-parents, only to be transmitted to that of her husband. Mr. and Mrs. Accountant Miller were more satisfied to part with her when she exchanged them for Kapten Hjalmar, than they would have been had she left them for Gumman Jacris: there was less of jealousy in the case, and the whole affair excited a degree of sentiment, which drew forth the tears of the excellent pair.

They acted well by their adopted child, and gave her a better dowry than either she or her husband expected.

When Kaptén and Kaptenska Hjalmar arrived at their neat and comfortable boställe, they found all in order for their reception, under the busy and anxious cares of Anders and his cheerful, laughing wife. Kaptenska ran eagerly through the rooms, delighted with them, and everything in them. But the kitchen was, in the estimation of the brother and sister-in-law, the charm of the whole house. This sight was reserved for the last; and, decorated as it was with flowers and green boughs, it looked really attractive. Anna was allowed to fly through the other apartments as she pleased, alone, when the rest could not keep pace with her; but in the kitchen the whole party must congregate, although the preparations for a great supper rather disarranged the elegance of its aspect. Every one uttered exclamations of admiration, and every one presented the usual bridal-gifts, to increase the household stores of the new beginners. Mrs. Accountant Miller had sent some house-linen, but promised herself still a whole year's occupation in preparing more, since poor Annette had never learned the art of weaving. The Accountant had given all the silver. Anders' wife brought a piece from her own loom, for the especial use of that "dreadfully beautiful" kitchen. But the jewel of all the bridal-presents was that offered by Anders himself. "See, dear thou — that is, I should say, Fru Kaptenska — see," he said.

"Fru Kaptenska!" cried the happy bride, laughing, and clapping her rough but good-hearted brother. "But what is this, Anders? — no, really! a wooden spoon! Ah, good brother, is there lead in the handle?"

"Nay, little sister; nay, my dear Anna, it is not silvered. It is like thyself — a true, common, beautiful, wooden spoon."

"Thanks, kind good brother. Thanks, Anders. Trust me, it shall never be silvered; it shall ever remain just what it is, and what it appears to be — nothing more, and nothing less."

"And my wooden spoon," said her husband, as his arm encircled the speaker, "is as precious to me as any silver one, for it is most excellent of its kind."

HOW A TRUE POET IS MADE.

THE bird, when ripe, will soar and sing;
The bard, when grief matures his mind,
Will from his heart's heaped treasures bring
Thoughts fit to teach his Adam-kind;
And, set to music, they will turn
To strains the willing crowd shall learn.
But not till then — oh! not till care
Hath stared him sternly in the face,
Hath fettered him to red despair,
That scorches with a fierce embrace —
Oh! not till then can poet give
The song by which his fame shall live.
We learn to sing, as nightingales
Are said in Eastern tales to do;
To many a cross by cruel nails
Our spirits must be bound, ere, true
To poesy and nature, we
A rose's grace can sing, or see.
Then haste not thou, who in thy soul
Ambitious art of minstrel's meed —
To woo the prophet's strange control,
To gauge the depths of human need;
For thou shalt, if a poet born,
Learn all too soon how crowns are worn.
With heavy brows, and aching hearts,
Our anadems we wear, for they Bear that around them which imparts
A spiritual suffering night and day;
A sense to see, a touch to feel,
Sorrows where no skill to heal.
Yet grief, yet pain, may visit all,
Though few possess the poet's power
To bid soft strains of music fall,
That soothe man's dark and moody hour;

We may not pity him who hath
One song to cheer his onward path.

But, poet, if thy lesson well
From trial and from pain thou 'st taken,
I need not teach thee what the spell
By which their influence may be shaken —
I need not tell thee what the Book
In which for comfort thou must look.
Not praise of men, not laurels bound
By beauty's fingers on thy brow —
Not all the charms that throng around
The circle where fame's torches glow —
Can chase a pang, or change a sin,
Or make a healthy life within.

When thou hast learned thy hymns to raise
To God — whose book thy harp beside Shall teach it such high chants of praise
As soar beyond all human pride —
Then, Christ thy theme, and love thy creed,
Thou shalt a poet be indeed!

CALDER CAMPBELL.

MAN'S DEGENERACY.

'Tis not that Nature changes, nor the clime
Its vigorous influence loses, nor the place
That fostered once a haught and hardy race,
Its temper casts, the sweet and the sublime
Shedding for the decrepitude of time.
But 't is the men degenerate, and disgrace
Their nobler fathers, their great deeds deface,
And crouch and grovel where their sires would climb.
Athens and Rome have still the self-same sky
That on Themistocles and Scipio shined;
But their posterity have lost the eye
Of power, the daring hand, the aspiring mind.
The eagle's nest, the eaglets thence expelled,
Is by the craven and the kestrel held.

From Household Words.

RECEIVED, A BLANK CHILD.

THE blank day of blank, received a blank child.

Within a few weeks, this official form, printed on a piece of parchment, happened to come in our way. Finding it to be associated with the histories of more than twenty thousand blank children, we were led into an inquiry concerning those little gaps in the decorous world. Their home and head-quarters whence the document issues, is the Foundling Hospital, London.

This home of the blank children is by no means a blank place. It is a commodious, roomy, comfortable building, airily situated though within advertisement distance of Temple Bar, which, as everybody knows, is precisely ten minutes' walk. It stands in its own grounds, cosily surveying its own shady arcades, its own turf, and its own high trees. It has an incredible fishpond behind it, no curious windows before it, and the wind (tempered to the shorn lambs within) is free to blow on either side of it. It preserves a warm, old-fashioned, rich-relation kind of gravity, strongly indicative of bank stock. Its confidential servants have comfortable places. Its large rooms are wainscoted with the names of benefactors, set forth in goodly order like the tables of the law. Its broad staircases, with balustrades such as elephants might construct if they took to the building arts, not only lead to long dining-rooms, long bedroom galleries, long lavatories, long school-rooms and lecture halls, for the blank children; but to other rooms, with listed doors and Turkey carpets, which the greatest English painters have lent their aid to adorn. In the halls of the blank children, the Guards forever march to Fenchley, under General Hogarth. Deceased patrons come to life again under the hands of Kneller, Reynolds, and Gainsborough. Nay, the good Duke of Cambridge himself, in full masonic paraphernalia, condescends to become a stupendous enigma over the chimney-piece of the smallest of the blank infants who can sit at dinner. Under the roof of the blank children the Royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture was originated. In the chapel of the blank children there is a noble organ, the gift of Handel; from whose great oratorio, The Messiah — also his munificent contribution for their benefit — their hospital has received ten thousand pounds. There, too, the Church service is every Sunday performed at its best, with all the assistance of devotional music, yet free from the stage-playing of any ism, not forgetting schism. There, likewise, may be heard at this present time, if we may presume to say so, one of the least conventional, most sensible, naturally eloquent and earnest of preachers.

The knowledge of all these things accumulating in our mind upon the receipt for that blank child on the blank day of blank, induced us to look more curiously into the history of the Foundling Hospital.

In or about the Christian year one thousand seven hundred and twenty-two — a good old time, when England had had too much to do, through all the good old times intervening since the days of Pope Innocent the Third, to do anything whatever for Foundlings — in or about that year there dwelt in London the gentle sea-captain, Thomas Coram. Although the captain had made his fortune on the American plantations, and had seen sights in his day, he came out of it all with a tender heart; and this tender heart of Captain Coram was so affected by seeing blank children, dead and alive, habitually exposed by the wayside as he journeyed from Rotherhithe (where he had set up his retreat that he might keep a loving eye on the river) to the Docks and Royal Exchange, and from the Docks and Royal Exchange home to Rotherhithe again to receive the old shipmate, who was generally coming to dinner, that he could not bear it. So, the captain went to work like a man who had gone down to the sea in ships, and knew what work was. After conquering innumerable thorns and brambles, springing out into his path from that weedy virtue which is always observed to flower in a wrong place when nobody wants to smell it, Captain Coram found that he had got together subscriptions enough to begin a hospital for poor foundlings, and to buy an estate of fifty six acres — out in Lamb's Conduit fields then — for five thousand five hundred pounds. Little did the captain think that the whole amount of that purchase-money would ever come to be annually received back in rents; but so it is at this day.

Nineteen years after good Captain Coram's heart had been so touched by the exposure of children, living, dying, and dead, in his daily walks, one wing of the existing building was completed, and admission given to the first score of little blanks. At that time any person who brought a child was directed "to come in at the outward door and ring a bell at the inward door, and not to go away until the child is returned (diseased children were not admitted), or notice given of its reception. But no questions whatever will be asked of any person who brings a child, nor shall any servant of the house presume to discover who such person is, on pain of being discharged. It was further desired, that each child should have some distinguishing mark or token by which it might be afterwards known, if necessary. Most of these tokens were small coins, or parts of coins; sometimes an old silk purse was substituted; sometimes doggrel verses were pinned to the poor baby's clothes; once a lottery ticket was so received. The Hospital chronicles do not record that it turned up a prize—the blank child was true to its designation.

As the Hospital became more extensively known, the numbers of applicants were enormous. The outward door was besieged by women who fought and scratched their way to the bell at the inward door, and in these disturbances, as in all physical force proceedings, the strongest were successful. To put a stop to such scenes, the little candidates were then admitted by ballot.

In fifteen years' time, from the opening of the Hospital, the Governors found it necessary to apply to Parliament for assistance. It was conceded in such liberal measure, that it was thought all comers could henceforth be received. Nursing establishments were formed in various parts of the country, a basket was hung outside the Hospital gate, and an advertisement publicly announced, that all children under the age of two months tendered for admission would be received. The result was, that on the 2d of June, 1756, the first day of such indiscriminate reception, the basket at the gate was filled and emptied one hundred and seventeen times. Fraudulent parish officers, married women who were perfectly able to maintain their offspring, parents of depraved and abandoned character (unconsciously emulative of Jean Jacques Rousseau), basketed their babies by thousands. It is almost incredible, but none the less true, that a new branch of the carriers' trade was commenced. Baby-carriers undertook to convey infants to the all-embracing basket, from distant parts of the country, at so much per head. One man who had charge of five infants in baskets got drunk; and, falling asleep on a bleak common, found when he awoke that three of the five were dead. Of eight infants consigned to a country waggoner, seven died before he got to London; the surviving child owing its life solely to its mother, who followed the wagon on foot to save it from starvation. Another man, established in business as a baby-carrier, with a horse and a pair of panniers, was loud in his complaints of an opposition man, "who," said he, "is a taking the bread out of my mouth. Before he started, it was eight guineas a trip per child from Yorkshire. Now, I've come down a third; next week I must come down another third; that's the way trades get ruined by over-competition." At the time when he made this representation, he had eight children in his panniers. Many of these amiable carriers stripped off such poor clothes as the children wore, and basketed them without a shred of covering. It is related among the Hospital legends, as a remarkable instance of change of fortune, that a few years ago a rich and aged banker applied to search the register of the establishment for such information as it might afford of his own origin, when all he could learn was, that he had been taken out of the basket stark naked. That was his whole previous history.

During the three years and ten months of the existence of this system, there were dropped into the hospital-basket fifteen thousand children; and so great was the difficulty of providing for such an enormous influx, and so little were the necessary precautions understood, that only four thousand four hundred of this large number lived to be apprenticed. So the practice was discontinued, and, Heaven knows, with reason! It is melancholy to think of the regrets and anxieties of the gentle Captain Thomas Coram under all these failures, and more melancholy to know that he died a very old man, so reduced in circumstances as to be supported by subscription. But, though shipwrecked here the tender-hearted captain gained a brighter shore, we will believe, where even foundlings, who have never spoken word on earth, possess their eloquence.

What genius originated the next idea, we have not discovered; but the Hospital being poor again, as well it might be, some bold spirit proposed that every child that should be mysteriously presented with a hundred pound note attached, should be received. The Governors adopted the inspiration with success; and this most reprehensible practice actually continued until the beginning of the present century. In January, 1801, it was abolished, and the existing rules of admission were substituted. What these are, may be best described through our own observation of the admission of two children who happened to be brought there by two mothers while we were inspecting the place.

Each of the mothers had previously rung the porter's bell to obtain a printed form of petition to the Governors for the admission of her child. No petition is allowed to be issued, except from the porter's lodge; no previous communication with any officer of the Hospital must have been held by the mother; the child must have been the first-born, and preference is given to cases in which some promise of marriage has been made to the mother, or some other deception practised upon her. She must never have lived with the father. The object of these restrictions (careful personal inquiry being made into all such points) is as much to effect the restoration of the mother to society, as to provide for her child.

The conditions having been favorably reported on, the two mothers had brought their children, and had received, filled up, the form we quoted at the commencement of this paper.

Hospital for the Maintenance and Education of Exposed and Deserted Young Children. The blank day of blank, received a blank child. Blank, Secretary. Note—Let this be carefully kept, that it may be produced whenever an inquiry is made after the health of the child (which may be done on Mondays between the hours of ten and four), and also in case the child should be claimed.

Then they departed, and we saw the children.

One was a boy, the other a girl. A parchment ticket, inscribed with the figures 20,563, was sewn upon the shoulder-strap of the male infant, and a similar ticket was attached to the female infant, denoting that she was 20,564—so numerous were the babies who had been there before them. To meet these present babies, a couple of wholesome-looking wet nurses had been summoned from one of the nursing districts in Kent, by whom they were immediately borne into the chapel to be baptized. Here, at the altar, we found awaiting them, the steward, the matron, the schoolmaster, and the head nurse—fit representatives of the provision made for their various wants—who were to be their sponsors. The rite of baptism, impressively performed by the chaplain, gave the children the additional identity of names.

These names have been a fruitful source of minor difficulty. At the baptism of the first twenty, there was present at the ceremony, a contemporary record states, "a fine appearance of persons of quality: Ilis Grace the Duke of Bedford, their Graces the Duke and Duchess of Richmond, the Countess of Pembroke, and several others, honoring the children with their names, and being their sponsors." Persons of quality not being free from a certain tendency to play at follow my leader, which is found to run in vulgar blood, the early registers of the Hospital swarm with the most aristocratic names in the land. When the peerage was exhausted, the names of historical celebrities were adopted; it therefore behoves a Mark Anthony Lowell, or an Editor of Notes and Queries, to take this circumstance into account in "making a note of" the pedigree of a modern Wickliffe, Latimer, Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton, Bacon, Cromwell, Hampden, Hogarth, or Michael Angelo. Celebrated real names having, in process of time, been exhausted, the authorities had recourse to novels, and sent into the world, as serving-maids, innumerable Sophia Westerns, Clarissa Harlowes, and Flora Mac Ivors; innumerable hard-handed artisans, as Tom Jones, Edward Waverley, Charles Grandison, and Humphrey Clinker. Then, the governors were reduced to their own names, which they distributed with the greatest liberality, until some of their namesakes on growing up, occasioned inconvenience (and possibly scandal) by claiming kith and kin with them. The present practice is for the treasurer to issue lists of names for adoption; in which responsible duty he, no doubt, derives considerable comfort from the Post Office London Directory.

The two babies were then borne off into Kent by their respective nurses (each of whom gave a receipt for a deserted young child) with little packets of clothes, a few sensible admonitions from the matron, and the following document:

The Child blank, No. blank, is placed under your care by the Governors of the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL, and it is expected that you will pay such attention to the said Child as will be satisfactory to the Inspector. You will receive for the maintenance of the said Child Sixpence per day, which will be paid on the first day of each month according to the number of days in the month preceding.

Should you rear the said Child to the end of the first year, and pay such attention to it as shall be satisfactory to the Inspector, you will receive a gratuity of Twenty-five Shillings at that period.

For clothing the said Child (after the first year) you will receive allowances as follows, viz. :—

	£	s.	d.
Between the Second and Third Year,	0	14	0
" " Third and Fourth Year,	0	17	0
" " Fourth and Fifth Year,	0	18	0

For your trouble and expenses in coming to London for a Child you will receive Two Shillings from the Inspector, your coach-hire being paid by the Governors of the Hospital.

You are to be particularly careful in preserving this parchment, which you must return with the Child whenever it shall be sent up to the Hospital, or removed from you, and it is especially required that you keep the number of the Child always affixed to its person. If you neglect this, the Child will be taken from you.

When they should be old enough to walk, these two children would be returned to the Hospital, and placed in its juvenile department. Proceeding to visit the infant school, which was their future destination, we found perhaps a hundred tiny boys and girls seated in hollow squares on the floor, like flower borders in a garden; their teachers walking to and fro in the paths between, sowing little seeds of alphabet and multiplication table broadcast among them. The sudden appearance of the secretary and matron whom we accompanied, laid waste this little garden, as if by magic. The young shoots started up with their shrill hooray! twining round and sprouting out from the legs and arms of the two officials with a very pleasant familiarity. Except a few Lilliputian pulls at our coat-tails; some curiosity respecting our legs, evinced in pokes from short fingers, very near the ground; and the sudden abstraction of our hat (with which an infant extinguished himself to his great terror, evidently believing that he was lost to the world forever); but little notice was taken of our majestic presence. Indeed, it made no sensation at all.

One end of this apartment being occupied by a grade of seats for the little inmates, is used as a convenient orchestra for a band of wind instruments, consisting of the elder boys. These young musicians, about thirty in number, now made their appearance, and commenced the performance of some difficult Italian music, executed with so much precision and spirit, as amply to justify the expressions of commendation and surprise, which we found in letters addressed to their music-master by that admirable artist, Signor Costa, and by Mr. Godfrey, one of the band-masters of the Household troops. The ophicleide was made to emit sounds of tremendous volume and richness, by a boy hardly bigger than itself. The body of sound emitted in passages of Handel's Hallelujah chorus was no less full and sonorous than that we remember to have heard produced by the stalwart lungs of Mr. Strutt's band of blacksmiths at Belper.

A new supply of toys had just been brought into the room; and, during this performance, the juvenile audience were vigorously beating toy drums, blowing dumb horns and soundless trumpets, marching regiments of wooden infantry, balancing swinging cavalry, depopu-lating Noah's arks, starting miniature railway trains, and flourishing wooden swords. They were all sensibly and comfortably clothed, and looked healthy and happy. They were certainly under no undue restraint. The only hush that came upon the cheerful little uproar was when the chaplain entered. He came to take out the first clarionet (and he laid his hand on the boy's shoulder in a friendly manner which was very agreeable), who had attained the maximum age of fourteen, and was that day to be apprenticed to a lithographic printer. They went away together for some talk about his future duties, and he would receive, in common with all the other foundlings when they go out into the world, the following advice in print and parchment:—

You are placed out Apprentice by the Governors of this Hospital. You were taken into it very young, quite helpless, forsaken, poor, and deserted. Out of Charity you have been fed, clothed, and instructed; which many have wanted.

You have been taught to fear God; to love him, to be honest, careful, laborious, and diligent. As you hope for Success in this World, and Happiness in the next, you are to be mindful of what has been taught you. You are to behave honestly, justly, soberly, and carefully, in everything, to everybody, and especially towards your Master and his Family; and to execute all lawful commands with Industry, Cheerfulness, and good Manners.

You may find many temptations to do wickedly, when you are in the world; but by all means fly from them. Always speak the Truth. Though you may have done a wrong thing, you will, by sincere Confession, more easily obtain Forgiveness, than if by an obstinate Lie you make the fault the greater, and thereby deserve a far greater Punishment. Lying is the beginning of every Thing that is bad; and a Person used to it is never believed, esteemed, or trusted.

Be not ashamed that you were bred in this Hospital. Own it; and say, that it was through the good Providence of Almighty God, that you were taken Care of. Bless him for it.

Be constant in your Prayers, and going to Church; and avoid Gaming, Swearing, and all evil Discourses. By this means the Blessing of God will follow your honest Labors, and you may be happy; otherwise you will bring upon yourself Misery, Shame, and Want.

NOTE.—At Easter of every year, upon producing a testimonial of good conduct for the previous twelve months to the satisfaction of the Committee, you will receive a pecuniary reward proportioned to the length of time you have been apprenticed, and at the termination of your Apprenticeship, upon producing a like testimonial for the whole term thereof, the further sum of Five Guineas, or such smaller sum as the Committee shall consider you entitled to.

Although we inspected the school-rooms, the dormitories, the kitchen, the laundries, the pantries, the infirmary, and saw the four hundred boys and girls go through the ceremony of dining (a sort of military evolution in this asylum), and glanced at their school-life, we saw nothing so different from the best conducted charities in the general management, as to warrant our detaining the reader by describing them.

We thought, when the male pupils were summoned by trumpet to the play-ground to go through their military exercises — which they did, their drill master assured us confidentially, in a manner that would not disgrace the Foot-Guards — we had traced the entire history of the connection of a blank child with the Hospital. But, as we were leaving the building, a decently dressed woman made her appearance from the lodge, to announce to the secretary that "Joe" had arrived at the Diggings; that Joe had sent her a ten pound note, and expected to be able to transmit to the Institution a similar token of his regard in a very few weeks; that in a short time Joe intended to remit enough money to take herself (this was Joe's wife), their son, and their two daughters, over to join him, but that their eldest daughter being of age, and having a will of her own, refused to promise to go to Joe, because of another promise of a tender description which she had made to a worthy young ivory-turner whose name was not Joe. All of which we heard with a growing curiosity to know who Joe was; more especially as Mrs. Joe was in a state of great excitement and joy about Joe.

The explanation of this little family history was that out of a separate fund established in connection with the Hospital, Joe, an old foundling — although he had left the Hospital when very young to volunteer as a cabin boy in Lord Nelson's fleet — had, in common with some other of his school-fellows, been assisted through life with temporary loans of money, the latest of which loans had enabled Joe to seek another fortune (Joe, in the course of his career, had found and lost many fortunes) in Australia. This put us in an excellent humor for participating in the joy that there was over Joe. And we devoutly wished, and do wish, that Joe may find gold enough to provide for himself, Mrs. Joe, their son, their two daughters, and the ivory-turner; and that with love and gold to spare for the gentle memory of Captain Thomas Coram, he may have this line to himself among the donors on the wall of the boy's dining-room:

Joe, £500

Such is the home of the blank children, where they are trained out of their blank state to be useful entities in life. It is rich, and it is likely enough it has its blemishes. It certainly had once, when its chief officer was a master in Chancery; which animal is a sufficiently absurd monster for human reason to reflect upon, without being associated with blank children and a by no means blank salary. But from what we have seen of this establishment we have derived much satisfaction, and the good that is in it seems to us to have grown with its growth. Of the appearance, food, and lodging of the children any of our readers may judge for themselves after morning service any Sunday; when we think their objections will be limited to the respectable functionary who presides over the boys' dinner, presenting such a very inflexible figure-head to so many young digestions, and smiting the table with his hammer with such prodigious emphasis; wherein it rather resembles the knock of the marble statue at Don Juan's door, than the call of a human schoolmaster to grace after meat.

We happen to have had our personal means of knowing that in one respect the governors of this charity are a model to all others. That is, in holding themselves strictly aloof from any canvassing for an office connected with it, or a benefit derivable from it. Canvassing and electioneering are the disgrace of many public charities of this time; and, in all such cases, but particularly where the candidates are persons of education who have known a happier and better estate, we view the preliminary solicitation and humiliation as far outweighing the subsequent advantages, and believe there is something very rotten in the state of any Denmark that does not apply itself to find a better system for its government.

The interest which is now taken in works of mediæval art was demonstrated by the sale of the Collection of the late A. Welby Pugin, by Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson, on the 12th of February. The name of that distinguished artist had the effect of gathering a numerous company, and the prices given were proportionately high. A long range of saints carved in oak occupied a great space; but they were generally of an inferior style of art. The most precious objects were the carvings in ivory; most of which were bought by the Rev. Mr. Russell. Large prices were given for the Raffaele and Majolica ware, of which there were many fine specimens. Lot 87, the upper part of a fine brass, by the same artist as the St. Alban's specimen, of the fourteenth century, sold for 24*l.* 10*s.*; and lot 136, a silver diptych of the fourteenth century, representing the salvation and coronation of the Virgin, for 23*l.* 10*s.* The whole sale amounted to 429*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* Mr. Pugin's library had been previously sold, and produced 1,083*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* The "Microcosm," with Pugin's own drawings, was bought by Mr. Tite for 18*l.* — *Gent. From Bentley's Miscellany.

THE PRIVATE JOURNAL OF F. S. LARPENT, ESQ.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE ATTACHED TO THE HEAD-QUARTERS OF LORD WELLINGTON DURING THE PENINSULAR WAR.

If we cannot absolutely describe such a book as Mr. Larpent's "Journal" as a work of history, it is assuredly the next thing to it, for it supplies excellent materials of history. We do not know anything more serviceable to the historian than the Journals kept by intelligent English gentlemen attached to the army during an important period of a great campaign. Mr. Larpent joined the head-quarters of Wellington's army in 1813. He was sent out to fill the important office of judge-advocate-general, and was necessarily brought into frequent communication with the great soldier at the head of that varied force. The "Journal," therefore, is thickly strewn with anecdotes of Wellington, very illustrative of the character both of the leader and the man, of his personal habits, and of his conduct in the trying circumstances which often surrounded him throughout the Peninsular campaign. A few of these little snatches of personal anecdote and description we have marked for insertion. There are frequent notices in the "Journal" of Wellington's hunting exploits. The Duke never was a good sportsman, but we have an idea that something more than amusement was sought on those hunting days. Mr. Larpent says:—

Lord Wellington reads and looks into everything. He hunts every other day almost, and then makes up for it by great diligence and instant decision on the intermediate days. He works until about four o'clock; and then, for an hour or two, parades with any one whom he wants to talk to up and down the little square of Frenada (amidst all the chattering Portuguese) in his gray great-coat.

It may be doubted whether he would have got through so much work, and so well preserved the mens sana in corpore sano, but for those hunting days. Here is another bit of personal description. The idea suggested by Captain — is not a pleasant one, for it indicates what is commonly a characteristic of a little mind. The judge-advocate's repudiation of it is therefore a relief:—

He thinks and acts quite for himself; with me, if he thinks I am right, but not otherwise. I have not, however, found what Captain — told me I should, that Lord Wellington immediately determines against anything that is suggested to him. On the contrary, I think he is reasonable enough, only often a little hasty in ordering trials, when an acquittal must be the consequence. This, I think, does harm, as I would have the law punish almost always when it is put in force.

Here are some instances of Wellington's peculiar coolness and presence of mind. Those hunting days, doubtless, kept all the nerves well strung, all the muscles well braced.

Lord Aylmer gave me two striking instances of Lord Wellington's coolness: one, when, in a fog in the morning, as he was pursuing the French, he found a division of our men, under Sir William Erskine, much exposed in advance, and nearly separated from the rest of the army, and the French in a village within a mile of where he was standing. He could see nothing. But on some prisoners being brought in, and being asked what French division, and how many men, were in the village, they, to the dismay of every one except Wellington, said that the whole French army were there. All he said was, quite coolly, "Oh! they are all there, are they? Well, we must mind a little what we are about then." Another time, soon after the battle of Fuentes d'Honore, and when we were waiting in our position near them to risk an attack, to protect the siege of Almeyda, one morning suddenly and early Lord Aylmer came in to him whilst he was shaving, to tell him the French were all off, and the last cavalry mounting to be gone; the consequence of which movement relieved him entirely, gave him Almeyda, and preserved Portugal. He only took the razor off for one moment, and said—"Ay, I thought they meant to be off—very well;" and then another shave, just as before, and not another word till he was dressed. I find, however, it is said that he magnifies the French now and then; sees double as to the number of blue uniforms, and cannot see all the scarlet; but I believe that most men in his situation do this more or less.

The following is very delightful. It is characteristic both of poor Craufurd and the Duke.

I have heard a number of anecdotes of General Craufurd. He was very clever and knowing in his profession, all admit, and led on his division on the day of his death in the most gallant style; but Lord Wellington never knew what he would do. . . . On one occasion he remained across a river by himself—that is, only with his own division, nearly a whole day after he was called in by Lord Wellington. He said he knew he could defend his position. Wellington, when he came back, only said, "I am glad to see you safe, Craufurd." The latter said, "Oh, I was in no danger, I assure you." "But I was from your conduct," said Wellington. Upon which Craufurd observed, "He is—crusty to-day!"

The next, too, is very pleasant:

The day before yesterday, Lord Wellington ordered young Fitzclarence to go and bring up two Portuguese companies to the attack. He went. It was close by; but he was highly pleased with the order. When he had given the instructions, he saw a cherry-tree, and went up to break a bough off and eat the cherries. When Lord Wellington lost his way the other night in the fog (returning to head-quarters), Fitzclarence told Lord Wellington he was sure the road was so-and-so, as they had passed the place where they found the two Portuguese companies. "How do you know that?" quoth Lord Wellington. "By that cherry-tree, which I was up just afterwards," was the answer. It amused Lord Wellington much; and yesterday he called to him, with a very grave face, desiring him to go and get some of the cherries, as though it were an important order.

We have more than once heard the question discussed as to whether the Duke of Wellington was ever wounded in action. He was wounded at Orthes. Mr. Larpent says:

It was curious that Lord Wellington and General Alava were close together when struck, and both on the hip, but on different sides, and neither seriously injured, as the surgeon told me who dressed them. Lord W.'s was a bad bruise, and skin broken. I fear his riding so much since has rather made it of more consequence, but hope the two days' halt here will put him in the right way again, as all our prospects here would vanish with that man.

And, further on, the journal-writer gives these particulars. The anecdote is new and interesting:

I walked down to the bridge with Lord Wellington yesterday, and found him limp a little; and he said he was in rather more pain than usual, but it was nothing. At dinner, yesterday, he said he was laughing at General Alava having had a knock, and telling him it was all nonsense—that he was not hurt, &c., when he received this blow, and a worse one, on the same place himself. Alava said it was to punish him for laughing at him.

These anecdotes (and many more of the same kind might be cited) very fairly indicate the nature of the pleasant contents of these interesting volumes. In one respect they differ from all the journals of the Peninsular campaign which have come before us. Mr. Larpent was a civilian. He writes as a civilian; and, to a certain extent, therefore, we see the progress of the war from a novel point of view. The "Journal" was written merely for the perusal of private friends. Indeed, it comprises, we believe, a series of letters to the writer's mother. There is therefore a literal, inornate truthfulness about it, which brings all the daily incidents of the camp much more clearly before us than if the writer had designed a work of more elaborate construction, and had executed it in a more florid style. On the whole, we think it will be regarded as a very valuable contribution to the history of the Peninsular War.

THE LADIES' BATTLE.

It is fortunate, just now, that the ocean divides the ladies of England from the ladies of America; for, if they were in closer contact, they might forget the touching theory too often violated in practice, that

Their little hands were never made
To tear each other's eyes.

Throwing stones is not a pretty pastime for the gentler sex; and we regret to find our favorite, the British female, engaged in pelting—even with philanthropic missiles—our fair friend, the American lady, who, if the stone has been thrown at her, has certainly pitched it uncommonly strong in casting it back again. Perhaps there is much truth in what has been written by one to the other; but the very fact that there is a great deal to be said on both sides renders it advisable for females not to interfere, since, however much there may be to be said, it is certain that a great deal more will be said than necessary, if the female tongue has anything to do with it.

If our advice could be taken, we should recommend the parties to "make it up" at once; and if they would only consent to "kiss and be friends," as the operation cannot be performed in person, we should be most happy to accept the proxy of the American ladies, empowering us to imprint on the lips of our fair countrywomen the kiss of peace from their sisters across the Atlantic. Should the arrangement be carried out, we shall take measures for issuing orders, payable at sight, which will entitle the female holder to the enviable privilege. — Punch.

The jubilee of the British and Foreign Bible Society has been commemorated this week. A large meeting composed of members of the various religious denominations, the Quakers being especially prominent, was held in Exeter Hall on Tuesday. The chair was occupied by Lord Shaftesbury; on his right sat the Rajah of Coorg, in an Eastern dress, and the Duke of Argyll; on the left, the Earl of Carlisle and the Bishop of Winchester; and near these, the Reverend Hugh Stowell, the Reverend Dr. Duff, and the Reverend Mr. James. From statements made to the meeting it appears, that since the foundation of the society, fifty years ago, 8600 branch societies have been instituted; the Scriptures have been translated into 148 languages and dialects, of which 121 had never before been printed; upwards of 48,000,000 copies had been disseminated, among, it was computed, 600,000,000 of the human race; of the languages into which these copies had been rendered, upwards of twenty-five had existed hitherto without an alphabet, and merely in an oral form. The sum subscribed amounted to upwards of 7000*l.*, and hopes were expressed that it would be run up to nearly 10,000*l.* There were two donations of 600*l.* each and three of 1000*l.* On Thursday a jubilee sermon was preached in St. Paul's, by the Archbishop of Canterbury. — Spec.

FADELESS IS A LOVING HEART.

Thou shalt not rob me, thievish Time,
Of all my blessings, all my joy:
I have some jewels in my heart
Which thou art powerless to destroy.

SUNNY eyes may lose their brightness;
Nimble feet forget their lightness;
Pearly teeth may know decay;
Raven tresses turn to gray;
Cheeks be pale, and eyes be dim;
Faint the voice, and weak the limb;
But though youth and strength depart,
Fadeless is a loving heart.

Like the little mountain-flower,
Peeping forth in wintry hour,
When the summer's breath is fled,
And the gaudier flowerets dead;
So when outward charms are gone,
Brighter still doth blossom on,
Despite Time's destroying dart,
The gentle, kindly loving heart.

Wealth and talents will avail
When on life's rough sea we sail;
Yet the wealth may melt like snow,
And the wit no longer glow;
But more smooth we'll find the sea,
And our course the fairer be,
If our pilot, when we start,
Be a kindly loving heart.

Ye in worldly wisdom old—
Ye who bow the knee to gold,
Doth this earth as lovely seem
As it did in life's young dream,
Ere the world had crusted o'er,
Feelings good and pure before—
Ere ye sold at Mammon's mart
The best yearnings of the heart?

Grant me, Heaven, my earnest prayer—
Whether life of ease or care
Be the one to me assigned,
That each coming year may find
Loving thoughts and gentle words
Twined within my bosom's chords,
And that age may but impart
Riper freshness to my heart!

GOD BLESS YOU.

"God bless you!"—kind, familiar words!
Before my eyes the letters swim:
For—thrilling nature's holiest chords—
My sight with fond regret grows dim.
God bless you! closes up each page
Traced by the well-beloved of yore:
Whose letters still, from youth to age,
That fondly-anxious legend bore.

I heeded not, in earlier days,
The import of that yearning prayer:

To me 't was but a kindly phrase,
Which household love might freely spare ;
But now that grief strange power affords,
In these love-hallowed scrolls I find
Those earnest, pleading, sacred words,
With all life's tenderness entwined !

Now thou art gone (ah ! dark above Thy gravestone floods the winter rain),
And all the old, sweet household love
Fades into memory's silent pain.
On earth for me no human heart
Again will breathe those words divine :
But, sainted soul ! where'er thou art,
Thy angel-pleading still is mine.

ELIZA CRAVEN GREEN.

From Fraser's Magazine.

"ONE SWALLOW MAKES NO SUMMER."

Snowy blossoms deck the thorn, the birds are on the wing,
Freshly robed is Mother Earth to greet the joyous
Spring ;
Twining through the distant vale, the glancing stream is seen,
Like a thread of silver, in a garb of Lincoln green.
Early flowers from out their leaves are peeping,
one by one,
Grateful to the golden shower that falls athwart
the sun ;
Drifts upon the southern breeze the cloud of fleecy
white,
'Gainst it, flitting darkly, see the swallow's circling flight ;
Bid him welcome home, my child ! that herald
of the Spring ;
Yet believe no single swallow summer's prime shall bring.
Often thus a gleam of hope the trust of youth de-ceives,
Often thus its fading ray the sanguine spirit
grieves ;
Hours of gladness on our path steal ever and anon,
Ere the fleeting joy we strive to grasp — behold !
't is gone.
Brightly shines the sun to-day in calm and smiling skies,
Frowning in the tempest's wrath to-morrow's dawn may rise.
Youth is like the merry spring-time, all is fresh and new,
Fancy decks the starting bud with summer's promised hue ;
Fancy gives the way-side weed the perfume of the rose ;
Forward o'er the toilsome journey Hope her ra-diance throws ;
Showers of Spring are short and sudden, through them gleams the sun,
Tears of youth with smiles are mingled, dried ere scarce begun ;
Often nips an envious frost the blossom's opening joy,
Seldom ripened manhood crowns the wishes of the boy.
Noon of life is rich and bright, like summer's golden time,

Many a bud its flower hath borne, now blushing in its prime ;
Smiling on our outward world, Prosperity may glow,
Honor strew our path with laurels — are we happy ? No !
Look upon the garden-rose, that blooms so fresh and fair,
Shedding beauty on the sward, and fragrance on the air ;
Choicest gifts of scent and hue doth Nature on her pour,
Peep within the leaves, a worm is crawling at the core.
So for us may Wealth and Fame their choicest honors bear,
Still within the bosom lurks the canker-worm of care ;
More we covet, more we grasp ; yet craving, craving still —
Feels the immortal soul a void the mortal cannot fill ;
Ever striving, ever looking forward, life is past,
All unmarked, till startled by the Autumn's warning blast,
Wildly, like the wakened dreamer, how we gaze around !
Ripened fruits are falling, withered leaves are on the ground ;
Mournful wails the breeze, the skies are saddened, though serene,
Chastened is the parting ray that gilds the fading scene ;
Sad and tawny all that bloomed before so fresh and bright,
Time hath reaped his harvest — have we gathered whilst we might ?
Dark and gloomy lowers the Future ; breaking on the shore,
Winter's waves come rolling onward, winter's tempests roar ;
Dreary dawns the morning, early sets the watery sun,
Few the grains the hour-glass holds, and faster
still they run.
Like a dream, the lengthening Past hath vanished
from our sight,
Twilight's shadows gather round, and nearer draws the night.
Short and sad the journey left, and few the toils to brave —
Life, in all its winding paths, leads surely to the grave.
By the passing seasons warned, then be not thou beguiled,
Trust not in the budding Spring, nor Summer prime, my child !
Still unwished for, still unmourned, behold them
come and go ;
Earth is not thy resting-place, thy home is not below.
Ever through thy pilgrimage hold steadfast to the end,
Ever to the promised Heaven let thoughts and wishes tend ;
So when death at last shall wrap thy frame in winter's gloom,
Spring eternal on thy soul shall dawn beyond the tomb.

WRITINGS OF T. B. MACAULAY.

MR. MACAULAY may be considered one of the most successful of modern authors ; inasmuch as everything he has written has made an impression upon the public, and the popularity he enjoys is both extensive and substantial. It is also a popularity that is more than usually well deserved. His contributions to literature belong to the departments of criticism, poetry, and history, and upon all of them there is the stamp and seal of excellence. Owing to the expensive form in which his works have hitherto been published, we suspect his readers have been restricted to the well-conditioned and more cultivated classes ; but now that some of his most admired essays are in the course of republication, in the shape of shilling pamphlets, he is likely to be introduced to a multitude of new appreciators, and to acquire thus a large accession of reputation. For every one who reads Macaulay is sure to be delighted with him, and will be almost certain to study and re-peruse his pages with increasing relish and satisfaction, until their whole interest and meaning become matter of familiarity.

There is something of the universal genius in Macaulay. His versatility is great, his manner exceedingly attractive, and the speculations he most delights in are of general and abiding interest. He is possessed of all the endowments and accomplishments which command the attention and respect of nearly all varieties of intelligent and cultivated persons ; his stores of learning and information are large and varied ; the skill and facility with which he reproduces what he knows, give an air of ease and gracefulness to his writing, such as is seldom witnessed ; and the light expertness and pointed vigor of his style are admirably calculated to produce an effective impression. He is a great popularizer of abstruse and recondite investigations. There is nothing he takes in hand that he does not succeed in making his reader comprehend ; or, at any rate, the reader must be singularly obtuse and unintelligent if he fails in doing so. He has done much in the way of educating the tastes, the judgments, and the sympathies of his generation.

Before proceeding to an examination of our author's works, it will not be amiss to bring together such biographical particulars as we happen to possess. Thomas Babington Macaulay is the son of Mr. Zackary Macaulay, formerly a West India merchant, and known in public life as the personal friend and coadjutor of the celebrated Wilberforce. For mercantile pursuits, the son does not appear to have had any inclination ; but in regard to popular and political objects, he has inherited all the zeal, and perhaps more than the judgment, of his father. His education, we believe, was begun at home ; efficiently advanced under the Rev. Mr. Preston, at Shelford, in Cambridgeshire ; and subsequently completed at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was entered at the latter in 1818, and, some year later, took his bachelor's degree, in the ordinary course. In 1819, he obtained the chancellor's medal awarded to compositions in English verse. Judging from what he has said in one of his reviews of prize-poems generally, it would not seem that he afterwards thought much of this distinction. Speaking in allusion to Sir Roger Newdigate's restriction of such a poem to fifty lines, he pleasantly commends the regulation : "The world, we believe, is pretty well agreed," says he, "in thinking that the shorter a prize-poem is, the better." Mr. Macaulay, however, won considerably higher honors, and indeed gained the very highest, in classical departments, which the university could confer. After leaving college, he applied himself to the study of law, and was called to the bar in 1826. Whether he ever intended to practise is not known to us, but it seems likely that his principal object was to gain a more ready introduction into literary and public life. Be this as it may, it is certain that he began very early to apply himself to literature. He was one of the first and ablest among the contributors to Knight's Quarterly Magazine ; and in due season gained access to the Edinburgh Review. The article on Milton — the first in the collection of his essays — appeared in that journal in 1827. It has sometimes been spoken of as a finely-finished and even splendid composition ; but Macaulay himself has referred to it as being "overloaded with gaudy and ungraceful ornament." "Written," says he, "when the author was fresh from college, it "contains scarcely a paragraph such as his matured judgment approves." It was, nevertheless, a performance of great vigor and promise, and instantly raised the writer to a distinguished elevation among his literary contemporaries. His subsequent contributions to the Edinburgh were less ornate and florid, and became gradually more and more remarkable for a perfect and exquisite simplicity. By his connexion with this journal, he gained the intimacy and friendship of Mr. Jeffrey (since Lord Jeffrey), the editor; an agreeable relationship, which subsisted as long as the latter lived.

In 1831, Mr. Macaulay entered Parliament as member for Calne, a borough in the interest of Lord Lansdowne. He made his first speech in favor of the Reform Bill, and shortly came to be considered a prominent member of the Whig party. With this party he has been all along associated, and in his political disquisitions appears chiefly as its champion and philosophical representative. His eloquence and manifest capacity for the discussion of affairs gave him great popularity in the House, and won for him the respect and favor of the leaders in the ministry. He was not a frequent speaker, but when he did speak, it was generally on some important question, with all the bearings and particulars of which he had made himself intimately acquainted. Those who were in a position to appreciate his powers, spoke of him in the highest terms of eulogy. Jeffrey, writing to Lord Cockburn in 1833, observes: "Mac is a marvellous person. He made the very best speech that has been made this session on India, a few nights ago, to a house of less than fifty. The speaker, who is a severe judge, says he rather thinks it the best speech he ever heard." The men of the Whig administration must have entertained a somewhat similar opinion; at any rate, they kept their eyes upon him, and embraced an early opportunity for enlisting him in their service. In 1834, after being elected for Leeds, he was appointed to the office of Secretary to the India Board. The aptness for business and general ability he manifested in this position, caused him shortly afterwards to be made a member of the East India Company's Supreme Council at Calcutta; an appointment for which he vacated his seat in Parliament, and proceeded forthwith to India. He was absent four years, returning to England in 1838. During his stay in India, he largely extended his knowledge of its policy and affairs; so that when writing subsequently on the careers of Clive and Warren Hastings, he showed himself accurately informed of all their personal proceedings, and thoroughly conversant with the whole range of circumstances connected with the rise and consolidation of our Indian Empire. The year after his return, Macaulay was elected for Edinburgh, and in the following year accepted office as Secretary at War. When the Whig ascendancy was broken up in 1841, he steadily and consistently supported his party in opposition. Some of his votes, however, gave offence to his constituents—a memorable one on the Maynooth grant especially—and at the general election of 1847, he lost his seat for the Scottish capital. He would have had little difficulty in getting returned for some one of the English boroughs, but he declined all solicitations, and refused to sit for any other place than the one which had rejected him. Time wears down many prejudices; and the honor that was then denied him, was last year restored, and that in a manner highly flattering to himself. It will be remembered that without canvassing, without even coming forward as a candidate, he was triumphantly returned for Edinburgh at the head of the poll. His four years' exclusion from public life are understood to have been industriously devoted to literary pursuits—mainly, we believe, to the preparation of his elaborate History of England from the Accession of James II.; two volumes of which were published at the close of 1848, and have now reached their sixth edition; and two other volumes are expected to be forthcoming in the course of the present year. Of the merits of this work we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. Both as a statesman and a writer, though in general a supporter of Whig principles, Mr. Macaulay has sometimes been the advocate of a more liberal national policy than that aspired after by his party; and, upon the whole, it may be said, that he has used the influence of his position in behalf of free opinion, commercial liberty, a more general extension of education among the people, and a better adjustment of those relations of ranks and classes which are commonly believed, by advanced thinkers, to require emendation as a consequence and a condition of our material and social progress.

We now pass on to a consideration of Mr. Macaulay's writings, beginning with a notice of his collected contributions to the Edinburgh Review. These embrace an extensive range of subjects. They are scarcely separable, according to the title, into Critical and Historical Essays, for the critical are nearly all partially historical or biographical, and the historical deal considerably in criticism.

The most purely critical and literary are the before-mentioned article on Milton, the reviews of Moore's Life of Byron, Boswell's Life of Johnson, Horace Walpole's Letters, Southey's Colloquies on Society, the Diary and Letters of Madame d'Arblay, the Life and Writings of Addison, and the elaborate dissertations on Lord Bacon and Sir William Temple. Among the professedly historical essays, the most notable and attractive are those on Lord Burleigh, the Earl of Chatham, Lord Clive, and Warren Hastings. These contain complete and finished representations of the genius and characters of the individuals treated of, along with graphic and excellent descriptions of the circumstances in which they lived and acted. They are all striking and instructive studies of human nature, and are not only memorable for the interest of personality which attaches to the subjects, but may be read with profit for their stores of valuable information, their fair and impartial estimates of character, and their just moral judgments and conclusions.

Perhaps the first quality that strikes a reader fresh from Macaulay's pages, is the fulness of his sympathy with genius. Nearly all his articles in the Edinburgh Review have been devoted to great men, or to men who hold some special characteristic position in literature or history by virtue of their genius. Bacon, Milton, Bunyan, Addison, Johnson, Byron, are persons of widely different peculiarities of mental constitution, but being all unquestionably possessed of what we understand by genius, they are severally and individually welcomed with the warmest homage and appreciation. He delights to track the footsteps of the bold original travelers in the realms of thought and power, and glows with admiration over the narrative of their discoveries. The things that interest him most are the great strokes of character, the subtle graces of act and movement, that cannot be imitated or repeated, the beauty and the glory that is shed from the presence of exalted intellects. Before the high throne of superiority, he bows his head with reverence, and extols, with a glowing and rapturous enthusiasm, the majesty he venerates. But his worship is by no means fanatical or superstitious; it is not the expression of a mere undiscerning sentiment, but the bold and fearless admiration of a mind that claims relationship with the object it admires. For all manner of limitations and imperfections, he has as clear and just a recognition as he manifests for the characteristics of excellency and worthiness. The homage he pays to genius is not extended to its failings or deficiencies; nor does he suffer the moral sense within him to be dazzled by the brilliancy of the aberrations and eccentricities by which it has sometimes been disfigured. To the Cæsars of human intellect he would render the things that may be due to them; but for every violation of the truth and justice, for every perversion of honor or integrity, he relentlessly brings them to judgment. Not that he has no generous compassion for the errors of the tempted, or for the heedless indiscretions into which the inexperienced and impetuous may chance to fall; but knowing the weight and the solemnity of human responsibility, he dares forbear not, even in the natural overflowings of his mercy towards the offender, to visit his offences with condemnation.

This Rhadamanthine impartiality is illustrated in the article on Bacon. Whilst he admiringly extols the grandeurs of Bacon's intellect, he will not condescend to varnish the rottenness of his moral reputation. Honoring the philosopher and the thinker, he yet denounces the selfishness, the perfidy, and the meanness of the man. Nevertheless, with justice he discriminates between the acts which may be reckoned instances of personal depravity, and those that were simply adventitious or accessory to his position as a placeman and a politician. The vices and shortcomings of his age are not incontinently charged upon the head of the individual. Macaulay, indeed, discerns in Bacon two separable and distinct characters. Under the speculative aspect, the man is to be ranked with the noblest specimens of his race; under the practical and personal manifestation, he is shown to have had very much in common with the basest and most unprincipled. "The difference," says Macaulay, "between the soaring angel and the creeping snake was but a type of the difference between Bacon the philosopher and Bacon the attorney-general — Bacon seeking for truth and Bacon seeking for the seals. Those who survey only one half of his character may speak of him with unmixed admiration, or with unmixed contempt; but those only judge of him correctly, who take in at one view Bacon in speculation and Bacon in action. They will have no difficulty in comprehending how one and the same man should have been far before his age and far behind it — in one line, the boldest and most useful of innovators; in another line, the most obstinate champion of the foulest abuses. In his library, all his rare powers were under the guidance of an honest ambition, of an enlarged philanthropy, of a sincere love of truth. There, no temptation drew him away from the right course. Thomas Aquinas could pay no fees — Duns Scotus could confer no peerages — the Master of the Sentences had no rich reversions in his gift. Far different was the situation of the great philosopher, when he came forth from his study and his laboratory to mingle with the crowd which filled the galleries of Whitehall. In all that crowd there was no man equally qualified to render great and lasting services to mankind. But in all that crowd there was not a heart more set on things which no man ought to suffer to be necessary to his happiness — on things which can often be obtained only by the sacrifice of integrity and honor. To be the leader of the human race in the career of improvement — to found on the ruins of ancient intellectual dynasties a more prosperous and a more enduring empire — to be revered by the latest generations as the most illustrious among the benefactors of mankind; all this was within his reach. But all this availed him nothing while some quibbling special pleader was promoted before him to the bench — while some heavy country gentleman took precedence of him, by virtue of a purchased coronet — while some pander, happy in a fair wife, could obtain a more cordial salute from Buckingham — while some buffoon, versed in all the latest scandal of the court, could draw a louder laugh from James.* Further on, our author adds: "Had his life been passed in literary retirement, he would, in all probability, have deserved to be considered, not only as a great philosopher, but as a worthy and good-natured member of society. But neither his principle nor his spirit was such as could be trusted, when strong temptations were to be resisted, and serious dangers to be braved."

This wide discrepancy between the intellectual and moral elements of Bacon's nature is a thing to be lamented; but being undeniably a fact, it cannot rightly be overlooked in our estimation of his greatness. But it is precisely the thing which a less bold and conscientious critic, so largely sympathizing with Bacon's genius, would have been tempted to explain away. This was, indeed, the course pursued by Mr. Basil Montagu in his life of the great philosopher, and is the very thing which impairs the worth of that otherwise valuable and carefully-composed biography. Mr. Macaulay is, accordingly, a much safer guide to the study of Bacon's history and character, than any one could be who approaches the subject in the attitude of a partisan. The position taken by Mr. Montagu is that of an advocate, who conceives himself called upon to exculpate his client from all suspicion of blame: Mr. Macaulay, more appropriately, assumes the functions of a judge, who, hearing and investigating the entire case, pronounces a decision according to the evidence. So just an apprehension of the lights and shades of character as is indicated in the sentences just quoted, and appears still more abundantly throughout the article, seems to us to mark Macaulay as a writer admirably qualified for faithful and impartial criticism of character. Another quality which well befits him in this capacity, is his considerate and honorable candor towards honestly-intentioned persons with whom he finds it necessary to differ in opinion. There are some remarks in this same article on Bacon, which may be not inaptly cited, by way of showing how gently he is disposed to deal with the unconscious exaggerations and misjudgments of those admirers of the illustrious who are apt to be unduly ardent, and not sufficiently discriminating. Speaking of the difficulty there is in treating, with strict impartiality, of the memories of men who have been in any manner benefactors of their kind, he observes: —

"There is scarcely any delusion which has a better claim to be indulgently treated, than that under the influence of which a man ascribes every moral excellence to those who have left imperishable monuments of their genius. The causes of this error lie deep in the inmost recesses of human nature. We are all inclined to judge of others as we find them. Our estimate of a character always depends much on the manner in which that character affects our interests and passions. We find it difficult to think well of those by whom we are thwarted or depressed; and we are ready to admit every excuse for the vices of those who are useful or agreeable to us. This is, we believe, one of those illusions to which the whole human race is subject, and which experience and reflection can only partially remove. It is, in the phraseology of Bacon, one of the idola tribus.* Hence it is that the moral character of a man eminent in letters or in the fine arts is treated, often by contemporaries, almost always by posterity, with extraordinary tenderness. The world derives pleasure and advantage from the performances of such a man. The number of those who suffer by his personal vices is small, even in his own time, when compared with the number of those to whom his talents are a source of gratification. In a few years, all those whom he has

* Idols or illusions of the tribe or species.

injured disappear ; but his works remain, and are a source of delight to millions. The genius of Sallust is still with us ; but the Numidians whom he plundered, and the unfortunate husbands who caught him in their houses at unseasonable hours, are forgotten. We suffer ourselves to be delighted by the keenness of Clarendon's observation, and by the sober majesty of his style, till we forget the oppressor and the bigot in the historian. Falstaff and Tom Jones have survived the gamekeepers whom Shakspeare cudgelled, and the landladies whom Fielding bilked. A great writer is the friend and benefactor of his readers ; and they cannot but judge of him under the deluding influence of friendship and gratitude. We all know how unwilling we are to admit the truth of any disgraceful story about a person whose society we like, and from whom we have received favors ; how long we struggle against evidence — how fondly, when the facts cannot be disputed, we cling to the hope that there may be some explanation or some extenuating circumstance with which we are unacquainted. Just such is the feeling which a man of liberal education naturally entertains towards the great minds of former ages. The debt which he owes to them is incalculable. They have guided him to truth — they have filled his mind with noble and graceful images — they have stood by him in all vicissitudes, comforters in sorrow, nurses in sickness, companions in solitude. These friendships are exposed to no danger from the occurrences by which other attachments are weakened or dissolved. Time glides on, fortune is inconstant, tempers are soured, bonds which seemed indissoluble are daily sundered by interest, by emulation, or by caprice. But no such cause can affect the silent converse which we hold with the highest human intellects. That placid intercourse is disturbed by no jealousies or resentments. These are the old friends who are never seen with new faces, who are the same in wealth and in poverty, in glory and in obscurity. . . . Nothing, then, can be more natural, than that a person endowed with sensibility and imagination should entertain a respectful and affectionate feeling towards those great men with whose minds he holds daily communion. Yet," he continues, with a just consideration for what can be advanced on the other side, " nothing can be more certain, than that such men have not always deserved to be regarded with respect or affection. Some writers, whose works will continue to instruct and delight mankind to the remotest ages, have been placed in such situations that their actions and motives are as well known to us as the actions and motives of one human being can be known to another ; and unhappily their conduct has not always been such as an impartial judge can contemplate with approbation."

These last remarks have obtained ample and varied illustration in Mr. Macaulay's disquisitions. As a reviewer, notwithstanding, he is apt to be very hard upon dunces, and indeed seems not disinclined to hunt them out of the provinces of literature, without benefit of clergy. The measure he dealt some years ago to a celebrated writer of verse, whose works have gone through numerous editions, is a memorable instance of the severity of which he is capable on fit occasions. The gentleman in question is the well-known author of Satan, and the Omnipresence of the Deity, and also of several other works that have been more or less popular with a considerable class of readers. Mr. Macaulay, we think wrongly, ascribed his incomprehensible success to the agency of puffery. This stimulant to notoriety may have been concerned in it, but we fancy it is in great part attributable to that liking for inflated metaphor and sounding phraseology, so commonly observable in common minds. The vulgar melodramas that are represented in the inferior London theatres, meet with a correspondingly vulgar, but a very hearty and undeniable approbation. Such compositions as Satan, and others of the class, might in like manner find some natural admirers. Puffery might have carried Mr. Montgomery hastily through two or three editions, but it would be hardly a sufficient motive power to bear him triumphantly forward to a dozen. However, believing the cause to be simple puffery, Mr. Macaulay sets himself to expose and denounce it, and then rigorously analyzes Mr. Montgomery's pretensions. The unsparing critic convicts him of nearly all the poetical sins a man could possibly commit. " His writing," says he, " bears the same relation to poetry which a Turkey-carpet bears to a picture. There are colors in a Turkey-carpet out of which a picture might be made ; there are words in Mr. Montgomery's writing which, when disposed in certain orders and combinations, have made, and will again make, good poetry. But as they now stand, they seem to be put together on principle, in such a manner as to give no image of anything ' in the heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth.' " He convicts him of the grossest plagiarism, of false taste, of an irreverent handling of sacred things, of confusion of imagery, of inflation of style and phraseology, of absurd personification and reflection, of spoiling almost everything he pilfers, of violating even the common rules of syntax ; and then, having, as it were, turned him utterly inside out, and exposed the bombastic patchwork with which he has clothed his intellectual insignificance, he finally dismisses him with a bland and gentlemanly contempt. On reading such a criticism, a man is apt to thank his stars that he never fancied himself a poet.

But it is not always in a style so truculent that Mr. Macaulay treats an incompetent or pompous author. If the author be only ungainly, or innocently commonplace, his judgment of him may not be the less positively express disapprobation; but the manner in which he conveys it is more gentle, and not so emphatically contemptuous. Yet we scarcely know which might be the more difficult to bear — his sharp castigations, or the provoking complacency of his milder disapproval. He has a habit of what may be called pleasant depreciation, which has often a very damaging effect. Here is a short extractable passage, which will serve, better than any remarks, to illustrate what we mean. The subject under review is the Memoirs of Lord Burleigh, edited by Dr. Nares, some time Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford; and in introducing the work to his readers, Mr. Macaulay thus describes it: —

"The work of Dr. Nares has filled us with astonishment similar to that which Captain Gulliver felt when first he landed in Brobdingnag, and saw corn as high as the oaks in the New Forest, thimbles as large as buckets, and wrens of the bulk of turkeys. The whole book, and every component part of it, is on a gigantic scale. The title is as long as an ordinary preface; the prefatory matter would furnish out an ordinary book; and the book contains as much reading as an ordinary library. We cannot sum up the merits of the stupendous mass of paper which lies before us, better than by saying, that it consists of about 2000 closely-printed quarto pages, that it occupies 1500 inches cubic measure, and that it weighs sixty pounds avoirdupois. Such a book might, before the deluge, have been considered as light reading by Hilpa and Shalum. But unhappily the life of man is now threescore years and ten; and we cannot but think it somewhat unfair in Dr. Nares to demand from us so large a portion of so short an existence.

"Compared with the labor of reading through these volumes, all other labor, the labor of thieves on the tread-mill, of children in factories, of negroes in sugar-plantations, is an agreeable recreation. There was, it is said, a criminal in Italy who was suffered to make his choice between Guicciardini and the galleys. He chose the history. But the war of Pisa was too much for him. He changed his mind, and went to the oar. Guicciardini, though certainly not the most amusing of writers, is a Herodotus or a Froissart when compared with Dr. Nares. It is not merely in bulk, but in specific gravity, also, that these memoirs exceed all other human compositions. On every subject which the professor discusses, he produces three times as many pages as another man; and one of his pages is as tedious as another man's three. His book is swelled to its vast dimensions by endless repetitions, by episodes which have nothing to do with the main action, by quotations from books which are in every circulating library, and by reflections which, when they happen to be just, are so obvious, that they must necessarily occur to the mind of every reader. He employs more words in expounding and defending a truism, than any other writer would employ in supporting a paradox. Of the rules of historical perspective he has not the faintest notion. There is neither foreground nor background in his delineation. The wars of Charles V. in Germany are detailed at almost as much length as in Robertson's life of that prince. The troubles of Scotland are related as fully as in M'Crie's Life of John Knox. It would be most unjust to deny, that Dr. Nares is a man of great industry and research; but he is so utterly incompetent to arrange the materials which he has collected, that he might as well have left them in their original repositories."

Dr. Nares appears to be one of those heavy and pains-taking authors, whom the Germans are accustomed to call "literary hod-men." Nevertheless, we conceive some moderate degree of praise is due to him, inasmuch as he undoubtedly brought together, in three sufficient volumes, the whole or chief materials out of which Mr. Macaulay raised his own elegant monument, in commemoration of Burleigh and his Times. This paper is an excellent specimen of our author's science of composition; for, with Mr. Macaulay, as with all good writers, composition is a science, and therefore requiring the observance of appropriate rules and principles. Among his most prominent characteristics may be noted his rare powers of representation. He sketches a biography, or renders an episode in history, with the lightest and gracefulest effect, often throwing a charm and an interest around particulars which, in the hands of a meaner writer, would be simply tame and tedious. And then, when the subject-matter chances to be interesting, the masterly skill with which he adapts and sets it forth, imparts to it additional attractions. There is scarcely any more delightful reading in the language than Macaulay's rapid and airy sketches of the lives of authors and distinguished statesmen; so full of information, yet so light and sparkling in manner, so choicely seasoned with anecdote and historical allusion, so complete in all the essentials which go to form a vivid representation of character, events, and circumstances. These portions of his works are perfect pictures of the customs, modes of thought, and ways of living, of former generations. Thus, in the review of Burleigh and his Times, we have the age of Queen Elizabeth, and the contemporary contest between Romanists and Protestants, depicted in a way that shows an intimate familiarity with the principles, prejudices, and policy of the period. In Bacon, we obtain not only a just and authentic view of his personal acts and character, but a clear and intelligible insight into the general aspects of the age, as manifested in the culture and prevalent morality of courtiers and public men, along with a comprehensive survey of the state of science and opinion. A paper on the Comic Dramatists of the Restoration, introduces us, as it were, bodily into the society in which Wycherley and Congreve lived and moved and had their being, and which they have so wittily and licentiously represented in their comedies. And so on, throughout these criticisms generally, we have the persons of whom they treat, and the circumstances and environment in which they flourished, reproduced and brought vividly before us, in brilliant and picturesque descriptions, as pleasant and entertaining as any in the novels of Sir Walter Scott. The liveliness and grace with which Macaulay represents reality, is almost as fascinating and perfect in its way, as is the admirable "imitation of reality" in the fictions of the novelist.

Another prominent quality of Macaulay's writing is his adroit use of facts in support of his conclusions. A fact in his hands is not a mere isolated piece of information, but is made to serve for the illustration of great truths, or for the enforcement of particular acts of duty. He often conducts an argument almost wholly by a judicious marshalling of facts, throwing in scarcely any additional remark, beyond such as may be needed to link them logically together. Of their proper value and application, he entertains a very clear conception. In treating of any subject, he perceives at a glance what particular facts possess importance, and how they can be most effectively embodied in a description, or made available for the ends of a discussion. In this respect, he shows himself one of the finest literary artists of the age; no one can have a clearer recognition of what a fact is worth, or more appropriately apply it to his purposes. It has not escaped him, that ordinary writers are very defective in this useful qualification. "Many writers," says he, "seem never to have considered on what the historical importance of an event depends. They seem not to be aware that the importance of a fact, when that fact is considered with reference to its immediate effects, and the importance of the same fact, when that fact is considered as part of the materials for the construction of a science, are two very different things. The quantity of good or evil which a transaction produces, is by no means necessarily proportioned to the quantity of light which that transaction affords as to the way in which good or evil may hereafter be produced. The poisoning of an emperor is in one sense a far more serious matter than the poisoning of a rat. But the poisoning of a rat may be an era in chemistry; and an emperor may be poisoned by such ordinary means, and with such ordinary symptoms, that no scientific journal would notice the occurrence. An action for a hundred thousand pounds is in one sense a more momentous affair than an action for fifty pounds. But it by no means follows, that the learned gentlemen who report the proceedings of the courts of law, ought to give a fuller account of an action for a hundred thousand pounds, than of an action for fifty pounds. For a cause in which a large sum is at stake, may be important only to the particular plaintiff and the particular defendant. A cause, on the other hand, in which a small sum is at stake, may establish some great principle interesting to half the families in the kingdom. The case is exactly the same with that class of subjects of which historians treat. To an Athenian, in the time of the Peloponnesian war, the result of the battle of Delium was far more important than the fate of the comedy of The Knights. But to us, the fact that the comedy of The Knights was brought on the Athenian stage with success, is far more important than the fact that the Athenian phalanx gave way at Delium. Neither the one event nor the other has now any intrinsic importance. We are in no danger of being speared by the Thebans. We are not quizzed in The Knights. To us, the importance of both events consists in the value of the general truth which is to be learned from them. What general truth do we learn from the accounts which have come down to us of the battle of Delium? Very little more than this: that when two armies fight, it is not improbable that one of them will be very soundly beaten — a truth which it would not, we apprehend, be difficult to establish, even if all memory of the battle of Delium were lost among men. But a man who becomes acquainted with the comedy of The Knights, and with the history of that comedy, at once feels his mind enlarged. Society is presented to him under a new aspect. He may have read and travelled much; he may have visited all the countries of Europe, and the civilized nations of the East; he may have observed the manners of many barbarous races; but here is something altogether different from everything which he has seen, either among polished men or among savages. Here is a community politically, intellectually, and morally unlike any other community of which he has the means of forming an opinion. This is the really precious part of history, the corn which some threshers carefully sever from the chaff, for the purpose of gathering the chaff into the garner, and flinging the corn into the fire.”*

The distinction here indicated respecting the significancy of facts, and their dependency and relations, is one which Mr. Macaulay appears to have studiously observed in his own writings. In all his biographical delineations, he seizes, as we said, upon whatsoever is intrinsically essential to the portraiture of the individual; and on whatever, in the way of event or circumstance, contributed to the formation of his character, or the advancement or diversification of his fortunes. In his historical criticisms, he aims, in like manner, at presenting an image of the times to which his inquiries belong—regarding not so much what is styled “the dignity of history,” as what tends to exhibit the actual form and features of society. Thus, the love-letters of Lady Temple are, in his estimation, of more importance than the government dispatches, or the records of parliamentary debates, belonging to the era; inasmuch as, “of that information for the sake of which alone it is worth while to study remote events,” a great deal more is to be derived from such a set of letters, than could ever be extracted from ten times their bulk of ordinary state-papers. “To us, surely,” says he, “it is as useful to know how the young ladies of England employed themselves a hundred and eighty years ago, how far their minds were cultivated, what were their favorite studies, what degree of liberty was allowed to them, what use they made of that liberty, what accomplishments they most valued in men, and what proofs of tenderness delicacy permitted them to give to favored suitors—as to know all about the seizure of Franche Comté, and the treaty of Nimeguen. The mutual relations of the two sexes seem to us to be at least as important as the mutual relations of any two governments in the world; and a series of letters, written by a virtuous, amiable, and sensible girl, and intended for the eye of her lover alone, can scarcely fail to throw some light on the relations of the sexes; whereas it is perfectly possible, as all who have made any historical researches can attest, to read bale after bale of dispatches and protocols, without catching any glimpse of light about the relations of governments.” We might point to many passages in these essays, illustrative of the tact and ingenuity with which the author selects and reproduces the facts he has to deal with, and of the invariable felicity with which he turns them to account, whether in the construction of a narrative or in the development of an argument; but, for present purposes, it may be sufficient to state, generally, that a skilful adaptation of matters of fact is one of the prominent qualities of his writing, and contributes largely to give both weight and entertainment to his productions.

The amount of instruction to be gathered from Mr. Macaulay's criticisms is very considerable, though their value in this respect will depend on the previous intelligence of the reader. To persons already conversant with literature, and the lives and actions of men of note connected with our history, they do not present much that is new in the way of information; while to such as are but indifferently acquainted with these topics, they may seem to make too great a demand upon the reader's knowledge, in the multiplicity of their allusions, and in the implied assumption of the author, that the matters he is treating of are more or less matters of familiarity. They are, indeed, addressed to persons of liberal education, and presuppose or take for granted such an extent of general knowledge as is usually to be found among people of that description. They aim, however, at presenting more accurate and complete views of the subjects handled than are to be found generally prevailing. They are aids for the formation of opinion on questions more or less open to discussion, or which were so at the time when the writer drew attention to them. We cannot say that in his literary criticisms he has anywhere expounded the principles of literary art, the essential nature of poetry, or any of those abstruse æsthetical difficulties with which scientific critics have of late years been concerned. No such collection of critical maxims could be gathered from his works as might be collected from the conversations, the autobiography, and general writings of the German poet Goethe. It is in the purity of his taste, and in the clearness of his understanding, that his critical strength is most apparent; and it is mainly on these that he relies in forming his judgments of an author's talents and performances. The shape which his judgments often take is simply that of an opinion; such and such a thing is indicated as being in accordance with, or opposed to, his individual notions of what is fitting or appropriate, and sentence is pronounced without a reference to any profounder reasons. But he displays, at the same time, so natural an appreciation of what is excellent, and so ready a perception of what is false or overstrained, that the judgment given is generally one which cannot be set aside, or at least will be only open to some moderate qualification. This apprehension of whatever is true or beautiful, and the instinctive distaste for the contrary, is by no means peculiar to Macaulay; but in no English writer is it more marked or palpable, and in few has it been cultivated to a state of such perfection. The instructiveness of his writings is as much apparent in the influence they are calculated to exert on the intellectual perceptions, as in the amount of information they convey, or the service to be derived from them in the way of developing the understanding. Indeed, in all these respects they are eminently instructive, and can be confidently recommended to the notice of all persons desirous of furthering their education.

A slight tendency to paradox is observable in some of the disquisitions of our author. For instance, in the review of Boswell's Life of Johnson, he says, that if Boswell "had not been a great fool, he would never have been a great writer." This assertion he supports by such remarks as these: "Without all the qualities which made him the jest and the torment of those among whom he lived, without the officiousness, the inquisitiveness, the effrontery, the toad-eating, the insensibility to all reproof, he never could have produced so excellent a book. . . . Of the talents which ordinarily raise men to eminence as writers, Boswell had absolutely none. There is not in all his books a single remark of his own on literature, politics, religion, or society, which is not either commonplace or absurd. . . . He has reported innumerable observations made by himself in the course of conversation. Of these observations, we do not remember one which is above the intellectual capacity of a boy of fifteen. He has printed many of his own letters, and in these letters he is always ranting or twaddling. Logic, eloquence, wit, taste, all those things which are generally considered as making a book valuable, were utterly wanting to him. He had, indeed, a quick observation and a retentive memory. These qualities, if he had been a man of sense and virtue, would scarcely of themselves have sufficed to make him conspicuous; but because he was a dunce, a parasite, and a coxcomb, they have made him immortal." This is sufficiently smart writing, but it does not appear to us to be particularly good criticism. It could not be in virtue of his being "a dunce, a parasite, and a coxcomb," that Boswell was qualified to write one of the best books in the language; this hypothesis carries its own refutation on the face of it. It is one of the plainest of all truisms, that sheer badness cannot, by the nature of it, produce anything that is good. As Mr. Carlyle has observed in relation to this matter: "Bad is by its nature negative, and can do nothing; whatsoever enables us to do anything is by its very nature good." The power of doing may be perverted or misapplied; but in regard to Boswell's book, it is not admitted that this has been the case. On the contrary, the work is universally acknowledged to be excellent. We must hold, therefore, with Carlyle, that "Boswell wrote a good book because he had a heart and an eye to discern wisdom, and an utterance to render it forth; because of his free insight, his lively talent; above all, of his love and childlike open-mindedness. His sneaking sycophancies, his greediness and forwardness, whatever was bestial and earthy in him, are so many blemishes in his book, which still disturb us in its clearness; wholly hindrances, not helps. Towards Johnson, however, his feeling was not sycophancy, which is the lowest, but reverence, which is the highest of human feelings. None but a reverent man — which so unspeakably few are — could have found his way from Boswell's environment to Johnson's; if such worship for real God-made superiors showed itself also as worship for apparent tailor-made superiors, even as hollow interested mouth-worship for such — the case, in this composite human nature of ours, was not miraculous, the more the pity! But for ourselves, let every one of us cling to this last article of faith, and know it as the beginning of all knowledge worth the name — that neither James Boswell's good book, nor any other good thing, in any time or in any place, was, is, or can be performed by any man in virtue of his badness, but always and solely in spite thereof."* Carlyle and Macaulay quite agree in their estimate of the work, both considering it as being, upon the whole, the most interesting production of the eighteenth century. On its merits, however, it would here be out of place to dwell. We have referred to it for the sake of adducing an example of that tendency to paradox which occasionally appears in Mr. Macaulay's writings. Having noticed such a tendency, it will be but fair to say, that, generally speaking, his paradoxes are very harmless. They rarely amount to an actual confounding of truth and error, and need never very far mislead an intelligent and open-minded reader. They have often the air of deliberate affectations, and may be regarded as the playful eccentricities of a lively mind, which, while consciously possessed of power to restrain and command the fancy, at times suffers it to wander into little tricks of waywardness.

The quality of clearness is one which eminently distinguishes Macaulay's compositions. It is this, perhaps, more than anything, that makes them so acceptable to the popular understanding. There are no important difficulties to master before they can be enjoyed; there is nothing perplexing or involved to hinder immediate comprehension. As somebody has said, you may read them as you run. It was not a bad notion of the publisher, to bring them out in a form suitable for railway entertainment. They are admirably adapted to the purpose — provided you happen to be one to whom reading on the railways is at all a possibility. At any rate, wherever read, their easy and graceful perspicuity is pretty certain to lead you on pleasantly to the end, without fatigue or prostration of the faculties. Macaulay, among his various qualifications, possesses the highly popular art which he ascribes to Horace Walpole — “the art of writing what people will like to read.” He understands, too, that if people are to be expected to read, with any satisfaction to themselves, it is requisite to give them as little trouble as possible in the process. This condition of successful writing he has carefully observed, by always presenting what he has to say in a form of perfect clearness and precision. Contrasting his bright and lucid pages with the cumbrous entanglements of many other writers of mark and reputation, but who are wanting in his felicity of method and expression, it may be seen how immeasurably superior is his manner to theirs, and how largely this one quality of clearness contributes to the pleasure there is in reading what he has written.

There is a certain refinement in Macaulay's style, which forms one of the principal attractions of his writings. This style has undergone some changes since the author began to write. At first elaborately ornamented, it has since become more simple, thereby improving in point of vigor, and being nowise diminished in its beauty. It may be said to be distinguished from the style of other writers by a prevalent sententiousness, a sharp epigrammatic point, rendering it at once lively and effective in impression. It has an air of naturalness, combined with a regular elegance and polish, which is the result of art. It is the style of a scholar who has contracted no pedantries, and of a man of the world, who is a perfect master of the language in which men of the world like to be addressed. It is full of idiomatic turns and phrases, such as are invariably pleasing to persons of strong sense, and of simple, unaffected tastes. Yet, upon occasion, it has a certain stateliness of march, and a glitter of antithesis, which impart to it an aspect of great splendor, and agreeably diversify the easy gracefulness of the less elaborate passages. It is a style of sufficient flexibility to serve for all the purposes of description, narrative, analysis, familiar illustration, or the eloquent expression of felicitous thoughts and fancies — indeed, for all the purposes to which a style can be applied, short of the finer kinds of humor, or the highest flights of poetry. Macaulay has abundance of wit and pleasantry, but nothing that can be properly called humor; and though many passages in his works are eminently poetical, he is not endowed with that creative imagination which is the distinction of the poet. His poetry, as we shall show presently, is the product of a exceedingly ingenious and beautiful, but yet one that does not spring from the sources of an impulsive inspiration. Macaulay is, nevertheless, a great writer; a man of finely-balanced powers, exquisitely cultivated; one in whom original talent and acquired accomplishment are most successfully combined, and whose literary achievements are accordingly among the finest and most perfect of his generation. In all the subtle graces and delicate felicities of style which depend on taste and training, he is unsurpassed. Many authors write a more imposing style, and there may be some who actually surpass him in particular characteristics, but we cannot mention one in whom so many varied excellences are united; not one whose style presents so much force, brilliancy, and purity in such perfect combination.

The passages already quoted from his essays will serve to convey some notion of the style, but they are not calculated to give a fair impression of its general compass and variety. This, indeed, could not be given by any number of fragments such as we are able to introduce into these pages. As an example, however, of the polished simplicity and elegant elaboration distinguishing his manner when employed in picturesque and vivid representation, we subjoin an additional extract — one which, to ourselves, seems very beautiful, and we doubt not will appear so to the reader. It is taken from a review of Southey's edition of the Pilgrim's Progress, and forms a sort of summary of the incidents and scenes depicted in that most wonderful of allegories. Worthily old Bunyan — “the prince of dreamers,” as Maginn called him — has never had a more enthusiastic and unqualified admirer than the scholarly and accomplished critic, who thus speaks of the imperishable product of his genius:—

“The characteristic peculiarity of the Pilgrim's Progress is, that it is the only work of its kind which possesses a strong human interest. . . . That wonderful book, while it obtains admiration from the most fastidious critics, is loved by those who are too simple to admire it. Dr. Johnson, all whose studies were desultory, and who hated, as he said, to read books through, made an exception in favor of the Pilgrim's Progress. That work was one of the two or three works which he wished longer. It was by no common merit that the illiterate sectary extracted praise like this from the most pedantic of critics, and the most bigoted of Tories. In the wildest parts of Scotland, the Pilgrim's Progress is the delight of the peasantry. In every nursery, the Pilgrim's Progress is a greater favorite than Jack the Giant-Killer. Every reader knows the straight and narrow path as well as he knows a road in which he has gone backward and forward a hundred times. This is the highest miracle of genius, that things which are not should be as though they were, that the imaginations of one mind should become the personal recollections of another. And this miracle the tinker has wrought. There is no ascent, no declivity, no resting-place, no turn-stile with which we are not perfectly acquainted. The wicket-gate, and the desolate swamp which separates it from the City of Destruction; the long line of road, as straight as a rule can make it; the Interpreter's house and all its fair shows; the prisoner in the iron cage; the palace, at the doors of which armed men kept guard, and on the battlements of which walked persons clothed all in gold; the cross and the sepulchre; the steep hill and the pleasant arbor; the stately front of the House Beautiful by the wayside; the chained lions crouching in the porch; the low green Valley of Humiliation, rich with grass, and covered with flocks—all are as well known to us as the sights of our own streets. Then we come to the narrow place where Apollyon strode right across the whole breadth of the way, to stop the journey of Christian, and where afterwards the pillar was set up to testify how bravely the pilgrim had fought the good fight. As we advance, the valley becomes deeper and deeper; the shades of the precipices on both sides fall blacker and blacker; the clouds gather overhead; doleful voices, the clanking of chains, and the rushing of many feet to and fro, are heard through the darkness. The way, hardly discernible in gloom, runs close by the mouth of the burning pit, which sends forth its flames, its noisome smoke, and its hideous shapes to terrify the adventurer. Thence he goes on, amidst the snares and pitfalls, with the mangled bodies of those who have perished lying in the ditch by his side. At the end of the long dark valley, he passes the dens in which the old giants dwelt, amidst the bones of those whom they had slain.

"Then the road passes straight on through a waste moor, till at length the towers of a distant city appear before the traveller; and soon he is in the midst of the innumerable multitudes of Vanity Fair. There are the jugglers and the apes, the shops and the puppet-shows; there are Italian Row, and French Row, and Spanish Row, and British Row, with their crowds of buyers, sellers, and loungers, jabbering all the languages of the earth.

"Thence we go on by the little hill of the silver mine, and through the meadow of lilies, along the bank of that pleasant river, which is bordered on both sides by fruit-trees. On the left, branches off the path leading to the horrible castle, the court-yard of which is paved with the skulls of pilgrims; and right onward are the sheepfolds and orchards of the Delectable Mountains.

"From the Delectable Mountains, the way lies through the fogs and briers of the Enchanted Ground, with here and there a bed of soft cushions spread under a green arbor; and beyond is the land of Beulah, where the flowers, the grapes, and the songs of birds never cease, and where the sun shines night and day. Thence are plainly seen the golden pavements and streets of pearl, on the other side of that black and cold river, over which there is no bridge.

"All the stages of the journey, all the forms which cross or overtake the pilgrims, giants, and hobgoblins, ill-favored ones and shining ones; the tall, comely, swarthy Madam Bubble, with her great purse by her side, and her fingers playing with the money; the black man in the bright vesture, Mr. Worldly Wiseman, and my Lord Hategood; Mr. Talkative, and Mrs. Timorous—all are actually existing beings to us. We follow the travellers through their allegorical progress with interest not inferior to that with which we follow Elizabeth from Siberia to Moscow, or Jeanie Deans from Edinburgh to London. Bunyan is almost the only writer who ever gave to the abstract the interest of the concrete. In the works of many celebrated authors, men are mere personifications. We have not a jealous man, but jealousy; not a traitor, but perfidy; not a patriot, but patriotism. The mind of Bunyan, on the contrary, was so imaginative, that personifications, when he dealt with them, became men. A dialogue between two qualities, in his dream, has more dramatic effect than a dialogue between two human beings in most plays. . . .

"The style of Bunyan is delightful to every reader, and invaluable as a study to every person who wishes to obtain a wide command over the English language. The vocabulary is the vocabulary of the common people. There is not an expression, if we except a few technical terms of theology, which would puzzle the rudest peasant. We have observed several pages which do not contain a single word of more than two syllables. Yet no writer has said more exactly what he meant to say. For magnificence, for pathos, for vehement exhortation, for subtle disquisition, for every purpose of the poet, the orator, and the divine, this homely dialect, the dialect of plain working-men, was perfectly sufficient. There is no book in our literature on which we would so readily stake the fame of the old unpolluted English language, no book which shows so well how rich that language is in its own proper wealth, and how little it has been improved by all that it has borrowed. . . . Though there were many clever men in England during the latter half of the seventeenth century, there were only two minds which possessed the imaginative faculty in a very eminent degree. One of those minds produced the Paradise Lost, the other the Pilgrim's Progress."

With this citation, we must close our observations on the Critical and Historical Essays, and proceed to the consideration of Mr. Macaulay's poetry.

On this, it is not our intention to say much. One small volume contains all he has written, or, at any rate, chosen to preserve by publication. His Lays of the Roundheads, contributed in his college-days to Knight's Magazine, appear to have been left uncollected in the pages of that journal; and of the Lays of the League, published in the same periodical, he has only reprinted Irry—A Song of the Huguenots; and a short fragment, entitled The Armada, as examples of those performances. His brilliant reputation as a reviewer and an essayist has obscured the milder shining of his first poetical attempts; and it was pretty well forgotten that he had ever written verses, when, in 1842, he surprised and gratified the public by his Lays of Ancient Rome. The applause which greeted the appearance of this volume was rather more enthusiastic than discriminating; owing, perhaps, somewhat to the circumstance, that no such work had been expected from the author, and also to the further fact, that, for some years previously, there had been little poetry of any striking merit published. There is no doubt that the Lays are masterly productions of this class; but it is quite as certain that they do not belong to the higher kinds of poetry. As a man of poetical genius, Macaulay cannot be said to rank with the greater minds of his age; not with Wordsworth, Byron, Coleridge, Keats, or Shelley, or even with Scott; his position is on some lower elevation, on some ledge or pinnacle of Parnassus, where the air is less ethereal, and where the awful voices of the gods are heard with less distinctness. He is not so remarkable for originality or comprehensiveness of poetic power, as for his skill in dealing with poetical materials. His prominent excellences are those of the gifted and well-practised artist. The Roman Lays are forcible and eloquent versifications of ancient Roman legends; but most of the essential poetry they contain belongs rather to the subjects than to the conceptions of the writer. No man sees his object more clearly than Macaulay, or can paint it more vividly to the perceptions of his reader. No one is more studious of the effects of contrast, and the appropriate grouping of events and incidents. No one can surpass him in the art of producing a vivid and picturesque impression. With true poetic sympathy, he projects himself into the scenes and incidents to be described, and depicts them with a minute distinctness, as of one speaking with the authority of a witness. These abrupt martial chants of his do really make us, to some extent, acquainted with the actual life and manners of the early Romans; with the bravery and fortitude of the Roman character; and the patriotic devotion and fidelity, which was the distinction of the Roman citizen. Some of the singular traditions which make up the early portions of Roman history, and which, before the advent of Niebuhr, were regarded as mere ridiculous fables, Macaulay has here restored to us in shape which can be supposed to resemble that in which they were originally sung by the early Latin minstrels. Identifying himself with these minstrels, and adopting what he conceives to have been the ideas and sentiments by which they were inspired, he has given us spirited versions of the stories of Horatius Cocles, the battle of the Lake Regillus, the death of Virginia, and the prophecy of Copys. The style is bold, abrupt, and energetic, and but little tinged with imagery; and the narration proceeds with a rapidity and directness not unlike the hurrying movements of an army in the height of conflict.

The lay of "Horatius" is supposed to have been "made about the year of the city 360," and describes how Horatius, with two companions, defended the bridge across the Tiber, in the face of a large army brought against the city, under the command of Lars* Porsena of Clusium, in Etruria, for the purpose of re-establishing the kingly family of the Tarquins, whom the Roman people had recently expelled. — "The Battle of the Lake Regillus" is represented to have been produced about ninety years after the lay of Horatius. Some persons mentioned in the Horatius are introduced again, and certain appellations and epithets used in that ballad are purposely repeated; "for," remarks Mr. Macaulay, "in an age of ballad poetry, it scarcely ever fails to happen, that certain phrases come to be appropriated to certain men and things, and are regularly applied to those men and things, by every minstrel." This lay is supposed to have been "sung at the feast of Castor and Pollux;" and it relates how the Romans gained a victory over the Latines near Lake Regillus, through being visibly assisted by those deities—the much-honored "great twin-brethren;" and how the feast, in commemoration of their august services, came to be first instituted. Of course, the poet's object, in this and the other ballads, is to furnish us with animated descriptions of Roman scenery and manners, and to illustrate, as thoroughly as possible, the habits, actions, and modes of feeling which characterized the Roman people. "Virginia" is the story of a maiden who was stabbed by her father, to save her from dishonor; and it purports to be "fragments of a lay sung in the Forum,"

* Lars, lar, signifies a lord or chief.

on the day when certain tribunes of the commons had been elected for the fifth time, in the year of the city 382. It commemorates the reëstablishment of the tribuneship as a power in the state, on the downfall of the decemvirate, or Council of Ten, by which Rome, during the ascendancy of the patricians, had been governed and oppressed; the immediate cause of that downfall being an attempt made by Appius Claudius Crassus, one of the Ten, upon the chastity of a beautiful young girl of humble birth. "The story ran, that the decemvir, unable to succeed by bribes and solicitations, resorted to an outrageous act of tyranny. A vile dependent of the Claudian house laid claim to the damsel as his slave. The cause was brought before the tribunal of Appius. The wicked magistrate, in defiance of the clearest proofs, gave judgment for the claimant. But the girl's father, a brave soldier, saved her from servitude and dishonor by stabbing her to the heart in the sight of the whole Forum. That blow was the signal for a general explosion. Camp and city rose at once; the Ten were pulled down; the tribuneship was reëstablished; and Appius escaped the hands of the executioner only by a voluntary death." This ballad, though not the happiest in versification, is perhaps the most interesting of the series. The "Prophecy of Copys" relates to the founding of Rome, and in it the supposed minstrel runs over some of the principal events connected with its early history. Copys is an imaginary seer of the time of Romulus, old and sightless; and his prophecy is represented as being addressed to that personage when he visited the seer, just before his departure from Alba for the purpose of founding a new city. The lay is stated to have been "sung at the banquet in the Capitol, on the day whereon Manius Curius Dentatus, a second time consul, triumphed over King Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, in the year of the city 479." Like all the others, it is written with much spirit, but it is less attractive than the rest, on account of its lacking the interest which attaches to personal exploits and adventure. Romulus is too remote and too hypothetical a being for human sympathy to be concerned with; whilst the war with the Tarentines is referred to in terms too vague and general to make anything approaching to a powerful impression. This may very well accord with the shadowy peculiarities of prophecy, but it unquestionably impairs the interest of the ballad. The collection altogether, however, forms a lively representation of some of the most prominent features of Roman life and manners, as far as such a picture can be rendered from the legends and traditions in which the primitive facts of Roman history are embodied.

It has been observed that, to be properly appreciated, Mr. Macaulay's ballads must be read continuously; their merit is not to be seen in isolated passages, but lies in the substance and progressive interest of the story, and in the spirit and animation with which it is developed. The only way of furnishing a fair specimen of the Lays, would be to quote one of them entire; but as their length, and other obvious reasons, preclude us from doing this, the best method open to us seems to be that of selecting from some given ballad such passages as can be detached, and connecting them with a prose epitome of the remainder. The lay of "Horatius" appears best adapted to such a plan; and in this way we accordingly proceed to deal with it.

It opens with the announcement that Lars Porsena had sworn by the "Nine Gods" to restore "the great house of Tarquin;" and he accordingly sends messengers to call together, from the several towns and villages of Etruria, all the people capable of bearing arms, naming a day on which they were to assemble, preparatory to the march to Rome. His commands are instantaneously obeyed:—

The horsemen and the footmen
Are pouring in amain
From many a stately market-place,
From many a fruitful plain;
From many a lonely hamlet,
Which, hid by beech and pine,
Like an eagle's nest, hangs on the crest
Of purple Apennine.

From many places specified by name; the united forces amounting to fourscore thousand foot and ten thousand horsemen. "Thirty chosen prophets," esteemed "the wisest of the land," are officially consulted respecting the prospects of the enterprise, and they with one accord encourage Porsena to proceed with it, and promise him a "return in glory." Meanwhile, from all the country about the Tiber, the people, in tumult and consternation, hastily take flight to Rome; and for two days and nights the roads, for a mile around the city, were stopped up by the multitude. Aged folks on crutches, women with young children, sick men borne on litters, and troops of sunburnt husbandmen with staves and reaping-hooks, and droves of mules and asses laden with skins of wine, and endless flocks of cattle, and trains of wagons, creaking beneath the weight of household goods; these, in thick confusion and impatience, throng for entrance at the gates. From the Tarpeian rock, the pale burghers behold at midnight the line of blazing villages which marks the advances of the enemy; and every hour some hasty horseman comes in with new tidings of dismay. Eastward and westward, the whole country is ravaged and burnt up; the fortress of Janiculum* is stormed, and the guards thereof are

* Janiculum was a hill beyond the Tiber, which had been incorporated within the city, and fortified as an outpost, or bulwark, against Etruria.

alain; and now the way is clear for the destroying foemen right up to the Tiber bridge. In haste, and with aching hearts, the consul and the senate go down to the River-gate, and there hold "a council standing;" short time, indeed, there was for "musing or debate;" and the consul instantly decides that "the bridge must straight go down;" for Janiculum being lost, nothing else could save the city. Just then, a scout comes in to say, that "Lars Porsena is here;" and the consul, turning his eye westward, perceives the storm of dust which is raised by the army on its march. And nearer comes the whirlwind of its motion; and louder and more distinctly, from underneath the rolling cloud, is heard the sounding of the trumpets, and the trampling and the nameless hum, that announce the nearness of a multitude. "In broken gleams of dark-blue light," a long array of spears and helmets is gradually discerned, and the banners of proud chiefs rise high above; and, higher than all, is seen the "banner of proud Clusium." The warlike lords of many cities are seen and recognized; and among them is Lars Porsena, in an "ivory car," with Mamilius, Prince of Latium, riding by the wheel on one side, and on the other "false Sextus, that wrought the deed of shame," alluding to the outrage on Lucretia. The presence of Sextus excites the scorn and curses of the Romans.

A yell that rent the firmament
From all the town arose.
On the house-tops was no woman
But spat towards him and hissed:
No child but screamed out curses,
And shook its little fist.

But the brow of the consul was sad, and his speech was very low; for he discerns that the van of the enemy is likely to be upon them before the bridge goes down, and that, unless something can be done to check their progress, and so gain a little time, there is no chance left of keeping them out of possession of the town.

"Then out spake brave Horatius,
The captain of the Gate:
"To every man upon this earth
Death cometh soon or late.
And how can man die better
Than facing fearful odds
For the ashes of his fathers,
And the temples of his gods;

"And for the tender mother
Who dandled him to rest;
And for the wife who nurses
His baby at her breast;
And for the holy maidens
Who feed the eternal flame—
To save them from false Sextus,
That wrought the deed of shame?"

"Hew down the bridge, Sir Consul,
With all the speed ye may;
I, with two more to help me,
Will hold the foe in play.
In yon straight path a thousand
May well be stopped by three.
Now who will stand on either hand,
And keep the bridge with me?"

Spurius Lartius, and strong Herminius, step forward, and offer to support him in the undertaking, and the consul expresses his approval.

"Horatius," quoth the consul,
"As thou sayest, so let it be."
And straight against that great array Forth went the dauntless three.
For Romans in Rome's quarrel
Spared neither land nor gold;
Nor son nor wife, nor limb, nor life,
In the brave days of old.

Then none was for a party;
Then all were for the state;
Then the great man helped the poor,
And the poor man loved the great.
Then lands were fairly portioned;
Then spoils were fairly sold:
The Romans were like brothers
In the brave days of old.

While the three are tightening on their harness, the consul and the people proceed to break down the bridge; and meanwhile the Tuscan army advances slowly to the spot where the dauntless three stand waiting to oppose the entire host. Presently three chieftains from the hostile ranks confront them, and are instantly struck down, and slain by the brave Romans. Many others follow, and fall in like manner. Horatius, however, gets wounded in the thigh, whereat the Tuscans for a while rejoice; yet he still stands up with his companions, and the three successfully defend the bridge against all assailants, until such time as the people behind them have loosened it ready for falling. As it hangs tottering above the stream, the Fathers call loudly to Horatius and the others to come back before it drops:—

Back darted Spurius Lartius;
Herminius darted back;
And, as they passed, beneath their feet
They felt the timbers crack;
But when they turned their faces,
And on the further shore
Saw brave Horatius stand alone,
They would have crossed once more.

But, with a crash like thunder,
Fell every loosened beam;
And, like a dam, the mighty wreck
Lay right athwart the stream:

Alone stood brave Horatius,
But constant still in mind ;
Thrice thirty thousand foes before,
And the broad flood behind.
"Down with him !" cried false Sextus,
With a smile on his pale face.
"Now yield thee," cried Lars Porsena,
"Now yield thee to our grace."

Round turned he, as not deigning
Those craven ranks to see ;
Nought spake he to Lars Porsena,
To Sextus nought spake he ;
But he saw on Palatinus
The white porch of his home ;
And he spake to the noble river
That rolls by the towers of Rome :

"O Tiber ! Father Tiber !
To whom the Romans pray,
A Roman's life, a Roman's arms,
Take thou in charge this day."
So he spake, and speaking, sheathed
The good sword by his side,
And with his harness on his back,
Plunged headlong in the tide.

No sound of joy or sorrow
Was heard from either bank ;
But friends and foes in dumb surprise,
With parted lips and straining eyes,
Stood gazing where he sank ;
And when above the surges
They saw his crest appear,
All Rome sent forth a rapturous cry,
And even the ranks of Tuscany
Could scarce forbear to cheer.

But fiercely ran the current,
Swollen high by months of rain ;
And fast his blood was flowing,
And he was sore in pain,
And heavy with his armor,
And spent with changing blows ;
And oft they thought him sinking,
But still again he rose.

Ne'er, I ween, did swimmer,
In such an evil case,
Struggle through such a raging flood
Safe to the landing-place :
But his limbs were borne up bravely
By the brave heart within,
And our good Father Tiber
Bare bravely up his chin.

"Curse on him !" quoth false Sextus ;
"Will not the villain drown ?
But for this stay, ere close of day
We should have sacked the town !"
"Heaven help him !" quoth Lars Porsena,
"And bring him safe to shore ;
For such a gallant feat of arms
Was never seen before."

And now he feels the bottom ;
Now on dry earth he stands ;
Now round him throng the Fathers
To press his gory hands ;

And now, with shouts and clapping,
And noise of weeping loud,
He enters through the River-gate,
Borne by the joyous crowd.

They gave him of the corn-land,
That was of public right,
As much as two strong oxen
Could plough from morn till night ;
And they made a molten image,
And set it up on high ;
And there it stands unto this day
To witness if I lie.

It stands in the Comitium,
Plain for all folks to see —
Horatius in his harness,
Halting upon one knee :
And underneath is written,
In letters all of gold,
How valiantly he kept the bridge
In the brave days of old.

And still his name sounds stirring
Unto the men of Rome,
As the trumpet-blast that cries to them
To charge the Volscian home ;
And wives still pray to Juno
For boys with hearts as bold
As his who kept the bridge so well
In the brave days of old.

And in the nights of winter,
When the cold north winds blow,
And the long howling of the wolves
Is heard amidst the snow ;
When round the lonely cottage
Roars loud the tempest's din,
And the good logs of Algidus
Roar louder yet within ;

When the oldest cask is opened,
And the largest lamp is lit ;
When the chestnuts glow in the embers,
And the kid turns on the spit ;
When young and old in circle
Around the firebrands close ;
When the girls are weaving baskets,
And the lads are shaping bows ;

When the goodman mends his armor,
And trims his helmet's plume ;
When the goodwife's shuttle merrily
Goes flashing through the loom ;
With weeping and with laughter
Still is the story told,
How well Horatius kept the bridge
In the brave days of old.

The reader must acknowledge these to be strong and stirring verses, bespeaking a fine talent in the author, such as entitles him to no mean place among his poetical contemporaries. Excepting the metrical romances of Scott, we know of no poetry devoted to war-like subjects which can justly be considered more vigorous and excellent. Indeed, in many of the nicer touches of execution, Macaulay surpasses Scott, and turns his matter to a more graceful and adroit effect than Sir

Walter could have done. His versification is in general more flexible and fluent; rugged phrases and bald expressions less frequently occur; and, upon the whole, Macaulay may be said to have given the ballad-form of poetry a more polished and finished shape than it had ever reached in the hands of preceding writers. Of the specific worth of such poetry, there need be little said. It is plain that it makes no appeal to the more profound interests or emotions of human nature; it reveals no great or influential truths; it enforces no lofty views of man and his relations; it is simply a refined divertissement—a beautiful and pleasant product of the fancy, fit for the entertainment of a vacant or a pensive hour. But it is not to be overlooked, that it has no pretensions to a higher aim; although, such as it is, it completely fulfils its purpose. Nor let it be ever said, that the time spent in reading it is thrown away; for, in presenting attractive pictures of ancient nobleness; in the sympathy which it excites for deeds of heroism, generosity, and faithfulness, it does unquestionably communicate a portion of that influence by which men are stimulated to kindred deeds and virtues. The tone that pervades the Lays is eminently healthful, robust, and manly: it has something of the old Roman virtus in it—manliness, hardihood, intense appreciation of whatever becomes a man; and he assuredly deserves well of the community who, in enervated and artificial times, infuses into it any portion of that old invincibility of mind and spirit, or even arouses it to a temporary admiration of any of the memorable manifestations of such a temper. Something of this service the Lays of Ancient Rome are calculated to render; and they are further valuable, as having a tendency to counteract that feeble superfineness of sentiment and imagery which has become too much the characteristic of our recent poetry. Young poets would do well to study diligently these homely and but little-adorned productions, and learn how incomparably more effective is a chaste and vigorous simplicity of style and diction, than can be any profusion or display of elaborated ornament.

In his History of England, Mr. Macaulay has purposed to write the history of our country, from the accession of James II. down to a time which is within the memory of men still living. The two volumes that have been issued present us with a rapid survey of the condition of Britain under the various forms of social life and government which it underwent from the invasion by the Romans to the accession of the Stuarts; followed by a comprehensive account of the origin of the disputes which brought Charles I. into collision with his parliament—the wars and confusions that succeeded—the Protectorate of Cromwell—the Restoration and the reign of Charles II.—and the final contest between king and people, which resulted in the memorable Revolution of 1688. The second volume closes with the proclamation of William and Mary; and, as the preliminary sketch occupies but little more than half a volume, the work, so far as it has proceeded, may be properly accounted a history of the great constitutional struggle which led to the expulsion of James II., and the settlement of the crown upon the Prince of Orange. In subsequent volumes, the author purposes to relate “how the new settlement was, during many troubled years, successfully defended against foreign and domestic enemies; how, under that settlement, the authority of law and the security of property were found to be compatible with a liberty of discussion and of individual action never before known; how, from the auspicious union of order and freedom, sprang a prosperity, of which the annals of human affairs had furnished no example; how our country, from a state of ignominious vassalage, rapidly rose to the place of umpire among European powers; how her opulence and her martial glory grew together; how, by wise and resolute good faith, was gradually established a public credit, fruitful of marvels which, to the statesman of any former age, would have seemed incredible; how a gigantic commerce gave birth to a maritime power, compared with which every other maritime power, ancient or modern, sinks into insignificance; how Scotland, after ages of enmity, was at length united to England—not merely by legal bonds, but by indissoluble ties of interest and affection; how, in America, the British colonies rapidly became far mightier and wealthier than the realms which Cortez and Pizarro had added to the dominions of Charles V.; how, in Asia, British adventurers founded an empire not less splendid and more durable than that of Alexander.”

But, in connection with these triumphs, he considers it not the less his duty to record faithfully the disasters which the country has at intervals sustained, as well as the great national crimes and follies which are more humiliating than disasters. He conceives, however, that “the general effect of this checkered narrative will be to excite thankfulness in all religious minds, and hope in the breasts of all patriots. For the history of our country during the last hundred and sixty years, is eminently the history of physical, of moral, and of intellectual improvement. Those who compare the age on which their lot has fallen with a golden age which exists only in their imagination, may talk of degeneracy and decay; but no man who is correctly informed as to the past, will be disposed to take a morose or desponding view of the present.”

In one important respect, this history differs materially from all preceding histories in the language. The author thinks he should very imperfectly execute his task if he were "merely to treat of battles and sieges, of the rise and fall of administrations, of intrigues in the palace, and of debates in the parliament." Accordingly, he observes, "It will be my endeavor to relate the history of the people as well as the history of the government; to trace the progress of useful and ornamental arts; to describe the rise of religious sects, and the changes of literary taste; to portray the manners of successive generations; and not to pass by with neglect even the revolutions which have taken place in dress, furniture, repasts, and public amusements. I shall cheerfully bear the reproach of having descended below the dignity of history, if I can succeed in placing before the English of the nineteenth century a true picture of the life of their ancestors."

We believe it is generally admitted by the most competent judges that, in the portion of the work already published, Mr. Macaulay has executed his difficult undertaking with extraordinary ability and success. It has indeed been objected, that he has only succeeded in presenting his readers with a graceful and entertaining narrative; and that, as regards the suggestive and instructive uses of historical delineation, the book is commonplace and superficial. We presume that, being as it is to a certain extent a party history, it will be some time before its actual proportions of merit and defect will be generally apprehended and acknowledged. It may interest some, however, to learn what was the opinion of such a critic as the late Lord Jeffrey. "I deny utterly," says he, "the two propositions — first, that Macaulay has aimed chiefly at interesting and entertaining his readers; and second, that he has (either studiously or indolently) put them on a scanty allowance of instruction, admonition, or suggestion. As to the last, I will maintain boldly . . . that no historian of any age has been so prodigal of original and profound reflective suggestion, say, and weighty and authoritative decision, also, on innumerable questions of great difficulty and general interest; though these precious contributions are not ostentatiously ticketed and labelled, as separate gifts to mankind, but woven, with far better grace and effect, into the net-tissue of the story. And then, as to his aiming only to interest and amuse, I say first, that though he has attained that end, it is only incidentally, and not by aiming at it as an end at all; and second, that, in good truth, it is chiefly by his success in the higher object at which he did aim, that he has really delighted and interested his readers. The vivacity and color of his style may have been the first attraction of many to his volumes; but I feel assured that it is the impression of the weight, and novelty, and clearness of the information conveyed — the doubts dispelled — the chaos reduced to order — the mastery over facts and views formerly so perplexing, and now so pleasingly imparted, that have given the book its great and universal charm, and settled it in the affections of all its worthy admirers."*

With regard to the political objects of the work, and to the principles it is designed to illustrate, Lord Jeffrey remarks further: — "I take it, that it was with a view to certain great truths that this history was undertaken; and these, which I think it has made out beyond all further contradiction, are — first, the intolerable and personally hateful tyranny of the Stuarts; second, the absolute necessity of at least as radical and marked a revolution as was effected in 1688; and third, the singular felicity with which that revolution was saved from the stain of blood, and all crimes of violence, by the peculiar relation in which William stood to the dynasty, and the still more peculiar character and European position of that great prince. Had he not been in the line of succession, we should have had an attempt at a new commonwealth, and another civil war; and had he not been partly an alien, and looking more to European than merely English interests, the victory in that war must have been of one section of the people over another, with all the ranklings and aggravated antipathies which the mere predominance of a sort of neutral party, or common umpire, tended to suppress and extinguish. These points I think Macaulay has made out triumphantly; and not by eloquent and lively writing, but by patient and copious accumulation, and lucid arrangement of facts and details, often separately insignificant, but constituting at last an induction, which leaves no shade of doubt on the conclusion. This book, therefore, has already, in the course of three little months, scattered to the winds, and swept finally from the minds of all thinking Englishmen, those lingerings of Jacobite prejudice, which the eloquence and perversions of Hume, and the popular talents of Scott, and other writers of fiction, had restored to our literature, and but too much familiarized to our feelings, in the last fifty years. This is a great work, and a great triumph; and ought, I think, so to be hailed and rejoiced in. All convertible men must now be disabused of their prejudices, and all future generations grow up in a light round which no cloud can again find means to gather."†

This criticism, though of the defensive sort, may be accepted as a fair and sensible estimate of the prominent merits of the work.

Of its few inaccuracies of fact, of its occasional dogmatism, and of the insufficiency of the judgments given on certain questions respecting which differences of opinion are still inevitable, there is nothing to be said which would be likely to profit or interest the reader. These are questions which demand of readers a familiar acquaintance with the sources whence the materials of the history are drawn, and may for the present be left to the consideration of those who have time and opportunity for minute investigation. Our object throughout has been to exhibit the leading peculiarities of Macaulay's genius; to state the nature, and point out the most striking characteristics of his writings, and to prepare the uninitiated to enter on the study of them with an intelligent appreciation. This object we have now in some sort accomplished, and we accordingly leave the reader to extend his knowledge of these writings as opportunity may admit; distinctly assuring him, that the time and attention required for their perusal will be amply repaid.

ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL RINGS.—We have been favored with a copy of a catalogue, drawn up, for private reference, by Mr. Crofton Croker, of an interesting collection of rings and personal ornaments in the possession of Lady Londesborough. The collection consists of two hundred and fifty objects of personal ornament, the nucleus of which was formed by Mr. George Isaacs—rings, bracelets, fibulae, and gems, British, Gallic, German, Italian, Egyptian, Greek, Hebrew, and others; and Mr. Croker's notes, with their curious and entertaining information about rings—talismanic, cabalistic, episcopal, or pontifical, signet, gemmel, and betrothal rings—convey some relish of the pleasure to be derived from actual inspection of her ladyship's jewel-case.

"That objects at the first sight so apparently trivial as rings should engage the attention of the curious," says Mr. Croker in a pleasant prefatory letter addressed to Lady Londesborough, "is not remarkable to any one who has examined the learned and instructive though incomplete work of Liectus on the subject, with the works of Goriæus and Goria; although it must be acknowledged that they contain much more respecting the ancient gems which were set in rings than respecting the ring itself. However, so important was this branch of goldsmithery considered in the middle ages, as to invest a body of artists with the distinctive title of anliers."

"Nor should the claims that the ring has on our regard, through the vast cycle of ages over which its history extends, be forgotten—its power and its poetry; its alliance with religion and with love; with chivalry and commerce; with magic and the superstitious speculations of our forefathers; its influence upon art and alchemy or chemistry, and their combined power upon the science of manufactures and medicines.

Viewed under any of these several aspects, volumes might be written upon the ring, and the amount of thought or ingenuity of fabrication which,

Through climes and ages,

have been bestowed upon personal decoration.

"But, madame, beyond all the rings and personal ornaments which you now possess, or hereafter may become possessed of, let me refer you to the one plain gold ring which you constantly wear. I believe it to be, as far as cordial feelings in union with sacred rites can hallow any ring, a gift far more precious than the most costly tiara of diamonds could possibly be, and more valued as a pledge of affection than the whole collection which repose in Marie-Louise's casket." [The collection, purchased from Mr. Isaacs by Mr. Croker for Lord Londesborough, in 1850, and subsequently augmented by his lordship, is now contained in the jewel-case of the Empress Marie-Louise.]—Spectator.

APPLICATION OF A CURIOUS PHYSIOLOGICAL DISCOVERY.—It has long been known to physiologists that certain coloring matters, if administered to animals along with their food, possess the property of entering into the system and tinging the bones. In this way the bones of swine have been tinged purple by madder, and instances are on record of other animals being similarly affected. No attempt, however, was made to turn this beautiful discovery to account until lately, when M. Roulin speculated on what might have been the consequences of administering colored articles of food to silkworms just before spinning their cocoons. His first experiments were conducted with indigo, which he mixed in certain proportions with the mulberry leaves serving the worms for food. The result of this treatment was successful—he obtained blue cocoons. Prosecuting still further his experiments, he sought a red coloring matter capable of being eaten by the silkworms without injury resulting. He had some difficulty to find such a coloring matter at first, but eventually alighted on the Bignonia chica. Small portions of this plant having been added to the mulberry leaves, the silkworms consumed the mixture, and produced red-colored silk. In this manner the experimenter, who is still prosecuting his researches, hopes to obtain silk as secreted by the worm of many colors.—Times.

Outlines of Scripture Geography and History; illustrating the Historical Portions of the Old and New Testaments. Designed for the use of Schools and Private Reading. By Edward Hughes, F. R. A. S., &c.

A well-executed compilation; the matter derived from the best travellers in the East, and the more remarkable descriptions quoted in their own words. The outlines, however, are rather a series of short papers on the places mentioned in Scripture, than a "geography" in the school sense of the term. Perhaps the Ante-Abrahamic period is too fully gone into.—Spectator.

THE ASYLUM OF THE WORLD.

We do not know whether there was any foundation for the assertion of the Times, that some foreign governments were about to show such a degree of futile and foolish irritation as to apply to Great Britain for the expulsion of the refugees from various countries who have sought safety on our shores ; — but most assuredly, if there has been any such intention, the firm, manly, and temperate language of Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons on Tuesday night will have sufficed to prevent its being carried into execution. In reply to an inquiry from Lord Dudley Stuart, Lord Palmerston (in the absence of Lord John Russell) said : —

In answer to the question of the Noble Lord as to whether an application has been made by foreign powers to the government of this country for the expulsion of foreign refugees now living in the United Kingdom, I have to state that no such application has been made. In reply to the other question of the Noble Lord, as to what course would be pursued in the event of such an application being made, I can only repeat that which I think has been stated on former occasions in this house, that any such application would be met with a firm and decided refusal. It is, indeed, obvious that it must be so, because no such measure could be taken by the government of this country without fresh powers by Act of Parliament ; and I apprehend that no government could, even if they were so inclined — and the present government are not so inclined — apply for such a power with any chance of success, inasmuch as no Alien Bill, I believe, within the course of this century has been passed ever giving to the government the power of expelling foreigners, except with reference to considerations connected with the internal safety of this country. The British government has never undertaken to provide for the internal security of other countries ; it is sufficient for them to have the power to provide for the internal security of their own. But I cannot confine my answer simply to that statement. I will ask to be allowed to add, that while, on the one hand, the British laws, and the spirit of the British constitution, give to foreigners of all political opinions and of all categories, a secure and peaceful shelter within this country, I think that those foreigners who avail themselves of the hospitality of England are bound by every principle of honor, as well as by every regard, not only to international law, but to the law of this land — are bound to abstain from entering into any intrigues, or from pursuing any courses intended for the purpose of giving umbrage to foreign governments, and of disturbing the internal tranquillity of any foreign countries.

Every sentiment of this terse, vigorous, and well-considered answer will be echoed by all ranks and classes, whatever be their party connections or political predilections. Lord Palmerston has spoken the mind of the whole nation. We have often thought of late that Englishmen were growing so lazy, so sensible, and so unsensitive, that nothing short of a slap in the face would rouse them into indignation, or win from them anything beyond a gentle and a pathetic smile. But if anything less startling could awaken us from our torpor, goad us to put forth our whole strength, and unite us all as one man to repel insult or aggression, it would be a proposal on the part of the triumphant autocrats of Europe that we should violate the duties of hospitality towards the victims of their oppression and the fugitives from their vengeance.

The absurdity of such a demand would be only equalled by its ungracefulness. With what face could a proposal that we should refuse asylum on our shores to proscribed and outlawed politicians be made by men who have themselves sought and found protection here when the fortunes of war or of civil contest went against them ? What ! we have sheltered in their hour of need those whose conduct had outraged every feeling of our nature and every principle of our creed, and are we not to shelter in their turn those with whom we sympathize from the very bottom of our hearts ? We have opened our doors to the escaping guilty : — are we to close them on the flying unfortunate ? We have stood between the oppressor and the popular vengeance which he had long courted and at length aroused ; — are we not to stand between the oppressed and those who would pursue him into the sanctuary and seize him at the very horns of the altar ? We received Louis Napoleon, though we could not suppress our contempt at his silly and miserable descent upon Boulogne, and though his attempt had been against the throne of a close, and then a faithful, ally. We received Charles X., though he had forfeited his throne by an attack upon that liberty of the press which we cherished as our dearest privilege. We received Louis Philippe, though he had deceived us meanly, and though the demand which upset him was “ Parliamentary Reform.” We offered a refuge to Metternich, though the policy which he had long pursued and for which he was compelled to fly was one which we abhorred from our inmost soul. We sheltered even Ledru Rollin with his associates, though we loathed his brutal doctrines and his sanguinary plans ; we sheltered him, though the attentat for which he was obliged to fly was rather a crime against society than a mere political offence ; we shelter him still, though he has repaid our hospitality by pouring out his frothy venom against our nation and our institutions. And, finally, we should again afford the protection of our island (if it were again needed) even to the Emperor of Austria and the Emperor of France — possibly even to the Pope and the King of Naples—though we hold the first to be a lawless despot, and though words can do but feeble justice to the detestation with which the last is regarded at every English hearth.

And having done all these things—questionable perhaps and certainly against the grain—are we to abstain, at the bidding of those whom we so thanklessly served, from similar charities, when we can render them with a clear conscience and a ready will? Having harbored—and sinned perhaps in doing so—the fugitives from freedom, are we to be debarred from harboring also the fugitives from oppression—and thereby atoning for our previous misplaced benevolence? Are we to warn away Kossuth and Mazzini from their last asylum? It was natural enough that the former reception of the Hungarian Patriot in this country should have given umbrage to the Austrian authorities, for it was ostentatious, noisy, and unprecedented in its enthusiasm and spontaneity. In that popular display we did not join, nor did many of the higher classes of Great Britain; for, while acknowledging the great powers of the Magyar Leader, his wonderful eloquence, his earnest patriotism, and the love and almost worship with which he is regarded by his countrymen at home—we believed then, and believe still, that to his injudicious zeal in proclaiming the severance of Hungary from Austria and the establishment of a republic, may be traced all the calamities which have subsequently overwhelmed that unhappy country—the intestine divisions which lost their cause, the interference of Russia, the surrender of Vilagos, and the destruction of their ancient liberties. But the majority of the British people, who received Kossuth with such exuberant welcome, did not enter into these considerations; they merely knew that he was the idol of the Hungarian people, and their chosen governor; that the Emperor of Austria, by perjury and violence and foreign aid, had trodden down a constitution similar to our own, and had violated hereditary rights as sacred and as long-descended as those of which we make our boast; and that of this constitution and these rights Kossuth had been the representative and the defender. They expressed their sentiments as Englishmen are wont; and we can well imagine that their acclamations must have been gall and wormwood to the cabinet at Vienna. But that is now an old story. Since his return from America, the Magyar Chief has been silent and unnoticed—keeping his own counsel, and biding his own time; and there is not the slightest evidence that he had the remotest concern either with the outbreak at Milan* or with the attempted assassination at Vienna.

* Since the proclamation published in his name turns out a forgery.

With regard to Mazzini the case is still stronger. England has shown him no sympathy, invited him to no fêtes, cheered and strengthened him by no popular encouragement; it is even believed that she owes him atonement for a great wrong committed some years ago. She has merely given him, what she has given to his worst and meanest enemies—shelter. He has lived among us in the most profound retirement—avoiding all public appearances—his very residence known only to a few intimate friends. What he may have done in the way of correspondence, exhortation, secret planning, we know nothing, and the Austrian government have not been able to discover. While among us he has conducted himself, in all respects and to all appearances, as a peaceful and well-conducted citizen:—and this is all that we are concerned with or have a right to inquire about. If he has been the originator of the outbreak in Lombardy, at all events he has not directed it from England; he appears to be somewhere in or near Italy, and the Austrians must look after him themselves.

While, however, we are prepared to defend the right of asylum against all assailants and impugnors, we are bound to say that that right is abused and endangered by those refugees who seek our shore, not for safety, but as a fortress from which, secure themselves, they can prepare plots against our neighbors and allies. Such conduct is indelicate, ungenerous, and dangerous. Our laws and customs give us no means of watching or controlling such behavior. In case of any overt act we can and do interfere. If any of these refugees were to procure or send out arms and ammunition, or to fit out vessels for a descent upon foreign shores, we should be bound at once to arrest both the proceedings and the culprits—and we should assuredly do so with the utmost promptitude. It is not alleged, however, that any of the obnoxious refugees who have found shelter with us have proceeded so far as this. Once, and once only, so far as we are aware, has anything of the sort been attempted with success—and in that instance the conspirator was the present Emperor of the French! Still, though our institutions and our feelings both forbid interference with or surveillance over those who have sought refuge with us, these fugitives ought to feel that every consideration of position, of honor, and of prudence, forbids them to make use of the shelter afforded them to carry on machinations or conspiracies against States with which we are at peace and amity. It is hard, no doubt, that they should be prohibited from the great solace of an exile life; it is painful to feel that their hands are tied, their time wasted, and their faculties idle and rusting; it is irritating to think that they can no longer aid their fellow-countrymen who have remained at home in their struggles for the common cause: — but these are the tacit conditions on which a place of refuge has been afforded them. If they were not prepared to accept it on such conditions, they should not have sought it, and they should now quit it: — only on the shores of a nation at war with their oppressors, or amid the concealments and fastnesses of their own land, can they honorably or conscientiously plot, conspire, or levy war against the rulers who have defeated them. If, from the shelter of Claremont or of Brighton, Louis Philippe had planned and procured a counter-revolution in France, or Metternich had arranged an expedition against Hungary — we certainly should have held neither of them guiltless; — and we are not disposed to have one rule for them and another for their rivals and antagonists.

From the Examiner, 5th March.

THE REFUGEE QUESTION.

If the great events of late years have been remarkable for the production of few material results, they may at least be considered to have established some striking and salutary truths. Of these there is none more fully demonstrated than the idleness of seeking to bring about revolution by conspiracy. From 1815 to 1848 Germany could show an interminable series of conspiracies; France was not less fertile in them; and we now know that not one of them succeeded. Premature explosion and treachery invariably disclosed such plots, which had simply the effect of implicating and causing the deaths or exile of many brave men. But if individual parties have thus proved signally powerless in bringing about great political changes or catastrophes, the unanimous sentiment of a people uniting in abhorrence of a system of government, or in detestation of a prince or of a line of princes — when a mere accident has occurred to ignite that popular combustible — has been found to defy alike precaution or resistance, and to carry all before it, both thrones and their defenders, with a violence and fulness of destruction unexampled in ancient times.

If the question be asked how Charles the Tenth, or Louis Philippe, or King Frederic, or the Emperor Francis, could have saved themselves from the terrible revolutions which in some places definitively, in others for a time, overturned their thrones — can it be answered that any vigilance of police, any elimination of dangerous characters, any exile of turbulent and seditious persons, either from their own dominions or from those of their neighbors, would in the least have contributed to strengthen their position, or secure it against the coming convulsion? The fact is, that in the universally civic organization of ancient times, as well as of those Italian states which occupy so large a portion of modern history, conspiracy was really a powerful and efficient mode of operation. But in our later systems of government, whether representative or merely monarchical, with populations of millions to appeal to, depend upon, disgust, or conciliate, anything like individual conspiracy must dwindle into insignificance, unless it be identified with that great conspiracy into which a whole people silently enter without consulting each other, and from the mere tacit sympathy of common resentment and disaffection. If rulers would but look to this large conspiracy and appease it, without idly inquiring who are its chiefs, for in fact it has no chiefs, they would be doing something towards the consolidation of their thrones.

No better proof of the folly and futility of conspiracy could be adduced than the late outbreak at Milan. But it is at the same time a proof of the equal futility of the police system opposed to it; and these blockheads of Austrian jailers and police, who cannot do the work for which they are paid, though to do it they are empowered to tyrannize over the finest country in the world, are said to be about to come to us to ask Englishmen to perform their police work for them, and to issue edicts of proscription against Mazzini and Kossuth, as if their own miserable system of exaction and tyranny did not create Kossuths and Mazzinis in every village, or as if leaders could ever be wanting when the inevitable folly of such governments gives the signal for a starting up from oppression.

Does any one believe that either Kossuth or Mazzini at present obtain anything in England in aid of their designs beyond that general protection which is extended to every exile? The mere question is preposterous. They draw no force from this country. Whatever forces or whatever resources they may have or command must come from their respective countries, not from England; and if so derived, the Austrian cabinet is answerable for it, not England. Nor do we see that the locus standi for conspiracy is better here than in America. If Mazzini sailed from London to Genoa, as is alleged, he must have employed from fifteen to twenty days in the voyage. One-half of that number of days would have brought him from the United States. The exiles of European liberty there are now, when at Boston, as near to the seat of their exploits and to the populations over whom their influence is dreaded, as thirty years ago they were when living in some humble suburb of London. Will the despots of Europe, after striving to induce England to banish from its shore every man guilty of the crime of patriotism or the heresy of constitutionalism, pursue and complete their quest of intolerance by asking the republicans on the other side of the Atlantic also to rob their country of its right to be the asylum of the persecuted and the unfortunate? If they do not this, they do nothing, for the dreaded conspirators will even there still be within ten days' sail of Europe.

But all such diplomatic efforts may be spared. There is fortunately no enactment at present in force that gives an English Government the power to send away the exile from its shores; nor is there a man of influence in Parliament inclined to ask for any such power. If any government had a right to complain or take offence at the governments of other countries for giving asylum to political exiles driven from its dominion, it would certainly be Russia, whose ministers have seen, ever since 1830, fugitive Poles tolerated in England and more than tolerated in France. With what face can Austria and France now come forward to demand from England a violation of that very privilege of offering asylum, which both France and England have determinedly refused to Russia during a long series of years?

Absurd and untenable as such pretensions are on the part of Austria, coming from a ruler of France, and such a ruler as the present, they are as monstrous as ridiculous. We will not dwell on the fact of the emperor, when he was M. Louis Bonaparte, enjoying an asylum in this country, and profiting by it to make bandit forays against France. Examples adduced from his past life have little weight on his decisions at present. But let us consider his position. He holds supreme power by having come in between the death-struggle of two opposed parties and classes, and he keeps power by virtue of their enduring enmity. Both, however, are at bottom decided enemies of his, and no doubt they will do their utmost to overthrow him. Both, let us add, taken together, make the better part of France. They comprise all the upper and intellectual class of society, and all that is energetic or distinguished in the lower. To carry out his demands upon us, therefore, Napoleon the Third must require of England to punish and banish every Frenchman who belongs to these classes. Such wholesale proscription on our part would be in the first place impossible, and in the next place would be useless. France abounds with the political enemies of the emperor, those of the upper class, and those of the lower; get rid of them he cannot; for every second man he meets is in one category or the other. He may forbid association; he may render communication by post unsafe; he may call his police to arrest every gentleman, and every artisan, who utters a hasty ejaculation in the street; but prevent his enemies from living in France, even in Paris, or from meeting and communicating at every corner of every street, and in every saloon which has a door to open or to close, this he cannot do. He could only effect such a purpose by massacring one half of the French people. All the materials of conspiracy are therefore in France, under the very nose of the French emperor; and that similar materials should exist in England cannot add to the danger. Napoleon the Third has chosen a volcano for his throne; and having done so, he really cannot ask us to put out our household fires and extinguish our hospitable virtues, lest a spark from them should fly over and ignite the mass of combustibles on which he has chosen to repose.

From Household Words.

PERFIDIOUS PATMOS.

THE natural place of refuge for a hunted man is an island. None but those who have known what it is to be pursued from place to place, who have been aware of such and such blood-hounds upon their track, of such and such scouts waiting at given points to lead them down to death or captivity, can form an idea of the feeling of security engendered by the knowledge that there is between them and their enemies a bulwark far more impregnable than any gabion, glacis, bastion, or counter-scarp, that Vauban ever dreamed of, in the shape of a ring of blue water. So islands have been, in all ages and circumstances, the chosen places of refuge to men who could find no rest elsewhere for the soles of their feet. Patmos was the elected asylum of St. John the Apostle. In Malta, the last Christian knights of Palestine, driven from their first island refuge—Rhodes—found a haven of safety, and founded a city of strength against the infidels. The expiring embers of the Druidical priesthood smouldered away in the impenetrable groves of the island of Anglesey. The isles of Greece were the eyries of poetry, and art, and liberty, when the mainland groaned beneath the despotism of the thirty tyrants. The Greeks located their paradise in the islands of the blest. Madeira spread forth, pitying, protecting arms to two fugitive lovers. Charles Edward hid in Skye. Once within the pleasant valleys of Pitcairn's Island, Jack Adams and the mutineers of the Bounty felt secure and safe from courts-martial and yard-arms. There is a hiding-place for the pursued of sheriffs in the island of Jersey and in the Isle of Man; in which latter insular refuge Charlotte de la Tremouille, Countess of Derby, sheltered the last remnants of the cause of the Stuarts against Oliver Cromwell. The dogs of Constantinople found protection from the sticks and stones of the men of Stamboul in an island in the Bosphorus. The last of the London marshes staunchly defy drainage from the strongholds of the Isle of Dogs; and there is a wall of strength for the choicest London fevers, and the dirtiest London lodging-houses, against Inspectors Reason and Humanity and their whole force, in and about the mud embankments of Jacob's Island.

But, chief and preëct of islands on which camps of refuge have been built, is the one we are happy enough to live in, the Island of England. There are other islands in the world, far more isolated, geographically speaking, far more distant from hostile continents, far more remote from the shores of despotism. Yet to these chalky cliffs of Albion, to this Refuge misnamed the Perfidious, come refugees from all quarters of the world, and of characters, antecedents, and opinions, pointing to every quarter of the political compass. The oppressor and the oppressed, the absolutist and the patriot, the butcher and the victim, the wolf and the lamb, the legitimist as white as snow and the montagnard as red as blood, the doctrinaire and the socialist—men of views so dissimilar that they would (and do) tear each other to pieces in their own lands, find a common refuge in this country, and live in common harmony here. The very climate seems to have a soothing and mollifying influence on the most savage foreign natures. South American dictators, who have shot, slaughtered, and outraged hecatombs of their countrymen in the parched-up plains of Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, roar you as mildly as any sucking doves as soon as they are in the Southampton water—make pets of their physicians, and give their barbers silver shaving-dishes; pachas of three tails, terrible fellows for bowstringing, impaling, and bastinadoing in their Asiatic dominions, here caper nimbly in ladies' chambers to the twangling of lutes; hangers of men and scourgers of women forego blood-thirstiness; demagogues forget to howl for heads; and red republicans, who were as roaring lions in the lands they came from, submit to have their claws cut, and their manes trimmed, drink penny cups of coffee, and deliver pacific lectures in Mechanics' Institutes.

England, then, is the Patmos of foreign fugitives—a collection of Patmoses, rather; almost every seaport and provincial town of any note having a little inland island of refuge of its own; but London being the great champ d'asile, the monster isle of safety, a Cave of Adullam for the whole world. It is with this Patmos that I have principally to do.

Years ago, Doctor Johnson called London "the common sewer of Paris and of Rome;" but at the present day it is a reservoir, a giant vat, into which flow countless streams of continental immigration. More so than Paris, where the English only go for pleasure; the Germans to become tailors and boot-makers; and the Swiss, valets, house-porters, and waiters. More so than the United States, whose only considerable feed-pipes of emigration are Irish, English and Germans. There is in London the foreign artistic population, among which I will comprise French, and Swiss, and German governesses, French painters, actors, singers and cooks; Italian singers and musicians; French hairdressers, milliners, dressmakers, clear-starchers and professors of legerdemain, with countless teachers of every known language, and professors of every imaginable musical instrument. There is the immense foreign servile population; French and Italian valets and shopmen, and German nurses and nursery-maids. There is the foreign commercial population, a whole colony of Greek merchants in Finsbury, of Germans in the Minories, of Frenchmen round Austin Friars, of Moorish Jews in White-chapel, and of foreign shopkeepers at the west end of the town. There is the foreign mechanical, or laboring population; French, Swiss, and German watch-makers, French and German lithographers, Italian plaster-cast makers and German sugar-bakers, brewers, and leather-dressers. There is the foreign mendicant population; German and Alsatian buy-a-broom girls, Italian hurdy-gurdy grinders, French begging-letter writers (of whose astonishing numbers, those good associations "La Société Française de Bienfaisance à Londres," and "The Friends of Foreigners in Distress," could tell some curious tales may be), Lascar street-sweepers and tom-tom pounders. There is the foreign maritime population; an enormous one, as all men who have seen Jack alive in London can vouch for. There is the foreign respectable population, composed of strangers well to do, who prefer English living and English customs to those of their own country. There is the foreign swindling population; aliens who live on their own wits and on the want thereof in their neighbors; sham counts, barons, and chevaliers; farmers of German lotteries, speculators in German university degrees, forgers of Russian bank-notes, bonnets at gaming-houses, touts and spungers to foreign hotels and on foreign visitors, bilkers of English taverns and boarding-houses, and getters-up of fictitious concerts and exhibitions. There is the foreign visiting or sight-seeing population, who come from Dover to the Hôtel de l'Europe, and go from thence, with a cicerone, to St. Paul's, Windsor, and Richmond, and thence back again to France, Germany, or Spain. Lastly, there is the refugee population; and these be mine to descant upon.

The Patmos of London I may describe as an island bounded by four squares, on the north by that of Soho, on the south by that of Leicester, on the east by the quadrangle of Lincoln's Inn Fields (for the purlieus of Long Acre and Seven Dials are all Patmos), and on the west by Golden Square.

The trapezium of streets enclosed within this boundary are not, by any means, of an aristocratic description. A maze of sorry thoroughfares, a second-rate butcher's meat and vegetable market, two model lodging houses, a dingy parish church, and some "brick barns" of dissent are within its boundaries. No lords or squires of high degree live in this political Alsatia. The houses are distinguished by a plurality of bell-pulls inserted in the door-jambs, and by a plurality of little brass name-plates, bearing the names of in-dwelling artisans. Everybody (of nubile age and English) seems to be married, and to have a great many children, whose education seems to be conducted chiefly on the extradomestic or out-door principle.

As an uninterested stranger, and without a guide, you might, perambulating these shabby genteel streets, see in them nothing which would peculiarly distinguish them from that class of London streets known inelegantly, but expressively, as "back slums." At the first glance you see nothing but dingy houses teeming with that sallow, cabbage-stalk and fried fish sort of population, indigenous to back slums. The pinafores children are squabbling or playing in the gutters; while from distant courts come faintly and fitfully threats of Jane to tell Ann's mother; together with that unmeaning monotonous chant or dirge which street-children sing, why, or with what object, I know not. Grave dogs sit on door-steps — their heads patiently cocked on one side, waiting for the door to be opened, as — in this region of perpetual beer-fetching — they know must soon be the case. The beer itself, in vases of strangely-diversified patterns, and borne by Ganymines of as diversified appearance, is incessantly threading the needle through narrow courts and alleys. The public house doors are always on the swing; the bakers' shops (they mostly sell "seconds") are always full; so are the cookshops, so are the coffee-shops; step into one, and you shall have a phase of Patmos before you incontinent.

Albrecht Lurleibeg, who keeps this humble little Deutsche Caffee und Gasthof, as he calls it, commenced business five years ago with a single coffee-pot and two cups and saucers. That was a little before February, 1848. Some few foreigners dropt in to visit him occasionally; but he was fain to eke out his slender earnings by selling sweetstuff, penny dolls, and cheap Sunday newspapers. After the first three months' saturnalia of revolution in '48, however, exiles began to populate Patmos pretty thickly. First, Barbès and Albert's unsuccessful riot; then the escapade of Ledru-Rollin and Louis Blanc; then the wholesale proscriptions of Hungary, Italy, Austria, Russia, and Baden — all these contributed to swell the number of Herr Lurleibeg's customers a hundred fold, and to fill Patmos to overflowing. The sweetstuff and dolls disappeared "right away," and the coffee-cups and saucers multiplied exceedingly. In addition to this, the Herr caused to be stretched across the single window a canvas blind, on which his name, and the style and title of his establishment, were painted in painfully attenuated letters, with which not yet content, he incited young Fritz Schiffmahl, the artist, with dazzling prospects of a carte-blanche for coffee and tobacco, to depict beneath, in real oil colors, the counterfeit presentments of a Pole, a Hungarian, and a German embracing each other in a fraternal accolade, all smoking like volcanoes; the legend setting forth that true, universal, and political brotherhood are only to be found at Albrecht Lurleibeg's.

In the Herr's back parlor — he once designed in the flush of increased business to enlarge it by knocking it into the back yard, till warned, by a wary neighbor, of the horrible pains and penalties (only second to pre-munire) incurred by meddling with a wall in England — in this dirty back parlor, with rings made by coffee-cups on the rickety Pembroke tables, on the coarsely papered, slatternly-printed foreign newspapers and periodicals, are a crowd of men in every variety of beard and moustache and head-dress, in every imaginable phase of attire more or less dirty and picturesque. Figures such as, were you to see them in the drawings of Leech, or Daumier, or Gavarni, you would pronounce exaggerated and untrue to nature; hooded, tasselled, and braided garments of unheard-of fashion; hats of shapes to make you wonder to what a stage the art of squeezability had arrived; trousers with unnumbered plaits; boots made as boots were never made before; finger and thumb-rings of fantastic fashion; marvellous gestures, Babel-like tongues; voices anything but (Englishly) human; the smoke as of a thousand brick-kilns; the clatter as of a thousand spoons: such are the characteristics of this in-door Patmos.

Here are Frenchmen — ex-representatives of the people, ex-ministers, prefects and republican commissaries, Proletaires, Fourierists, Phalansterians, disciples of Proudhon, Pierre le Roux and Cahagnet, professors of barricade building; men yet young, but two thirds of whose lives have been spent in prison or in exile. Here are political gaol-birds who have been caged in every state prison of Europe; the citadels of France, the cachots of Mont St. Michel, the secrets of the Conciergerie, the piombi of Venice, the gloomy fastnesses of Ehrenbreitstein and Breslau and Pilsnitz, the oubliettes of the Spielberg and Salzburg. Here are young men — boys almost — of good families and high hopes, blasted by the sirocco of civil war. Here are German philosophic democrats — scientific conspirators — who, between Greek roots and algebrical quantities, tobacco smoke and heavy folios in German text upon international law, have somehow found themselves upon barricades and in danger of the fate of Robert Blum. Here are simple-minded German workmen — such honest-faced, tawny-bearded young fellows as you see in the beer cellars of Berlin — who have shaken off their dreams of German unity to find themselves in this back slum Patmos far away from home and friends. Here are swarthy Italians, eying the Tedeschi (though friendly ones) askance, cursing Radetzky and Gyulay, and telling with wild gesticulations how Novara was fought and Rome defended. Here, and in great numbers, are the poor, betrayed, cozened Hungarians, with glossy beards, and small embroidered caps and braided coats. They are more woe-begone, more scared and wild-looking than the rest, for they are come from the uttermost corners of Europe, and have little fellowship save that of misfortune, with their continental neighbors. Lastly, here are the Poles, those historical exiles who have been so long fugitives from their country that they have adopted Patmos with a will, have many of them entered into and succeeded in business, but would, I think, succeed better if the persons with whom they have commercial transactions were able to pronounce their names — those jaw-breaking strings of dissonant letters in which the vowels are so few that the consonants seem to have compassed them round about, like fortifications, to prevent their slipping out.

There are many of these poor refugees (I speak of them in general) who sit in coffee-shops similar to Herr Lurleibeg's, from early morning till late at night, to save the modicum of fire and candle they would otherwise be compelled to consume at home (if home their garrets can be called), and which God knows they can ill spare. About one o'clock in the day, those who are rich enough congregate in the English cook-shops, and regale themselves with the cheap cug-mag there offered for sale. Towards four or five the foreign eating-houses, of which there are many in Patmos of a fifth or sixth rate order of excellence, are resorted to by those who yet adhere to the gastronomic traditions of the land they have been driven from; and there they vainly attempt to delude themselves into the belief that they are consuming the fricassées and ragouts, the suet puddings and auserkraut, the maccaroni and stuffed of France or Germany or Italy — all the delightful messes on which foreigners feed with such extreme gusto and satisfaction. But, alas! these dishes, though compounded from foreign recipes and cooked by foreign hands, are not, or, at least, do not taste by any means like foreign dishes. Cookery, like the amor patriæ, is indigenous. It cannot be transplanted. It cannot flourish on a foreign soil. I question if the black broth of Sparta would have agreed with the Lacedæmonian palate if consumed in an English à la mode beef shop.

Patmos is likewise studded with small foreign tobacco shops. Limited to the sale of tobacco mostly, for the cigar is a luxury in most cases beyond the reach of the exile. You must remember that abroad you may obtain a cigar as large as an Epping sausage (and as damp), as strong as brandy and as fiery as a red-hot poker, for a matter of two sous: — in some parts of Belgium and Germany for one sou; and that in England the smallest Cuba, of Minories manufacture, smoked in a minute and of no particular flavor, costs three half-pence: a sum! There is, to be sure, a harmless, milk-mild little roll of dark brown color, the component parts of which, I believe, are brown paper, hay, and aromatic herbs, vended at the charge of one penny. But what would be the use of one of those smoke-toys to an exile who is accustomed to wrap himself in smoke as in a mantle; to smoke by the apertures of his mouth, nostrils, eyes and ears; to eat cigars, so to speak! Thus Patmos solaces itself with cut tobacco (which is good and cheap in England), which it puffs from meerschaums or short clays, or rolls up into fragments of foreign newspapers and makes cigarettes of.

If there exist a peculiarity of Patmos which I could not, without injustice, avoid advertising to, it is the pleasure its inhabitants seem to feel in reading letters. See, as we saunter down one of Patmos' back streets, a German exile, in a pair of trousers like a bifurcated carpet-bag, stops a braided Hungarian with a half quartern loaf under his arm. A sallow Italian (one of Garibaldi's men) enters speedily unto them, and the three fall greedily to the perusal of a large sheet of tissue paper, crossed and re-crossed in red, and black, and blue ink, patchworked outside with postage marks of continental frontiers and government stamps. Few of these missives reach their destination without some curious little scissor marks about the seal, some suspicious little hot-water blisters about the wafers, hinting that glazed cocked hats, and jack-boots, and police spies have had something to do with their letters between their postage and their delivery. Indeed, so well is this paternal solicitude on the part of foreign governments to know whether their corresponding subjects write and spell correctly, known among the refugees, that some wary exiles have their letters from abroad addressed to "Mr. Simpson Brown," or "Mr. Thomas Williams," such and such a street, London; and as foreign governments are rather cautious as to how they meddle with the families of the Browns and the Williams—who grow refractory sometimes and post their letters in the paddle-boxes of war steamers—the Brown and Williams letters reach London untampered with.

More exiles reading letters. One nearly falls over a dog's-meat cart, so absorbed is he in his correspondence; another, bearded like the pard, and with a fur cap like an Armenian Calpack, is shedding hot tears on his outstretched paper, utterly unconscious of the astonishment of two town-made little boys, who have stopped in the very middle of a "cartwheel" to stare at the "furriner a crying." Poor fellows! poor broken men! poor hunted wayfarers! If you, brother Briton, well clothed, well fed, well cared for—with X 99 well paid to guard you—with houses for the sale of law by retail on every side, where you can call for your half-pint of habeas corpus, or your Magna Charta, cold without, at any hour in the day—if you were in a strange land, proscribed, attainted, poor, unfriended, dogged even in your Patmos by spies; would you warrant yourself not to shed some scalding tears, even in a fierce fur cap, over a letter from the home you are never to see more?

My pencil may limn a few individual portraits in the perfidious refuge, and then I must needs row my bark away to other shores. Stop at forty-six Levant Street, if you please, over against Leg-bail Court.

Up four flights of crazy stairs, knocking at a rickety door, you enter a suite of three musty attics. They are very scantily furnished, but crowded with articles of the most heterogeneous description; mes marchandises, as the proprietor calls them. Variegated shades for lamps, fancy stationery, bon-bon boxes, lithographic prints, toys, cigar-cases, nicknacks of every description are strewn upon the chairs and table, and cumber the very floor; at one window a dark-eyed, mild-looking lady, in a dark merino dress, is painfully elaborating a drawing on a lithographic stone; at another a slender girl is bending over a tambour frame; at a desk a round-headed little boy is copying music, while in an adjoining apartment—even more denuded of furniture and littered with marchandises—are two or three little children tumbling among the card-board boxes. All these movables, animate and inanimate, belong to a Roman Marquis—the Marchese del Piffuraro. He and his have been reared in luxury. Time was he possessed the most beautiful villa, the finest equipages, the most valuable Rafaelles in the Campagna of Rome; but la politique, as he tells you with a smile, has brought him down to the level of a species of unlicensed hawker, going with his wares (to sell on commission) from fancy warehouse to fancy warehouse, often rebutted, often insulted;

yet picking up an honest livelihood somehow. His wife has turned her artistic talent, and his eldest daughter her taste for embroidery, to account; his son Mithridates copies music for the orchestra in a theatre, for living is dear in London, and those helpless little ones among the card-board boxes must be looked after. He has been an exile for five years. The holy father was good enough to connive at his escape, and to confer all his confiscated estates on a Dominican convent. No one knows what the politique, which has been his ruin, exactly was; nor, I am inclined to think, does the good man know very clearly himself. "We got away from Rome," he tells you mildly, "with a few hundred scudi, and our plate and a picture or two, and went to Marseilles; but when we had 'eaten' (avevamo mangiati) what we had brought with us, we came to England. It was very hard at first; for we had no friends, and could speak nothing but French and Italian, and the English are a suspicious people, whose first impulse, when they see a foreigner for the first time, is to button up their pockets as if he must necessarily be a thief." But the marquis went to work manfully, forgot his coronet, and is now doing a very good fancy commission business. He has an invention (nearly all refugees have inventions) for curing smoky chimneys, which, when he has money enough to patent it, he expects will bring him a fortune. In the days of his uttermost and most dire distress, he always managed to pay three shillings every Sunday for the sittings of himself, his wife, and daughter, at a foreign Catholic chapel, and to wear every day the cleanest of white neckcloths, fastened no man knows how, for no man ever saw the tie thereof.

Within these sorry streets—these dingy slums—are swept together the dead leaves, the rotten branches, the withered fruits from the tree of European liberty. The autumn blast of despotism has eddied them about from the remotest corners of Europe, has chased them from land to land, has wafted them at last into this perfidious Patmos, where there is liberty to act, and think, and breathe, but also, alas! liberty to starve.

O England, happily unconscious of the oppressions and exasperations that have driven these men here, try sometimes to spare some little modicum of substantial relief, some crumbs of comfort, some fragile straws of assistance to the poor drowning exiles! Their miseries are appalling. They cannot dig (for few, if any, Englishmen will call a foreigner's spade into requisition), to beg they are nobly ashamed. They do not beg, nor rob, nor extort. They starve in silence. The French and Hungarian refugees suffer more, perhaps, than those of other nations. The former have by no means an aptitude for acquiring the English language, and are, besides, men mostly belonging to the professional classes of society—classes woefully overstocked in England; the latter seldom know any language but their own—a language about as useful and appreciated here as Cochin-Chinese. Only those who have wandered through Patmos, who have watched the gates of the London Docks at early morning when the chance laborers apply for work, who have sat in night coffee-houses, and explored dark arches, can know what awful shifts some of these poor refugees, friendless, foodless, houseless, are often put to.

HUNTER'S EXPERIMENTS ON ANIMAL GRAFTING.

MR. BRANSBY BLAKE COOPER, in delivering lately an oration at the Royal College of Surgeons, in memory of the immortal genius, John Hunter, gave the following amusing illustrations of Hunter's peculiar views respecting the blood of animals:—

Hunter had more clearly recognized the great importance of this fluid than any physiologist who had gone before him. His views with respect to the importance of the blood to the animal economy, led him to the belief that the blood was endowed with a life of its own, more or less independent of the vitality of the animal in which it circulated. The following experiments seemed to have been instituted with the view of establishing the fact, that the blood of a living animal could, even under the artificial stimulus induced by the introduction of the part of another animal into itself by ingrafting, nourish and support it, so as to convert it into a part of itself. Hunter transplanted a human tooth to the comb of a cock, where it not only became fixed, but actually became part of the organic structure of the cock's comb; he proved this by injecting the cock's head, and on dissection (as the preparation on the table illustrated), the blood-vessels filled with the coloring matter of the injection were traced into the capillaries of the lining membrane of the cavity of the tooth. The most striking instance of this incorporation of a foreign organic body with a living tissue, was shown by the learned orator in another preparation made by the immortal Hunter, in which the spur of a cock had been removed from its leg and transplanted to its comb, where it not only continued to grow, but had acquired a far greater size than the spur ever acquired in its natural situation. The result of this experiment involved a very interesting physiological inquiry—how the capillaries, which were destined by nature merely to furnish blood fitted for the elaboration of the tissues of the comb, should, under the stimulus of necessity, to use Hunter's own expression, be rendered competent to eliminate the horny matter of the spur, even to the extent of an hypertrophied condition. The orator then took an elaborate review of the digestive organs of various animals, and found that, in certain instances, they were capable of becoming modified to meet contingencies to which an animal might be exposed, by which change the animal might be rendered capable of existing and even thriving on a kind of food entirely of an opposite character to that originally intended by nature for its support and nourishment, and illustrating which Mr. Cooper mentioned, that Hunter fed a sea-gull (naturally a bird of prey) with grain, and after twelve months he destroyed the bird, and, upon examination, found that its normally membranous stomach had become much thickened, and so changed in character, as to resemble in appearance the gizzard of the granivorous fowl rather than that of a carnivorous bird. Another striking instance of the periodical modification of the digestive apparatus, was found by Hunter in the crop of the pigeon during the period of incubation. This crop, which at other times was similar to that of birds in general, during incubation assumes a glandular character, which enables it, in addition to its ordinary function, to secrete a milky fluid, which is ejected and affords nourishment for its young progeny, rendering the crop, in fact, a kind of mammary gland.

CURIOUS CALCULATIONS.—To a person as highly intelligent and as thoroughly experienced as, notwithstanding her youth, Mrs. Fitzjames certainly was, in all the mysteries of love-making, the importance of a romantic country excursion was perfectly well understood. Had it been required of her, indeed, she would have been perfectly well able, also, to set down, in numerical proportion, the respective value; in this line, of every occurrence likely to be produced by the accidents of human life. For example: supposing the sum-total of 1000 to be the amount required for the achievement of any given conquest, she would systematically have set down the relative value of every separate manœuvre somewhat in this wise: first sight, under all advantages of dress, 100; under disadvantage of ditto, but not presumed to be actually disfiguring, 50; morning occupation, with hands ungloved, and hair hanging in disorder (nicely arranged), 50; caught reading a newly-arrived review (if the chase be literary), 25; transcribing music, if he be musical, 150; a ball well-lighted, with a good repose-room, 70; fancy-dress ditto, 160; caught singing an Italian bravura, or a French ballad, if you have a voice, and he has ears, 175; to be seen at early church, if he be a Puseyite, 77; at an evening lecture, if he be an Evangelical, 77; to be seen darning stockings, if he be a rich miser, 100; to be seen embroidering in gold and seed-pearls, if he be a poor elegant, 100; a picnic, everything being couleur de rose, 50; ditto, with a storm, 75; ditto, with a moon, and a little dancing after, 150; ditto, when matters are tolerably far advanced beforehand, 200. And so on, with an infinity of items, every one of which would have shown an admirable knowledge of the human heart. — Uncle Walter, by Mrs. Trollope.

THE LAST OF THE WESTCHESTER GUIDES.

On the evening of Sunday, the 21st of November last, at his residence in Fordham, Andrew Corsa departed this life at the age of nearly 91. He was born on the 24th day of January, 1762, where the Roman Catholic College of St. John now stands, on the farm occupied by his paternal ancestor, a native of Germany, who settled on the Manor of Fordham about the year 1690. Both his father and grandfather were natives of the same spot with himself. The latter was born in 1692, about the time of Governor Fletcher's arrival in the colony, after whom he was named Benjamin Fletcher. When the revolutionary troubles commenced, Captain Isaac Corsa, the father of the subject of this notice, held a commission under the crown, and, like most persons similarly situated, espoused the royal side throughout the great controversy. But parental authority was not sufficient to keep the young Andrew long within the limits of the ancient allegiance, and about the middle of the war, his strong inclinations in favor of American independence overcame every other consideration, and he commenced an independent career by rendering important services to the guides and scouting parties that approached the British lines, whether for attack or observation. Minutely acquainted with all the passes about Kingsbridge, Fordham and Morrisania, and withal of a disposition sprightly, intelligent and communicative, his services were anxiously sought for, when, in the summer of 1781, after the allied forces had been encamped upon the heights of Greenburgh about two weeks, Washington and Rochambeau made ready for a formidable movement, with a select portion of their army, towards the lines of the enemy. Preparatory to this operation, Count Mathieu Dumas, the two brothers Berthier, and several other young officers belonging to the French staff, who had, for some days, been zealously engaged in exploring the ground and roads and in sketching maps of the country between the allied camp and Kingsbridge, were ordered by the French commander to set out before daylight, and to push their examinations till they came within sight of the enemy's most advanced redoubts, at the northern extremity of New York island. To protect these youthful adventurers, a strong detachment of the lancers of Lauzun was sent along under Lieutenant Kilmaine, a young Irishman in the French service, who some years afterwards became a general of division and enjoyed the reputation of being one of the best cavalry officers in Europe. The command of the whole party was bestowed upon Dumas, while the celebrated Cornelius Oakley of Whiteplains was selected to act as the principal guide, accompanied by his cousin James Oakley and young Corsa. Below Miesquan the reconnoitring party formed a junction with a select body of American light-infantry who on the same morning had gone down to explore the ground on the right, and the two allied detachments then attacked and dispersed a strong patrol of Delancey's Refugees, and soon afterwards assaulted and drove across Kingsbridge, the Chasseurs that occupied the Hessian outposts;—pursuing the fugitives till they came within musket-shot of Prince Charles' redoubt. This reconnaissance established in favor of Kilmaine and of the elder Berthier—the latter of whom was afterwards a Marshal of France under Napoleon, and Prince of Wagram and Neufchâtel—reputations for partisan skill and intrepidity that led to their subsequent preferment.

A few days later occurred the grand reconnoissance which was made on the 22d and 23d of July by the American and French commanders and engineers, supported by 5,000 troops of the two nations, for the purpose of examining with precision the British posts on New York island between the Hudson River and the Sound, and of cutting off, if possible, such of the enemy's corps as might be found upon the main. Young Andrew Corsa's intelligence and exact knowledge of the country about the British lines were such that his services were again earnestly sought for upon this occasion; and during both these days he was constantly on horseback, riding and conversing with Washington, Rochambeau, Lauzun, and the other generals of the combined army, while they passed through the fields of Morrisania, Fordham and Yonkers, halting from time to time as they moved along for the purpose of enabling the engineers to examine the grounds along Harlem river and Spuytenduyvil creek. He used to relate that when the allies, marching from the east near the Bronx, and passing over the high grounds around Morrisania house, came in sight of the enemy, the fire which the British artillery opened upon them from the fortifications at Randall's island and Snakehill, from the batteries at Harlem and from the ships of war at anchor in the river, was terrible and incessant, and, obeying the instinct of self-preservation, which became suddenly predominant—he urged his horse forward at full speed and rode for safety behind the old Morrisania Mill. Here he pulled up and, looking back, saw Washington, Rochambeau, and the other officers riding along calmly under the fire as though nothing unusual had occurred. His self-possession now returned, and, ashamed at having given way to an impulse of fear, he at once pricked back with all the rapidity to which he could urge his horse, and resumed his place in the order of march; while the commanding officers with good-natured peals of laughter, welcomed him back and commended his courage.

Mr. Corsa knew personally every individual of that celebrated band of volunteers called the "Westchester Guides," of whom he himself was the last and youngest, and he was among the most confidential friends of the heroic Abraham Dyckman, who fell prematurely at the close of the revolutionary contest. Possessed of a memory unusually retentive and residing constantly upon the borders of the "neutral ground," he was acquainted with all the distinguished partisans both from above and below, and with nearly all the military operations, whether great or small, that occurred along this portion of the British lines, and which, until within the last few days of his life, he continued to describe in minute detail.

Upon the conclusion of the revolutionary war, his father's lands, by a compulsory sale, passed out of the family, and, although without any means at the time, he did not hesitate to purchase, with money borrowed upon mortgage, a contiguous farm, which industry and good management enabled him, not many years after, to disencumber. Much engaged in the cultivation of fruit for the market, he was particularly successful with the apple and pear; discovering and introducing into use a new variety of the latter which bears his name, being known distinctively as the Corsan Vergaloo.

For many years he was a member of the Reformed Dutch Church at Fordham. His death was preceded by none of the diseases to which humanity is heir, and he ceased to exist only because he was worn out by toil and time. The machine which had been set in motion by its divine constructor, and which had gone on for more than fourscore years and ten, "at last stood still," and the weary occupant sought a better habitation. His memory continued unimpaired until nearly the close of his existence. Among his survivors are eight children and numerous other descendants. Simple and patriarchal in his manners, a zealous, generous and useful friend, neighbor and citizen; — estimable and upright in all the relation of life; — Andrew Corsa deserves to be held in honorable remembrance.

JONATHAN PEREIRA, M. D., F. R. S.

JAN. 20. Died at his residence in Finsbury-square, in his 49th year, Jonathan Pereira, Esq., M.D., F.R.S., and F.L.S. Physician to the London Hospital.

Dr. Pereira was born of humble parentage, in the parish of Shoreditch, on the 22d May, 1804, and received his education at private schools in that vicinity. He was articled at the age of fifteen to Mr. Latham, an apothecary, in the City Road; but, his indentures were cancelled, in consequence of his master falling into a state of mental incapacity. In 1821 Pereira became a pupil at the General Dispensary in Aldersgate Street, where he attended the prelections of Dr. Clutterbuck on chemistry, materia medica, and the practice of physic; those of Dr. Birkbeck on natural philosophy, and those of Dr. Lambe on botany. In the following year he entered to the surgical practice of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. While thus engaged, a vacancy occurred in the office of apothecary at the Aldersgate Dispensary; and in order to qualify himself as a candidate it was necessary that he should at once proceed for examination to Apothecaries' Hall. This he did on the 6th of March, 1823, and procured its license when he was only eighteen years of age. In the same month he was appointed to the Dispensary, and we may date his illustrious career from that time. His salary was only 120*l.* per annum; and, with the view of increasing his income, he formed a class for private medical instruction, which he had but little difficulty in doing, as the lectures at the Dispensary were largely attended. His success in this undertaking was very great, and he thought it desirable to publish a few small books on the subjects in which he found his pupils most deficient. These were a translation of the "Pharmacopœia" for 1824, with the chemical decompositions; the "Selecta & Prescriptis," a manual for the use of students; and a general Table of Atomic Numbers, with an Introduction to the Atomic Theory." These works were published in the course of the years 1824, 5, 6, and 7; they had a very extensive sale, and two of them are in existence at the present time.

In the year 1825 he passed the College of Surgeons, and in the year following he succeeded Dr. Clutterbuck as a lecturer on chemistry. At that time he was only twenty two years of age, but his appearance was commanding, and he therefore looked much older. His first lecture was given to a large class of pupils and friends. It was eminently successful, and he received the warm congratulations of his numerous admirers. Then, as ever afterwards, he sought to dazzle by the novelty of his facts and the profusion of his illustrations. His lecture-table was covered with specimens, and, among other things, he exhibited the new element, bromine, which Bolard, of Montpellier, had just then discovered.

In the course of a year or two after that time, he began to collect the facts for his "Materia Medica." He saw that the whole subject of pharmacology was involved in the greatest confusion, that its principles were misapprehended, and that its doctrines were founded in absurdity and conjecture. From this chaos and darkness he determined to relieve it. Accordingly, he commenced a diligent search for all the facts of the science; he studied the ancient fathers of physic, and made himself master of the literature of his subject, from the earliest period of history; he collected the works of English writers, and he undertook the study of French and German, in order that he might read those of the Continent. At that time he devoted his whole energies to the subject, and worked for about sixteen hours a day. He was accustomed to rise at six in the morning, and to read, with but little interruption, until twelve at night. This he continued to do for several years; and had he not been possessed of an iron constitution, of great physical endurance, and of a most determined purpose, he would unquestionably have sunk under it. As it was, the closeness of his application occasioned several slight attacks of epilepsy, and a frequent determination of blood to the head. After a short time, he began to give lectures on materia medica, as well as on chemistry, at the Dispensary.

In the year 1832 he married, resigned his appointment in favor of his brother, and commenced practice as a surgeon in Aldersgate Street. In the year following he was elected to the Chair of Chemistry in the London Hospital. For a period of six years he lectured both there and at the new Medical School in Aldersgate Street on three subjects—namely, on Chemistry, Botany, and Materia Medica; and during the whole of each winter session he was accustomed to give two lectures daily. His lectures on materia medica, which extended over a period of two years, from 1835 to 1837, and amounted to 74 in number, were published by his friend, Dr. Cummin, in the late Medical Gazette. There cannot be a doubt that they greatly added to his reputation; they were translated into the German, and republished in India. In 1839 he reproduced them in another form, viz., in his "Elements on Materia Medica," and this work was so much appreciated that the whole of the first part was bought up long before the second was ready for delivery. A second edition was therefore immediately called for, and it appeared in the year 1842. Before this date, however—viz., in 1839—he had been chosen examiner in Materia Medica in the University of London; and in 1841 he had been elected assistant-physician to the London Hospital. He took his degree of M.D. at Erlangen in 1840, and he obtained his license at the College of Physicians directly afterwards. About the same time he was invited by some of the authorities of St. Bartholomew's Hospital to lecture at the medical school of that institution, and the arrangements for his so doing had been almost completed, for a syllabus of the course was actually published; but, when it was notified to him that he would be required to give up his other appointments, he refused to relinquish his position at the London Hospital, at which institution he had experienced great kindness. He immediately afterwards, however, gave up the Aldersgate School.

In 1842 he gave two short courses of lectures at the rooms of the Pharmaceutical Society, and in the year following he was appointed its first professor. During that year he published "A Treatise on Food and Diet," and was placed on the council of the Royal Society, of which he had been elected a Fellow in 1838. By that time, his practice as a physician had become rather extensive, and, as it was rapidly increasing, he determined to throw aside his more scientific pursuits. Accordingly, in 1844, he resigned a part of the course of chemistry at the London Hospital into the hands of Dr. Letheby; in 1845 he gave up a larger portion of it; and in 1846 he relinquished it altogether. He continued, however, to lecture on materia medica at both the hospital and the Pharmaceutical Society, and there is no reason for believing that he contemplated any change in this matter until the new regulations of the Apothecaries' Society transferred his course to the summer session. This arrangement interfered with his usual habits, and also with his ideas of the importance of the subject, and consequently, in 1850, he resigned his lectureship at the hospital, though he still continued to deliver a winter course at the Pharmaceutical Society. In 1845, he was elected a Fellow of the College of Physicians, and in 1851 he became a full physician at the London Hospital. He had now reached the summit of his ambition; his reputation as an author was established, and the rewards of industry were falling thick about him. He was a fellow of many scientific societies; he was in constant communication with the learned of all countries; he was intimately connected with many of the greatest institutions of the metropolis, and was, in fact, their brightest ornament; he had collected around him a large circle of friends and admirers, and he saw before him the prospect of wealth and happiness. In the midst of all this, however, he was stricken down, and that so suddenly, that he had hardly time to take leave of those who were about him.

While referring, some six weeks before his death, to a specimen in the museum of the College of Surgeons, he had the misfortune, by a fall on the staircase, to rupture one of the extensor muscles of the thigh. Though unable to move about without assistance, he was scarcely affected in health by the accident, and it appeared to be comparatively of little moment; but on the night of Thursday the 20th Jan., upon being lifted into bed, the patient suddenly raised himself, exclaiming, "I have ruptured a vessel of the heart," and died in half an hour. His body was buried at the cemetery of Kensal Green, in the presence of a large number of his pupils.

A retrospect of the labors of this distinguished physician will show that he was a man of no ordinary capacity. He had an unquenchable thirst for knowledge, an indefatigable spirit, unbounded industry, and a determination of purpose that was irresistible. Whatever he did he did well, and he therefore made his performances as valuable to others as they were creditable to himself. The great peculiarity of his works is, that he aimed more at bringing within our reach the treasures of other men's minds, than of exposing those of his own. He has, indeed, been charged with a want of originality, and, most certainly, if we estimate him by the value of his own independent researches, he is open to such a charge; but it must also be admitted that it is an equally useful element of the human mind, that faculty which urges men to gather up the scattered facts of science, and to mould them into a shape that may be made available to all.

Dr. Pereira was an early riser, of quick business habits, and remarkable for his promptness and rapidity of action. He manifested great willingness at all times to impart to others the knowledge he himself possessed; and he was in the habit of corresponding fully on subjects on which his opinions were solicited. The smallest favor that contributed to his researches was always gratefully acknowledged; and whether it proved to be insignificant or of value, the intention was alike prized. Dr. Pereira was reckoned by pharmacologists both at home and abroad to be preëminent in his science, and he was equally beloved by all. He was a man of large and powerful stature, and of pleasing expression of countenance.

Dr. Pereira was occupied in completing the third edition of his "Materia Medica" at the time of his decease. The first volume was published in 1849, and in 1850, owing to the length to which the work had already extended, the author determined upon publishing a portion only of the Second Volume, the remainder of which remains to be printed. It has been translated into German, and is universally allowed to be the best and most trustworthy book on medicinal substances that has been written.

OUR SAVAGE CUSTOMS.—To ensure Peace with our French neighbors we should not only mend our manners, but reform our customs.

How absurd, as well as impolitic, it is of us to interpose a duty which is nearly prohibitive between their clarets and our ports!

CCCLXVIII. LIVING AGE. VOL. I. 23

To be linked with any foreign nation in the bonds of amity, we must hook the padlock of peace to the staple of production.

Our harbors would be in small danger of French round shot, if we allowed them to throw in their grape.

England is right in requiring Englishmen to do their duty in time of war; but it is quite another policy to make Frenchmen pay it in time of peace.

If it were generally known how good Chablis is with oysters, the force of the above considerations would be so apparent, that the Peace Society would transfer their present exertions to the abatement of the duty on light wines; and that the motion to that end, about to be proposed in the House of Commons, would be carried by acclamation. — Punch.

A VALEDICTION.

As flowers that bud and bloom before us,
Then droop in languor and decay,
As clouds that form their bright shapes o'er us,
Then speed their trackless course away,

As sparkling waves we watch advancing,
That melt in foam beneath our gaze,
As sunlight o'er the waters glancing,
That smiles, and then withdraws its rays

As summer insects, to their night-homes wending,
Sweep by us with a hum of melody,
As gentle showers on the earth descending,
Gem for a fleeting space each shrub and tree —

So pass away the gifts and joys of earth;
Frail as the rose, the cloud, the wave as fleeting,
We scarce can welcome happiness to birth,
Ere some sad note of change arrests the greeting.

The hopes we build, the friends we prize,
The visioned schemes our hearts delighting,
How do they vanish from our eyes!
The real our joyous fancies blighting.

The scenes we love Time marks with change,
And gladsome hours have no abiding,
And friends o'er land and ocean range,
The earth's wide space our lot dividing.

But shall we therefore shun the pleasant things
This else too barren wilderness adorning,
And give to joy and gladness swifter wings,
Shielding our hearts in cold and selfish warning?

No! for the memory of delights that leave us
Lingers — a welcome echo of the past.
No! for through all the myriad ills that grieve us
Hope struggles on, consoling to the last.

And through life's varied scenes and hours departed,
Its mingled heritage of joy and pain,
One solace ever clings to the warm-hearted,
Affection can live on — and friends may meet again.

CLUBS AND CLUBBISTS.

WE are rather surprised that, in the present dearth of literary subjects, no enterprising caterer for the public appetite has attempted a scientific history of the rise and progress of Clubs. The field of inquiry is a vast one; and the subject might be treated either in an antiquarian, a political, a moral, or a social point of view. We trust the hint may be taken; and we shall look out for the appearance of such a work with great interest. For ourselves, we may as well confess at once that we are not in possession of any historical information which might serve as the groundwork for a treatise of that nature. We are not prepared with any data to prove that clubs were among the institutions familiar either to the Greeks or the Romans; nor are we anxious to exhibit our ingenuity by arguing that the Preceptorics of the Templars and Knights of St. John ought to be referred to that class of establishments. We take our definition from old Johnson, himself a notorious clubbist, and understand that the term ought to mean — “an assembly of good fellows, meeting under certain conditions.” In these words you have the description of a perfect club. But — alas for human weakness! — it is well-nigh impossible to construct a club, of which all the members shall be good fellows. Notwithstanding the asseverations of proposer and seconder, and in spite of the scrutiny of the ballot, some men who have no title to the endearing name will necessarily get in. Constitute your society as you may — fence it with what rules you will — you must not expect to escape without the average proportion of jolterheads, misanthropes, and bores. You must be content to endure their presence as a tax upon your other comforts; and it is perhaps just as well that, in this as in other matters, you should meet with an occasional annoyance to counterbalance the amount of fruition. Johnson's club, we admit, was one of the best ever formed. It was small and select, and composed of highly gifted and educated men — but those were not the days of club-houses, the erection of which has since revolutionized that branch of social economy. What a difference, for example, between the Beef-steak Club — still, we believe, in existence — and the Carlton and Reform, gigantic political caravanserais!

They cannot be classed or considered under the same category.

We remember the time when the female voice was raised, in rather shrill remonstrance, against the institution of those clubs, as so many direct seductions from the charms of the domestic hearth. That cry, we apprehend, is now very nearly silenced. Experience has shown that the great majority of British husbands are none the worse for having a place of occasional resort, where they can hear the news and mingle with their fellows — nay, we are decidedly of opinion that the clubs have wrought a marked improvement in many points of minor morals. A club is, out of all sight, a better place than a tavern; and as men must necessarily meet for the interchange and communication of ideas, it is surely better that they should have a well-regulated place of meeting, than be forced to congregate in houses where they are expected to be unnecessarily jovial. We believe that the club-houses have mainly contributed to remove the reproach of deep-drinking from the present generation. The old tavern-club unquestionably led to an enormous deal of conviviality. On the night of their weekly or monthly meetings, every man came prepared — yea, determined — to imbibe to the utmost of his capacity. To remain sober was to commit treason against the fundamental laws of the society; and many a well-disposed Christian, who would rather have passed the bottle, was compelled to dispense with heel-taps. This, it will be admitted, was a most abominable custom, and loudly called for reformation. It has been reformed. In all good clubs, drinking is at a discount; and instead of fostering late hours, they have the opposite tendency. Still, there is room for great improvement. In all clubs, except those in London which are essentially political, where latitude must be allowed, regulations should be made and enforced for early closing, and evacuation of the premises. There can be no difficulty about effecting the latter object. A fixed hour for the stoppage of supplies, and another for the inexorable extinguishment of the lights, would be sufficient to settle the business, and disperse even the jovial knot of habitues who frequent the smoking-room. Such arrangements would tend greatly to remove the objections which, we fear, even now lie dormant in many a female bosom, and would deprive some miserable catiffs of the mean excuse which they are now wont to proffer to their wives in extenuation of their irregularities. George could no longer aver with unblushing effrontery, and without the risk of contradiction, that he had been detained at "the club" until four o'clock in the morning; and who knows but that, with the temptation, the unwholesome habit would subside?

We have heard it said that the comforts of a club are hostile to the interests of matrimony, inasmuch as they indispose bachelors from taking that most important step in life. We do not think there is much foundation for this idea. It is not from amongst that class of men who loiter away their existence at clubs, that we would advise any young woman to expect or accept a husband. Your thorough club man is, in reality, a being of exceedingly limited ideas. He is a member of a diminutive republic, in which he wishes to enact a conspicuous part; and he gradually weans himself from the concerns of the world, to concentrate his whole attention upon the affairs of the establishment. The resignation of the club-master is more to him than a change of dynasty. He would make louder moan for the apotheosis of the butler than for the defeat of Lord Aberdeen; and he feels a deeper interest in the career of his own waiters than in that of any of the waiters on Providence, who are tolerably numerous about St. Stephens. The great object of his ambition is to be nominated one of the house-committee; and he enters into as many intrigues for this high aim as ever did Fouché in the plenitude of his cunning. Once on the committee, he becomes a perfect Dionysius. His high sense of moral responsibility imparts to him an almost diseased acuteness of vision;—the waiters tremble at his approach, and shake before the authority of his call. If you have any ground of complaint, you cannot do him a greater favor than make him the confidant of your wrongs. Be sure you will receive as ample justice as though the question concerned the safety of the nation, not the over-doing of a miserable chop. We think it extremely problematical whether any woman could be happy with such a being. We are not, indeed, of the number of those who maintain that it is beneath the dignity of a man to exercise any kind of surveillance over his household—so far from that, we would have him act like a wise general, who is cognizant of the disposition of the whole troops under his command. But as it is not the business of a general to be punctilious about pipe-clay, perpetually prying into haversacks, and examining the contents of canteens, so neither is it the duty of the master of a house to superintend in person the details of every department. To him alone exclusively belong the key and custody of the wine-cellar. The remainder of the bunch ought to be confided to the care of his helpmate. Now we cannot help fearing that our extreme clubbist, if married, would assert a larger prerogative. If so, his could not be a happy home; for either the lady will rebel, as we think she is entitled to do for the honor of housewifery; or she will subside into a placid state of indifference, and be all day on the sofa reading novels, whilst her spouse is in the lower regions. We cannot conceive any lower depth of degradation to which a man can descend, than is implied by his personally undertaking the daily dole of tea, sugar, soap, and candles. Better to be an Ethiopian at once, than pry into the mysteries of a washing! Yet such things have been, and are; and we have known men of some repute in the world, who absolutely prided themselves on the practice of this systematic infamy.

It is a very erroneous, though general idea, that all men ought to marry. Some there are whom nature evidently designed for celibacy, and these naturally take to the clubs as their proper sphere. Can any one fancy Major Pendennis in the bonds of hymeneal wedlock? And yet how many Pendennises have we all seen and known! Nor let it be supposed that the age of the major was by any means the sole obstacle. Not a week elapses but the apparition of some older bridegroom convulses the countenance of Hymen. Take twenty years and more from the shoulders of the major, and you would find him still the same. He never had a heart to give away—what heart he had, he reserved cautiously to himself; and he would have considered it, in his own phrase, a most hideous sacrifice, and almost dishonor, "to surrender his independence." Under no circumstances could a Mrs. Major Pendennis—though not only gifted like an angel with accomplishments and charms, but with those more weighty recommendations which are the fertile cause of proposals—have been a happy woman. Therefore, better it is that the somewhat jaded veteran should adhere to his club, wherein he may rank as a nebulous, if not a brilliant star, and perhaps be of more use as a warning than an example to others. For of all pitiable spectacles upon earth, your aged celibate clubbist, aping the language and the gait, and affecting the vices of his juniors, is the most deplorable; and, much as we reverence gray hairs, it cannot be conceded that, in his instance, they constitute a crown of glory, whether openly displayed, or furtively concealed by the ingenuity of an accomplished perquier.

But we have heard it said, of late years — and principally by matrons who have disposable daughters — that clubs are bad places, inasmuch as they indispose young men to attend, as formerly, balls and assemblies, where they had the best opportunity of meeting with the flower of the other sex. Now, this is a point which really requires consideration; and we shall attempt to approach it with all candor and impartiality. We totally disclaim all knowledge of Almack's; and we cast aside, as chimerical, the notion of exclusive circles. There are, of course, many circles of society, some of which are far more difficult of access than others; but there is a generic feature common to them all — and that is the manner and style of the entertainment. If the premier duchess were to give a ball, her example would be closely copied, within a week after, by the dame of a dry-salter; and thus, although the same people may not meet, the same thing is essentially performed. Hamlet is Hamlet, whether acted at Sadler's Wells — now, we are sorry to say, the last refuge for the destitute Shakespeare — or in any barn in the obscurest village-town in the north of England.

We wonder whether it has never occurred to some mortified mother, who for three or four consecutive seasons has paraded her daughters at every ball and fashionable gathering, and undergone more trouble in helping them to dissipate their natural roses than she ever expended in their education — to ask herself the question whether, after all, she is following the best method of securing, not the happiness of her children, but their settlement in life! It is a very momentous question, but we fear that some mothers never take it into consideration. Having, in their own younger days, passed through the fire before the Moloch of fashion, they take it for granted that there is but one custom to be observed, and one course to be pursued. In the ball-room they were wooed and won; and why should not their daughters achieve their destiny in the like locality?

Do not — young ladies — spoil the prettiness of your brows by knitting them too hastily and severely before you have heard our argument. We do not intend, by any means, to pronounce an elaborate discourse against the vanities of social society — neither is it our wish that you should attain that cerulean hue, which, as Dickey Milnes, or some other modern poet, tells us, is grateful in the eyes of Minerva. The “purple light of love” — these are not our words, for the blush-rose is the only fit emblem — on your cheeks, is worth all the indigo in the world. We do not desire that you should be over-literary; and we consider a total indifference for science to be an excellent thing in woman. Never shall we forget the area of the female faces that beamed upon us, when, at a late meeting of the British Association, we read our celebrated paper on “The History of the Lost Pleiad.” We saw, as it were, the glittering of a thousand stars; but all of them shot their rays through spectacles. Never, with our consent, shall you be cooped up, or prevented from indulging to the full in the innocent gayety of your hearts. But we have a word or two to say to the mammas.

Madam, when you first came out, or made your début — for that was then the term in vogue — do you happen to remember what were the manners of the ball-room? Let us refresh your memory. The staple dance was the quadrille, perhaps not a very lively piece of pantomime, but one which, from its nature, afforded ample opportunity for conversation (you may call it flirtation if you like), and was neither, in its form, too reserved nor too familiar. It was all grace and decorum. It admitted of a slight and tremulous pressure of the hand — nothing more — between parties ripe for declaration; and often, during the pause before the last figure, the attitude of some blushing beauty, plucking unconsciously a splendid camellia to pieces, left little doubt of the nature of those whispers which her partner had been pouring into her ear. Like Margaret in the Faust, the sweet girl was but essaying to prove her destiny from the petals of the flower. For those in a less advanced stage of understanding, there was the contredanse, and the reel, with various other gymnastics, all of a harmless nature. But Satan had entered into paradise, though in a mild form. We may now, our dear madam, recall, without anything like bitterness of feeling, the days when we indulged together in the sweet intoxication of the waltz. It was really—we confess it with a touch of the old Adam—a most fascinating innovation. You danced divinely; and a more clipsome waist than yours we never spanned. Once, indeed, we thought—but no more of that! You married, of your own free will and accord, that red-haired monster M'Tavish, in virtue of his imaginary rent-roll; and, long ago, our agony of mind, like the remembrance of an old toothache, has departed. But it was pleasant to revolve, linked with you, over the floor of the Assembly-Rooms when Spindler was in his glory, and when the waltz was kept, at least, within something like decent limits. Long before then, Byron, who certainly was not strait-laced, had published his poem of "The Waltz;" and without subscribing to his views upon our peristrophic performances, we must needs own that his satire is of double value now.

The waltz, as we danced it, was decent of its kind. No father of a family, we think, whatever be the practice of fashion, can rejoice in seeing his daughter's waist spanned by the arm of some deboshed dragoon, whose advances she can hardly refuse without committing a breach of the idiotical rules which modern usage inculcates. Surely, in a free country, a woman ought to be free in her choice even of a temporary partner; and the base notion which prevails, that a lady, by refusing the invitation of one man to dance, is debarr'd from accepting a more congenial offer, is utterly foreign and repugnant to the rules of chivalry. In the hall, or bower, the ladies are paramount, and they ought to exert their authority—remembering this, the slightest murmur against their decision ought to be considered an offence against knightly courtesy. It would be well if we had a female tribunal, with full powers of expulsion from society, to adjudicate upon such matters.

But not to perpetrate a digression in favor of Provençal usages, let us return to the matter in question. We maintain now, that Lord Byron, writing under the name of Horace Horhem, was fully justified in the utterance of every couplet. The poet is a seer; and though we, perhaps, in our younger days, could decry no impropriety in the waltz, which merely admitted us to a nearer degree of contact than the former Terpsichorean evolutions, the prophetic eye of the bard foresaw the necessary consequence. The character of the waltz gradually became changed. From a graceful rotary motion, it degenerated into a Bacchic movement, similar, no doubt, to the first Thespian performances, which were intended, as scholars tell us, to be in honor of the young Lyæus. Then came the gallopé, which was a still further manifestation of the triumphal procession of Ariadne. Dancing, as one of the fine arts, now received its virtual death-blow. You saw an infuriated-looking fellow throw his arm round a girl's waist, and rush off with her as if he had been one of the troop of Romulus abducting a reluctant Sabine. Sabina, however, made no remonstrance, but went along with him quite cordially. They pursued a species of bat-like race around the room—jerking, flitting, backing, and pirouetting, without rule, and without any vestige of grace, until breath failed them, and the panting virgin was pulled up short on the arm of her perspiring partner. Ghost of Count Hamilton! shade of De Grammont! has it really come to this? You knew, in your day, something about the Castlemaines and others; but never did you witness, in public at least, such orgies as British matrons and mothers now placidly contemplate and approve.

This, however, called for a reform; and it was reformed. By what? By the introduction of the polka—the favorite dance, and no wonder, of the Casinos. View it philosophically, and you find it to be neither more nor less than the nuptial dance of Bacchus and Ariadne. Our mothers or grandmothers were staggered, and some of them shocked, at the introduction of the ballet in the opera-houses. What would they say now, could they see one of their female descendants absolutely in the embrace of some hairy animal—fronting him—linked to him—drawn to him—her head reclining on his shoulder, and he perusing her charms—executing the most ungraceful of all possible movements, at the will of a notorious Tomnoddy? No doubt everything is innocent, and the whole dance is conducted—on one side at least—with perfect purity of idea. But, somehow or other, these grapplings, squeezings, and approximations, look rather odd in the eyes of the unprejudiced spectator; and we, who have seen the foats of Egyptian Almas almost surpassed in British ball-rooms, may be pardoned for expressing our conviction, that a little—nay, a good deal—more of feminine reserve than is presently practised, would be vastly advantageous to the young ladies who resort to those haunts which they have been taught to consider as the matrimonial bazaar.

Of course, we do not expect that any of the fair Bacchantes will give the slightest heed to what we say. If one of them should chance—tired and languid as she is from the effect of last night's polka, through which she has been hurried in the nervous embrace of Captain Fitzurse of the Dragoons—to peruse these pages, she will set us down as a vinegared old Calvinist, who knows nothing whatever of the ways of modern society. We shall be likened to John Knox, who once took upon himself the ungracious task of lecturing the Queen's Maries. But neither Mary Seaton, Mary Beatoun, Mary Fleming, nor Mary Livingstone, ever rushed frantically through the halls of Holyrood in the grips of Chastelar or of Bothwell—indeed, had such been the case, the hands of the grim old barons, their fathers, would instinctively have clutched the poniard. We abuse not dancing—we simply contend against its abuse. The effect of it is just this, that the most inveterate devotees of the polka have the least chance of being married. No man of refinement likes to see the object of his affections prancing wildly in the arms of another. Cupid, as the Americans say, is “a skeary critter;” and a very little matter indeed is sufficient to make him take wing. Let the ladies take our word for it, that reticence is a virtue greatly appreciated by mankind. Many a young man has entered a ball-room with a mind thoroughly made up for an avowal, and left it with the determination to have nothing more to say to the lady whose breath has fanned the whiskers of a whole regimental mess. Among the accomplishments which enter into the matrimonial calculation, dexterity in the polka has but a very subordinate share. Were it otherwise, the simplest method would be to select a partner for life from the ranks of the corps-de-ballet. It is the domestic graces and accomplishments that constitute the great fascination of woman; and these can only be seen and duly displayed in the family circle.

We do not wonder, therefore, that young men, if they have no better engagement, should prefer passing their evenings at a club to inhaling the close atmosphere of a ball-room. We cannot even go the length of saying that we consider them worse employed; for every well-conducted club has its library, which is not among the least of its attractions; and, though study, in the strictest sense of the term, is not compatible with the place, it is still not only possible, but very common, to employ the club hours in a profitable and intellectual manner.

Country members, in especial, have reason to bless the idea which suggested the institution of club-houses. Well do we remember the occasion of our first solitary visit to London—the hunt for convenient apartments in cross streets—the low and smoky parlor which, after many futile attempts to obtain decent accommodation elsewhere, we were forced to engage at a most exorbitant ransom—the cat-hole of a dormitory, and the bed apparently stuffed with ropes—the slatternly attendance, the disgusting breakfast, and the myriad hurdy-gurdies in the street. To pass an evening in that den would have tasked the resolution of Luther. We tried it once; and not to our dying day shall we forget the dreary illumination of the dips, or the sputter of the consumptive fire! Talk not of English comfort in so far as lodgings are concerned! It was nothing short of positive purgatory. But let a man enrol himself in a club, and see how his position is improved. He has still to provide himself with a dormitory, but that is all. He breakfasts, of course, at the club, where every conceivable delicacy is ready at a moment's notice, and the morning papers are on every table. He there receives his letters, and can answer them at leisure. All the periodicals and best new works lie invitingly before him; and if the day is wet, and he has no particular business on hand, he can spend the forenoon there quite as comfortably as if he were in his own mansion. These seem little things; but, in truth, they constitute, as little things do, a great part of our existence. On the Continent things are managed differently. There the hotels are clubs. You get your numbered key from the porter; and, thereafter, until you leave the house, the apartments are emphatically your own. You breakfast, just as you do at a London Club; dine or not, as the fancy moves you, at the table-d'hôte, and are in every way your own master. What is of far more importance, when you call for the bill, you do not find it such as to create apprehension of ruin. Now, we do not mean to aver that the accommodation in first-rate London hotels can by possibility be surpassed. If you wish to participate in these comforts, drive to one of the private hotels in the neighborhood of St. James'. You are received at the door by a grave but not saturnine individual, attired in a faultless suit of black, who might very well pass for the valet-de-chambre of an archbishop. He conducts you up-stairs to an apartment, luxuriously carpeted, and furnished in the best possible taste. The eye of a critic would fail to detect even the slightest flaw in the arrangement; and your bed-chamber is equally attractive. You have perfect freedom of movement. You are not expected, unless you please to do it, to dine there; and there are no wry faces made, as in the old establishments, where dining and drinking, “for the good of the house,” was considered a part of the contract. Nothing can be more faultless than the whole establishment. There is no sign of the bustle and noise that make a provincial hostelry so offensive. The waiters, like sable Ariels, perform their spiring gently—enter with a noiseless step—speak with ‘bated breath—and perform your mandates as quickly and quietly as though you had the wand of Prospero.

One of these private, or family hotels, is just the place to which you should conduct your bride on a honeymoon visit to London — that is, if expense is no object to you. But for many like ourselves, who, we almost regret to say, are not in the manufacturing or iron lines, but dependent upon our wits or professions — to attempt such localities is little short of bankruptcy, if the experiment is in any degree protracted. Not that your actual consumpt is overcharged, for that is not the case; but when you come to peruse the bill, you begin to understand that Turkey carpets, even in usufruct, are hideously expensive; that Ariel takes tithes, more exorbitantly than any Rector; and that, for the privilege of a fortnight's residence, you are expected to pay at least a year's interest upon the value of the furniture. Also you arrive at the comprehension why wax candles are invariably put down, instead of the lesser luminaries which you employ in your own private abode. Knowledge is always valuable, but you may pay too dearly for it; therefore, on the whole, if your means are limited, we should not recommend you to try the experiment of a West-end private hotel. The cost of a day's entertainment at such an establishment, live as quietly as you will, comes to more than a week's reckoning at Frankfurt. It has long been a reproach against us, who are born on the northern side of the Tweed, that we are economical of our "siller." We accept the accusation as a high compliment. We suit our movements to the state of our purses; and, if we do not launch out in extravagance, neither do we swindle. But there is no wisdom in sacrificing to fashion, when you can command the same amount of comfort for nearly one third of the expenditure.

"Clubs!" was the old cry of the followers of Jack Cade, and, in later times, it was a favorite whoop among the London apprentices. Heaven be praised, the word has now no such violent significance in Britain, whatever it may have elsewhere. All of us have heard mention of the Clubs of Paris, which attained such fearful notoriety in the days of the barricades. What were they in outward show? We confess that we feel a good deal of curiosity on that point, and should be thankful for information. Clearly they were not convivial institutions where men ate and drank; for refection never goes hand in hand with revolution, nor malt with massacre. No sanguinary conspirator ever grappled cordially with the tankard. Shakspeare, whose fine perception is never at fault, sufficiently indicates this eternal truth in the conspiracy scene at the house of Brutus, in the play of Julius Cæsar, where the host never once thinks of offering his visitors even a paltry stoup of Falernian. Had their business been of another nature, we should have had the stage direction: "Enter Lucius with wine;" and the cheering invitation of "Sit, sirs, and fill!" would have given a vivacity to the gathering. But conspiracy does its work dry-lipped, and that Shakspeare knew full well. Had the high contracting parties, who arranged the defeat of Lord Derby's administration, taken their claret freely, the fine vinous influence would have been an antidote to the factious poison. But they could not do it. At such a consultation, the best vintage of Lafitte would have tasted nauseously, for there is an honesty in the pure juice of the grape, which even Archemage could not withstand. So the butler had a sinecure; and Trebonius and Metellus Cimber went to bed with nothing stronger than soda-water upon their stomachs, which fact may account for subsequent symptoms of flatulency, and rumors of intestine disorder. But to return to the French clubs. We can't suppose that they were like our own masonic lodges; for in them, as we are given to understand, a wholesome degree of Spartan conviviality is maintained, within the limits of proper discretion; and the only true bond of fraternity is ratified by a temperate cup. We have a vision of these Parisian clubs. We see before us a darkened staircase, up which young Robespierre is led blindfolded — a vestibule with a hideous apparition — some awful metaphysical signals; and then the neophyte is led into a bare room, where the old mummery of the Vehmgericht is enacted. President masked in red — Council similarly veiled in black. Hannibal's altar — more daggers displayed thereon than ever graced the belt of Alessandro Massaroni — a considerable sprinkling of skulls, blue lights, and a blasphemous oath; and then the sworn Socialist is dismissed, without knowledge of the locality where these Eleusinian mysteries were performed, but with a ticket, referring him simply to his immediate captain, whose orders he must obey implicitly, in case he can persuade another idiot to undergo the like infernal baptism. Such is our notion of the French clubs, as gathered from contemporary hints; and really we cannot conceive anything more purely diabolical. But it is a startling fact that such societies have existed for nearly sixty years, in France, in Italy, and, what is more our immediate concern, in Ireland. They may slumber for a time — for snakes hybernate — but they do not die; and always, at the approach of a political crisis, they revive. We are no admirers of the new Emperor of the French, because we do not pretend to fathom his policy, and have no great faith in his pacific declarations; but, in his internal administration, which is all that we have now to deal with, we think that he has acted most wisely in smiting down the clubs at once. A vast deal of nonsense is talked in this country about the freedom of the press. There is no peculiar sanctity, that we know of, in printer's ink. Treason in types is as bad as, nay, worse than, spouted sedition; and when the press has reached that point of outrageous license which inculcates anarchy and revolution, it is the duty of a government to put it under restraint. Sir Charles Wood, by his recent speech at Halifax, stultified himself as a man, and disgraced himself as a minister of the crown. He demonstrated, what we have all along believed, that he has no knowledge whatever of the posture of affairs on the Continent; and we doubt not that he has, moreover, convinced Lord Aberdeen of the monstrous blunder which he committed by inviting him to become a member of his cabinet. Louis Napoleon is quite competent to conduct his own affairs; and, at all events, requires no advice from so very imbecile a quarter. Of course, it never could occur to Sir Charles Wood to ask himself, how it was that the liberty of the press in France, once so unrestricted, came to be finally abolished! Yet, after all, its present degraded position is to us the strongest proof of the necessity which existed for coercive measures. It is not in the nature of things—it is not within the limits of possibility—that a free press, speaking loyally and constitutionally, could have been put into fetters. It sank into bondage solely because it had been the advocate of anarchy. Swiftly, in states, does retribution follow on the footsteps of crime. But for the revolutionary movements, brought about, in a great measure, through the instrumentality of the French press, that Louis Napoleon, who is now charged with being its violator, never would have had it in his power to stretch forth a finger against it. True freedom can only be maintained by a jealous observance of order. Anarchy begets despotism; and it is as unreasonable for a revolutionist to complain of the consequences of his folly, as it would be for a man who has been experimenting with combustibles in his study, to raise an outcry if his house should happen to be consumed by the fiery element. We, too, have our political clubs; but we are glad to think that, in none of them is there any talk of treason, or hatching of revolutionary schemes. Each of them is the head-quarter of a state party—or was, because we really do not understand how, under the present arrangements, the old distinctions can be maintained. Why should Sir William Molesworth belong to the Reform, and Mr. Gladstone to the Carlton Club? They are both members of one cabinet—are supposed to be acting in strict political concert—and, in truth, must be acting together cordially, if they are honest, which we doubt not. In clubs, indeed, the ministerial hand is divided. One half of them go to the one, and the other half to the other place of resort. The occupants of the Treasury bench, who have been working all day together, separate amicably in the evening, and form two divisions, one of them enlightening the Whig, and the other the Tory subalterns! Anything more egregiously absurd than this can hardly be imagined; and we need no other argument to convince us that the present coalition is not destined to have long endurance. In this country, so far as our internal regulations are concerned, party is a social tie; and, like all other such ties, it cannot be violated with impunity. The Peelites—we call them such still, in order to indicate the section of men to whom we refer—are chargeable with bad faith in having continued to be members, or rather in frequenting an exclusively political club, after they had ceased to act in concert with the party of which that club was constituted. We say nothing about vested rights of membership, or considerations of pounds, shillings, and pence—all that is fudge. The plain common sense view is, that those gentlemen had seceded from the principles of the club, and they, therefore, ought to have resigned. A clergyman of the Church of England does not lose the benefit of clergy because he joins the Church of Rome; but he is bound, at all events, to leave his mother church—he cannot, at the same moment, be an Anglican and a Romanist. If a member of a tee-total society become converted to the principles of Bacchus, we should hold him inexcusable if he insisted on discussing his bottle, or, mayhap, magnum of port, in the presence of the other members of the Anti-Jolly-dog Club, who can barely carry their chicory. He has infringed the primordial rule; and, though expulsion may not be a declared penalty for his offence, he ought in common decency to retire. We are very desirous to touch upon this matter with extreme delicacy, because, although it has been made the subject of public remark, comment, and correspondence, it is, strictly speaking, a question only proper to the members of the clubs. But a great political party club is, in our day, an institution of public interest. It is not like a place of entertainment, or a literary, service, or local club—it is a party sanctuary, the sanctity of which depends upon its peculiar worship. Thousands, who are not members, have and feel a strong interest in that; for it is undeniable that those clubs do constitute the grand rendezvous of party. No character can be baser than that of the deliberate spy; and, without supposing that any man, pretending to the character or status of a gentleman, could be guilty of such infamous infamy, we would merely say that no one of right feeling ought to place himself in such a position as to incur the most distant hazard of such a charge. That charge never has been, and never could be, brought against any statesman, or men in high official situations. They may have acted injudiciously or unwisely in frequenting political clubs—from the general theory of which a change in their political creed, however conscientiously made, may have caused them to differ—but their honor is beyond question. Ugly stories, however, are abroad about less scrupulous eavesdroppers, and snakes in the grass; and it is very desirable, indeed, that even the suspicion should be allayed. Obviously it is intolerable that, at an exclusively political club, no gentleman can speak his mind freely, without taking the precaution of scanning the whole of the apartment, lest, within earshot, there may lurk some knavish underling of the other party. We have no liking for half-and-half, preferring to have our liquor unadulterated; and we have not the slightest notion of making a confidant of Janus. If a man is to be a Whig, let him say so, and keep to his company; if he is to be a Conservative, let him eschew Whig alliances. The worst of the present system is, that the Liberals have all the advantage. There are no spies in the Reform Club, whatever there may be in the Carlton; and, even on the supposition that the present state of matters is the necessary result of political changes which were unforeseen, we may be pardoned for wishing to see a speedy adjustment.

The truth is that we set great store by the maintenance of these clubs in their integrity. We do not refer to the one more than to the other, being of opinion that the character of an opposition is almost as valuable and important to the country as the character of an administration. We take it for granted that most men are drawn to one or other of these clubs from considerations of political principle. The members of it are his associates, and it is every way desirable that there should be an identity of interest and of sentiment; for there can be no doubt that in every club, of whatever nature it may be, harmony is the grand desideratum. Who would choose to belong to, or continue in, a society where he is sure to meet, every day in his life, with the very persons towards whom he entertains the most antipathy? It may be said that the cases are not parallel, because, fortunately for us, political differences in this country rarely lead to the interruption of private friendship. We admit all that, and are exceeding glad that it is so; but it must be remembered that the institutions of which we are discoursing were founded for political objects, and for these alone. We have no doubt that every member of Parliament could find more congenial society elsewhere, if he merely consulted his private taste and inclination. But he does not do so. He joins the Carlton or the Reform as a party-man, and we should be sorry to think that the system is likely to be interrupted or to fall into disuse. Even those who dislike party must admit that it is better than cabal; and, for ourselves, we anticipate, if the disorganization of parties should be permanent, nothing else than a wretched and unwholesome, as well as dangerous development of cabals. But enough of this. We shall regret extremely, if, in the foregoing remarks, we have given offence to any one, our object simply being to enforce the doctrine that in a purely political club it is very desirable never to lose sight of, nor contravene, the original cause of its foundation.

With regard to other clubs we have absolutely nothing to say. It never was allowed to us to penetrate into the interior of the Oriental, so that we might listen to the legends of its denizens touching Futtighur and Chittapore. It is, we are led to suppose, a little Hindostan in the heart of London, between which and Cheltenham the members are perpetually vibrating; and we imagine it is unsurpassed for its curries. Of the Service Clubs we venture not to speak; nor of the Athenæum, which is the first of the literary establishments. Club life, indeed, is a peculiar feature of the present age, and hitherto there have been no symptoms of decay, though we doubt whether the system will admit of much greater extension. On this point it is worth quoting the opinion of Sir E. B. Lytton, who, in his England and the English, written nearly twenty years ago, made the following remarks:—

“Clubs form a main feature of the social system of the richer classes of the metropolis. Formerly they were merely the resort of gamblers, politicians, or bons vivans—now, they have assumed a more intellectual character; every calling has its peculiar club—from the soldiers’ to the scholars’. The effect which this multiplicity of clubs has produced is salutary in the extreme; it has begun already to counteract the solitary disposition of the natives; it opens a ready intercourse with our foreign guests, who are usually admitted as honorary members; prejudices are rubbed off; and by an easy and unexpensive process, the most domestic or the most professional learn the views of the citizen of the world. At these resorts the affairs of the public make the common and natural topic of conversation; and nothing furthers the growth of public principle like the discussion of public matters. It is said that clubs render men less domestic. No: they only render them less unsocial; they form a cheap and intellectual relaxation, and (since in most of the recent clubs the custom turns to neither gambling nor inebriety) they unbend the mind even when improving it. But these are the least advantages of clubs; they contain the germ of a mighty improvement in the condition of the humbler classes. I foresee that those classes will, sooner or later, adopt institutions so peculiarly favorable to the poor. By this species of coöperation, the man of 200*l.* a-year can, at present, command the nobler luxuries of a man of 5000*l.* — airy and capacious apartments, the decent comforts of the table; lights, fires, books, and intellectual society. The same principle, on a humbler scale, would procure the same advantages for the shop-keeper or the artisan, and the man of 50*l.* a-year might obtain the same comforts as the man of 500*l.*”

Since the above passage was written, a decided movement has been made by the class referred to, but not altogether in the direction indicated by the author. Lecture and reading rooms have sprung up in every considerable town, but there has been no attempt, as yet, to push the experiment farther. Indeed, we doubt much whether it could succeed. In the first place, there is a certain limit below which the outlay cannot be reduced; and we fear that limit is beyond the justifiable expenditure of persons of contracted means. In the second place, without more leisure than he is likely to be able to afford, a club-house would be to an artisan a mere ordinary, and would too often detach him from his proper domestic duties. Our habits or modes of life must ever be mainly regulated by our means of expenditure; and perhaps the most serious objection which can be urged to the club system, arises from the fact that men of small means can thereby habitually command the luxuries which, in domestic life, pertain to wealth alone. Some men require the application of the spur. Though very far from being philosophers in the proper acceptation of the term, they have a decidedly philosophical dislike of anything like undue exertion; and if they find that they can live, in one character, as comfortably upon £300 a-year, which may chance to be the amount of their patrimony, as another can upon £3000 in his own peculiar home, not a few of the epicureans will be apt to shrink from undertaking that labor, in which is comprehended the greater portion of the happiness and utility of man.

Doubtless — wits of the Garrick Club — you, in looking over the foregoing three or four pages, consider us as betraying evident symptoms of senility. What would you have? Would it be possible for us, in these hyperborean regions, where the snow is now lying two feet deep, to chronicle your facetiæ — whether they relate to the tonsorial operation said to have been performed upon one of your members, or to any other incident of fun that constitutes the zest of your existence? No! Good fellows all, we greet you heartily; and hope that, in the coming time, your walls may never reëcho with a less burst of genuine fun than has been elicited from them in the happy days of yore!

And now — what is our moral? That, we confess, is rather a ticklish consideration; for, though we began this paper with a distinct moral view, we have been led into so many episodes that we have some difficulty in the summing up. Still, we are not without arrangement. And, first of all, we would beseech wives to be tolerant on the subject of clubs; because these institutions do, to a certain extent, promote the happiness of their husbands, and make them more useful members of society. At the same time, we by no means intend to dissuade them from a proper degree of jealousy. If the husband appears likely to become too clubbistic, let him mildly be made aware of his backslidings; and, if the appeal is gently entered, the odds are that the delinquent will be reclaimed. The comfort of a club, however great it may be, is nothing to the comfort of a happy home; and it is towards the establishment of that that a wife should bend her genius. Men, in the gross, are not monsters, nor are they exorbitantly selfish — though we deny not that exceptions occur — and, what is as much to the purpose, they are very easily led. Witness that huge hulk, Hercules, whom Omphale compelled to spin, and whom Dejanira trepanned even in the matter of his shirts! The old fable had a distinct meaning. It pointed to the supremacy of the married woman, provided she knows how to set about it. To dowagers, with daughters, who lament that their lot has fallen in evil days, we would breathe a word of encouragement. Let them, too, endeavor to make their houses agreeable places of resort, and we are ready to stake our existence that they will not find the clubs operate to their disadvantage. But if they will persist in the preposterous theory, that the only proper method of exhibiting the accomplishments of young women is the enactment of the part of a Bacchante, we have nothing further to say. Fitzurse, who is the best partner at the polka that can be found, is no fool, at least in so far as monetary notions are concerned. That distinguished officer is in the habit of declaring, at mess, that he won't sell himself — by which the jackanapes means marriage — for less than a certain number of thousands; and nobody can blame Fitzurse, since it is notorious that a lesser amount would not suffice to clear him of his previously contracted debts. But, in the mean time, at every ball or assembly Fitzurse monopolizes your daughter, which is surely not the best recommendation for that very handsome and sprightly girl. O mothers! in whatever grade of life you may move, do justice to your children. Teach them what is truly valuable; and, though fashion be against you, keep them from that too close contact and familiarity with the other sex, which, though it affects not virtue, mars the bloom of modesty. Use your own eyes. If we are wrong, you will be able to confute us; but we venture to say that, out of that wilderness of phantoms now rushing past you, as if under the delirious influence of opium, you can hardly select half-a-dozen of whose addresses to your daughter you would approve. Very well! let us withdraw and inspect that half-dozen. Three of them don't care one fig for any girl in the room. They are there because they like the excitement, which is, in fact, the chief part of their existence; and if you can bring them to book, you will have accomplished a feat which fifty mammas have striven in vain to achieve. We grant that you have some chance with the other three. But what are they? Asses — contemptible in intellect, callous in feeling, and such as do not possess any one quality (beyond acres or dividends) which could possibly recommend them to your notice. "But, then, the acres and the dividends?" Madam, we thought we had the honor of conversing with a British, not with a Circassian mother.

If it be the fact, as we have heard it alleged, that beauty is at a discount in the matrimonial market, we conceive that we have stated quite sufficient reason to account for the extraordinary depreciation. And we do not think that, so long as the present system prevails, there is any great likelihood of enticing young men from the clubs, or of altering the rates of quotation. However, that is no concern of ours. We never were fond of preaching; and if the notions which we now propound should be rejected with scorn, we shall endeavor to bear the obloquy. We may, however, and perhaps ought, to say, that these notions are entertained by more young men of the present generation than possibly dowagers are aware of.

Finally, we would recommend the too enthusiastic clubbist not to become too enamored of his microcosm. Doubtless, within the walls of his pet establishment there are to be found several agreeable companions and associates — Smith, the politician, who is great at the breakfast-table, and who, somehow or other, is admitted to the arcana of state secrets, whatever ministry may be in power — Jenkins, the dilettante, who can tell you everything about the opera — Miller, the famous jester — Fitzball, the pride of the billiard-room — and Badmington, the connoisseur of vintages, whose advice becomes valuable about dinner-time. But those excellent individuals do not constitute the whole world. They are mortal. Some day or other Smith will be as dead as the treaty of Unkiar Skelessi — Jenkins will have looked on his last pirouette — Miller will be gathered to the patriarchal Joseph — the fine wrist of Fitzball will be motionless — and Badmington be laid in an alcoholic grave. Of that jovial band you may be the sole survivor, feeding upon melancholy reminiscences, and conversing uncomfortably with ghosts. The time will come — and perhaps it is not very far distant — when you will discover that the best of all possible clubs is but a poor substitute for a home. And this also is undeniable, that no inveterate club-lounger ever yet attained to distinction. Have, then, a noble ambition; and, whilst you avail yourself of the pleasures within your reach, do not permit them to enslave you. Every man stands in imminent danger of being carried captive to some Castle of Indolence, and the club may be your moral Bastille.

But wherefore prose we further? Is this a time for moralizing, when the only fine frost which we have known for four successive winters has arrested the rivers, covered the lakes with a solid mirror, and is even now inviting us to take part in the national game? For, of all existing clubs, the Curling Club is that which we frequent with the most intense delight. Let us see. It is now mid-day, and the thermometer is standing at twenty-three in the shade! Already our jolly brethren will be sending the stones roaring up the rinks on the pond of Duddingstone Policy. The lawyer will have flung aside his brief, and the banker deserted his desk, in honor of the exhilarating holiday; and foul shame would it be were we the last at that gathering. On this day, nine of our chosen are to contend for the integrity of their ice against any other nine in Scotland; and though the West produces most famous curlers, with the good and gallant Earl of Eglinton at their head — a chieftain whose removal Ireland will long deplore — and though the men of Bathgate and the Kirk of Shotts, who are sometimes able to practise in the dog-days, may be our opponents, we are yet not timorous for the result. At all events, even if defeated, there will be balm in Gilead; for we already scent beef and greens, from time immemorial — yea, from the days of Fergus the First — the curlers' appointed banquet. Not all the Nine of Parnassus — not even Maga herself — could detain us longer from the fun; and, therefore, with a sudden impulse, we jerk our pen into the fire.

From the Examiner.

The Private Journal of F. S. Larpent, Esq., Judge Advocate-General of the British Forces in the Peninsula, attached to the Head Quarters of Lord Wellington during the Peninsular War, from 1812 to its close. Edited by SIR GEORGE LARPENT, Bart. 3 vols. Bentley.

NEARLY half a century ago Mr. Francis Seymour Larpent was a barrister on the Western Circuit, a friend of William Adam's, Francis Horner's, Manners Sutton's, and other distinguished men, a fellow of St. John's in Cambridge, of good reputation as a scholar and fair ability as a lawyer, but with a practice so moderate and little likely to increase that he was easily induced, when Manners Sutton became Judge Advocate-General, to accept from him (in 1812) the office of Judge Advocate to the armies in Spain under Lord Wellington's command. He joined, by way of Lisbon, in the autumn of 1812, proceeded immediately to head-quarters which were then at Rueda (just beyond Salamanca), and remained in attendance on Lord Wellington to the close of the war in 1814, when he returned with the last detachment from Bordeaux.

The present volumes are a reprint of the journal and letters which he sent home, describing everything of interest that was occurring to him almost from day to day, manifestly not written with the remotest view to any but a private circle, restricted always to what was passing within his particular sphere of observation, and carrying everywhere the stamp of a clear-judging, fair-speaking, accurate and truth-telling man. There does not seem to have been any false heroics about Mr. Larpent, and we find no mystifying; magnifying, or writing for effect, in his journals. Their charm is that of easy, unaffected, natural description and anecdote, often very minute, generally very characteristic, and always felt to be genuine. They contain, we should add, far more of the misery, than of the glory of war; — so vivid a picture, indeed, of the horrors undergone in the acquisition of military fame, and of the horrors yet more dreadful to be endured by the unhappy people whose fields and homes are the theatre on which it is acquired, has rarely perhaps been given to the world. We must confess that we never felt such sympathy for our "scandalous allies," never were inclined to such measure of toleration even for their notorious ingratitude, as on laying down Mr. Larpent's journals. Very vile, nevertheless, must we think the conduct, not seldom, as well of the peasantry as of the nobility and cortes of Spain.

But the supreme interest of the book centres in Lord Wellington. Without any attempt, formal or otherwise, to describe or portray the Commander-in-Chief, there are not many pages of Mr. Larpent's volumes from which some illustrative trait may not be drawn. It is only as we read, chapter after chapter, that the character unfolds itself before us, often in the most casual, the most trivial things, but always consistently, always in the right proportions, always with the impress upon it of the man since so much more familiar to all of us in every quality he possessed — "the great Ulysses whom we knew." Upon him everything depends, as Mr. Larpent soon discovers; the rest are the guns, drums, trumpets, signifying not very much. Of the inspirations and movements of military genius which govern the greater incidents of the war, Mr. Larpent, of course, knows nothing, and professes to know nothing; but he cannot help seeing, and showing us, that everything around him is sustained by the decision and energy of one man, that the faculties of this man seem always equal without strain or pressure to whatever is demanded of them, that they regulate everything which nothing else appears to have the least power to regulate, that difficulties vanish in their presence, and only when he is absent, or his movements suspended or concealed, is fear or misgiving anywhere discernible. We cannot show this, however, by single extracts; for Mr. Larpent is never making out a case, never formally professing to show you what courage there was in this Lord Wellington, what patience, temperance, industry without parallel, what an eagle glance for measuring means and ends, what a spirit undaunted by reverse and unmoved by success, what clearness of judgment, what unflinching power to do at once whatever was needed to be done, and what a determination and severity, as of Fate itself, against all that threw obstructions in his way. We are left to derive all this, as best we can, from the cumulative evidence of brief anecdotes, observations not always even complimentary, remarks casually let fall, or little incidents that occur in Mr. Larpent's official experience, scattered without order or connection over the surface of the three volumes. We shall somewhat depart, therefore, from our usual plan to present in our own way whatever we think most valuable or interesting in these illustrations of the character of Wellington — not grudging time or space if the result should satisfy the reader as it has informed and entertained ourselves.

Mr. Larpent's journal opens with some lively and agreeable description of the fare and accommodation that awaited him in Portuguese and Spanish villages on his way to head-quarters. His estimates of comfort, however, undergo many changes in the course of his journal, as his early opinions of other things receive great modification. His first favorable impressions of the Spanish people and cottages and modes of life, for example, are much changed on an enlarged experience ; and what he thought but scant accommodation on his way to head-quarters, he had frequent reason to sigh for as something princely and unattainable in later months of the campaign. It is, perhaps, the peculiarity of his position that we should hear from him the worst of what is to be said of the English army, both officers and men ; but it is certain that the impression in this respect left by his book is the reverse of pleasing.

At his first audience of Lord Wellington the latter placed in his hands fifty cases against officers, and very angry and discontented altogether he appears to have been. "A pretty army I have here!" was one of his first remarks to Mr. Larpent. "They all want to go home ; but no more shall go except the sick." After an interview or two, however, the law officer takes heart to say that "in business affairs," he likes Lord Wellington much ; "he is so ready and decisive, and civil moreover, though some complain a little of him at times and are much afraid of him." This latter is an emotion indeed which Mr. Larpent himself cannot for some time shake off ; — feeling something like a boy going to school as he goes up with his charges and papers for instructions ; — but when they get upon such terms as that Wellington says on seeing him "How are you?" (it takes some four months to arrive at that), matters go on more easily.

Before this, however, the breakings, hangings, and floggings for recovery of discipline, have been very painfully frequent ; yet Wellington's greatest source of annoyance arises from the fact that the courts will not do their duty. With an oath he tells Mr. Larpent that his whole table is covered with details of robbery and mutiny and complaints from all quarters in all languages, and that he shall be nothing but a general of courts-martial. But "how can you expect," he added on another occasion, "a court to find an officer guilty of neglect of duty, when it is composed of members who are all more or less guilty of the same?" Yet in the month when that remark was made "we have," says Mr. Larpent, "hung six, broke several officers (at least their cases are sent home with that sentence), and flogged about sixteen or eighteen, and we are still at work ;" and after another fortnight, out of something less than fifty cases tried, he says they have hung eight, transported eight or ten, flogged about sixty severely, and broke several officers. It is right to add what is elsewhere thrown out by the Judge Advocate, that though he thinks Wellington reasonable enough, he thinks him also often a little hasty in ordering trials when an acquittal must be the consequence. Always civil, he continues to find him ; but at times "quick, and hasty in business." He nearly got into a scrape one day by saying a good word for a captain not personally known to him, but generally respected for his good character. He goes on to say that he does not believe he has himself any weight in swaying the Commander-in-Chief's decisions ; "he thinks and acts quite for himself ; with me, if he thinks I am right, but not otherwise ;" but he certainly did not find (what officers had said) that it was his habit instantly to determine against anything suggested to him. One day when the number of courts-martial under discussion was quite overwhelming, Wellington graciously remarked — "If your friends knew what was going on here, they would think you had no sinecure. And how do you think I was plagued, when I had to do it nearly all myself?"

Mr. Larpent's impression of the officers in the lower branch of the staff was uniformly bad ; it did not improve on experience, and it left him with "a moderate opinion of the profession, which has not the independence I flatter myself I have seen in all the most respectable at the bar." Nor did longer experience improve his opinion of the men. The first great battle he saw was that of Vittoria, and his account of the discipline of the English troops after the battle (in which, let us interpose, he is fully borne out by what Wellington himself says in his Despatches) is very painful to contemplate. In everything but courage he pronounces them inferior soldiers to the Germans. On march they get sulky and desperate, he says, drink excessively, and become daily more weak and unable to proceed. It was often lamentable, he adds, to contrast the inferior persons yet more soldierlike of one of the picked foreign divisions, side by side with the noble physique and degraded morals of our countrymen. "Lord Wellington feels it much, and is much hurt." A remark of Mr. Larpent's points no doubt at the correct explanation. Courage is an unreasoning quality — and the foreigner, from seeing consequences more, and feeling them more, loses proportionately in that direction, though he is rendered more sober and orderly whenever it becomes material.

After all, however, courage, endurance, unflinching hardihood, the unreflecting obstinacy that will not be beaten, the unconquerable spirit never to yield or submit — these are the qualities for a field of battle, and from the English soldier they shine out with appalling lustre. Over and over again is Wellington found saying that there never was a scrape he got into in his life out of which he had not perfect reliance that these would extricate him ; and the same simple, manly answer he gives to a talkative French deserter (a Lieutenant-Colonel) who questions him about a position he once got into with Soult involving a scrape, only Soult did not take advantage of it.

He tried to pump Lord Wellington, and said, "If he had cut you off, perhaps you would have recrossed the Tormes, and made for the Benevente road? but you would have suffered much." Upon which Lord Wellington observed, "No, I certainly should have done no such thing; that would have been ruin. But, if you must know what I should have done, I should have done that which many thought I ought to have done as it was — I should have fought, and trusted to the bravery of my troops to get me out of the scrape." The Frenchman then said, "No one ought to have blamed you for not doing that, unless it was absolutely necessary, for the French were twenty thousand stronger than you were, and their cavalry was then very numerous, and in the highest order."

To this let us subjoin a passage nobly illustrative of the spirit of gallant emulation, of the eagerness of danger and honor, which distinguish all classes of men "whose limbs are made in England." A service of extraordinary peril is to be undertaken —

There was nothing but confusion in the two divisions here last night, (the light and fourth), from the eagerness of the officers to volunteer, and the difficulty of determining who were to be refused and who allowed to go and run their heads into a hole in the wall, full of fire and danger! Major Napier was here quite in misery, because, though he had volunteered first, Lieutenant-Colonel Hunt of the 52nd, his superior officer, insisted on his right to go. The latter said that Napier had been in the breach at Badajoz, and he had a fair claim to go now. So it is among the subalterns; ten have volunteered where two are to be accepted. Hunt, being lieutenant-colonel, has nothing but honor to look to; as to promotion, he is past that. The men say they don't know what they are to do, but they are ready to go anywhere.

It is needless to say that Wellington exposes himself and his staff with the most daring coolness at all times. It is the constant source of uneasiness, remonstrance, and (as we shall see) of pious protests and psalmody from priests and nuns. See how his staff suffered in a mere slight incidental affair — and what his own dangers were on this and other occasions.

Colonel Delauney* took one color, and rode on before the regiments to carry them on. General Hope was much exposed, and got two blows, one on the shin, and one on his side, but of no consequence. Gen. Packenham had a horse shot under him, his best charger. Gen. Robinson is shot through the body, a bad wound. Two of Gen. Sir S. Cotton's officers, his aide-de-camps, who were there as amateurs, suffered. One coming home was shot in the thigh. Many others had narrow escapes, and Lord Wellington remained exposed, untouched! it is really wonderful. . . . Sir John Hope was, including his dress, touched in seven places, besides a shot in his horse, and through his large hat. The skin wound, though slight, is the only wound that gives him pain. Lord Wellington blames his exposing himself; with what face I know not. . . . We were all yesterday surprised by the news that the French pickets were all withdrawn near Bayonne on our front on this side, and that we might proceed close in to the works round Bayonne. What this means exactly we none of us know; Lord Wellington, however, was over immediately, to have a peep into the town on that side. Careless about himself, he got so close, that I understand there were some French in a house within about forty yards of him, and he did not move until he thought a French frigate lying in the harbor, seemed to be making some preparations, as if going to fire at the party. . . . Lord Wellington himself, with two other officers, went to the spot also to reconnoitre with his own eyes. Concealing his general's hat with an oilskin, he got into conversation with the French vidette, dismounted, got down to the water-side, looked all about him, saw all he wished, and came away. I think this was risking too much; but no French soldier would have any idea of the commander of the allied forces going about thus with two attendants.

That last instance was at Toulouse; but a few months earlier Wellington had at length been struck on the hip by a spent ball at Orthes — "a bad bruise and the skin broken" — whereupon, exclaims Mr. Larpent, after expressing what seems to have been the general fear that his hard riding after the wound might tend to make it of more consequence than it really was — "all our prospects here would vanish with that man!" Alava, who was riding with Wellington at the time, not many minutes before had received a precisely similar hurt, whereupon Wellington (according to his own account to Mr. Larpent) began laughing at Alava having had a knock, and telling him it was all nonsense and that he was not hurt — when he suddenly received this blow, and a worse one, in the same place himself. "Alava said it was to punish him for laughing at him."

Here is a striking illustration, quietly related by himself, of his calm self-possession in the midst of danger.

Having been writing nearly all day yesterday, I took an evening stroll and then went and sat down on the churchyard parapet wall. In ten minutes who should come there but Lord Wellington, solus? After one turn he came and sat on the wall with me, and talked for more than half an hour. Amongst other things I said, I hoped you in England would hear Soult's account of the Maya business first, as you then would be alarmed and value the latter account by the Prince of Orange as it deserved. He said, "Why, at one time it was rather alarming, certainly, and it was rather a close-run thing. When I came to the bridge of Sahaugen, I saw the French on the hills, on one side, and was clear we could make a stand on the other hills in our position on the 28th; but I found we could not keep Sahaugen, that it was exposed to their fire and not to ours. I determined to take the position, but was obliged to write my orders accordingly at Sahaugen, to send back instantly, as, if they were not despatched back directly the way I had come, I must have sent four leagues round in a quarter of an hour later. I stopped, therefore, to write accordingly, people saying to me all the time 'the French are coming, the French are coming.' I looked pretty sharp after them, however, every now and then until I had done, and then set off, and I saw them just near one end of the village, as I went out at the other end; and then we took our ground."

* Should not this be Delancey?

And here follow two similar anecdotes, told by Lord Aylmer:—

Lord Aylmer gave me two striking instances of Lord Wellington's coolness; one, when in a fog in the morning, as he was pursuing the French, he found a division of our men, under Sir William Erskine, much exposed in advance, and nearly separated from the rest of the army, and the French in a village within a mile of where he was standing. He could see nothing. But, on some prisoners being brought in, and being asked what French division and how many men were in the village, they, to the dismay of every one except Wellington, said that the whole French army were there. All he said was, quite coolly, "Oh! they are all there, are they? Well, we must mind what we are about, then." Another time, soon after the battle of Fuentes d'Onore, and when we were waiting in our position near them to risk an attack, to protect the siege of Almeida, one morning suddenly and early Lord Aylmer came in to him whilst he was shaving, to tell him "The French were all off, and the last cavalry mounting to be gone;" the consequence of which movement relieved him entirely, gave him Almeida, and preserved Portugal. He only took the razor off for one moment, and said, "Ay, I thought they meant to be off; very well;" and then another shave, just as before, and not another word till he was dressed. I find, however, it is said he magnifies the French now and then—sees double as to the number of blue uniforms, and cannot see all the scarlet; but I believe most men in his situation do this more or less.

It is perhaps only another form of the same cool and hardy indifference to danger, or whatever in his duty may affect him, that he is seldom excited in any degree by the military events of the campaign, however startling; though Murray's unexpected victory over Suchet appears to have moved him a little. On that occasion he "came running" into the military secretary's room when Mr. Larpent was there, crying out, "Murray has beat Suchet, Fitzroy." Generally, however, and at the most difficult times of the war, Mr. Larpent cannot discover that he is in any manner excited by news brought to him, however apparently critical. "I saw Lord Wellington after he had seen the aide-de-camp, and he read a long letter quietly through, and seemed quite at his ease; but he takes all that arises so coolly that this proves nothing." When he loses this coolness is when he finds that orders of his own have been thwarted or delayed, no matter by what cause. "He banishes the terms difficulty, impossibility, and responsibility, from his 'vocabulary'" exclaims Mr. Larpent. Though the elements alone may be to blame, his rage is not less with their luckless victim. Perhaps in another remark of the judge-advocate's we may find something of the clue to this. "Lord Wellington never attends to individual hardships, but to the general good."

An indication of any unusual anxiety with him, we find, from Mr. Larpent, often assumed the form of extreme drowsiness at and after dinner (implying doubtless a failure of sleep the previous night), as immediately before Vittoria, when he had reason to fear that his own moves in the game were being frustrated by less skilful players. And in connexion with this we may add, what will probably surprise many readers, that Mr. Larpent incidentally mentions a proneness in Wellington to lie late a-bed. When any one is in camp whom he has confidence in (Murray is instanced particularly), "he is not so easily roused from bed as he used to be." But it is understood, Mr. Larpent goes on to say, that he was always naturally fond of his pillow; and this they thought borne out by a fact which they all had frequent opportunities of observing, that he would rather ride like an express for ten or fifteen leagues than be early and take time for his work. Many are the times he complains to Mr. Larpent of being kept out of bed till twelve, say one o'clock, reading courts-martial. Sometimes the proceedings at one of these courts will fill ninety or a hundred pages, and, says Mr. Larpent characteristically, "he always complains, and yet I think he likes to read these cases, and know himself exactly all that is going on." So fearfully had his papers accumulated on one occasion, however, after a five days' absence from quarters, that when the judge-advocate came in with another heap to add to them—he put his hands before his eyes, and swore he would not hear a word about them at that moment, or even consent to look at them.

The ordinary course of occupation at headquarters at this particular time is thus described:—

We have none of us much idle time. Dr. M'Gregor has seven hundred men to look after. The quarter-master-general, all the arrangement of the troops, clothing, &c. The adjutant-general, daily returns of the whole, constantly checked by an eye that finds out even a wrong casting up of numbers in the totals. Lord Wellington reads and looks into everything. He hunts every other day almost, and then makes up for it by great diligence and instant decision on the intermediate days. He works until about four o'clock; and then for an hour or two parades, with any one whom he wants to talk to, up and down the little square of Frenada (amidst all the chattering Portuguese) in his gray great-coat.

Sometimes Mr. Larpent accompanies the gray great-coat, takes part in the walk up and down the little square before dinner, and talks with him about affairs at home. The division on Grattan's motion for Catholic Emancipation draws forth opinions a little startling in connection with the events of later years. He strongly disapproves of his brother and Canning having taken up the cause of the Catholics just when the tide was turning against it. He has himself taken up a strong notion ("from what he saw in Ireland") that independence is what the Irish really aim at; and he is therefore for giving no more, but proceeding upon King William's plan to keep them down by main force, as he thinks they have too much power already, and will only use more to obtain more, and at length separation. So, too, at other times, and those even the most critical of the war, he would get into long talks for hours about the poor laws, and the assize of bread, and this Catholic question and condition of Ireland, "just as if he had nothing else upon his mind."

His dislike of newspaper interference in his affairs appears at all times very great — so great, indeed, that even when directed against evils of which he was himself notoriously understood to have complained, and when known to have been prompted by his brother Wellesley's zeal to champion him against assailants in his absence, he prefers for the nonce to take the other side. The letters of Vetus in the Times, for example, he professed to disregard and think lightly of; and "made several of us stare," says Mr. Larpent, by suddenly defending, against Vetus, the very ministers at home against whom his own despatches supply such decisive evidence. Indeed, not many weeks before, he had expressly let that same audience understand that he was "not satisfied with the ministry though not favoring the opposition." It was on the same occasion he remarked that he took in the Courier to know what government meant to do, and as a decent paper to show General Castanos.

The hunting at head-quarters, as we see, is incessant; "almost every other day." There are three "odd sorts of packs of hounds," Lord Wellington's ("or as he is called here, the peer's") of course the best. He has also a good stud of eight hunters, and rides hard on all occasions. But Mr. Larpent was told he knew nothing of the sport, though very fond of it in his own way, his general inducement being a good gallop. He is also very fond of figuring in the Salisbury hunt-coat, sky blue and black cape; and in that costume is often to be seen, in as high spirits and apparently careless enjoyment as if at home with nothing else to do, when the French are literally within sight and bent on mischief. One day, when he has started early with the hunt, Lord March and Col. Gordon are obliged to ride after him in the middle of the day to tell him that signal has been made that the French are in motion.

General Murray says that on hunting days he could get almost anything done, as Lord Wellington stands whip in hand ready to start, and soon despatches all business. Some of the generals (Lord Wellington said one day) used to come and hunt and then get on business, and get him to answer things in a hasty way he did not intend, but which they went away and acted upon. "Oh d—— them," he said, "I won't speak to them again when we are hunting."

Yet one can hardly say that even hunting interrupts business!

Much too hot for hunting, I should think; but all the sportsmen are out. Lord Wellington has not got good horses to be idle; he works them well. Besides all the hunting, &c., the day before yesterday, after doing business until twelve o'clock, off he went by himself, without saying a word to any one, over to Ciudad Rodrigo, seventeen miles off, inspected all the works, and was back again here in five hours and a half to dinner.

Another passion of the commander-in-chief's as marked as his love of hunting, Mr. Larpent was not long in discovering. He celebrates all the anniversaries of his great engagements in the Peninsula by grand banquets. The first that occurred while Mr. Larpent was at head-quarters was to commemorate the storming of Badajoz. The next was the battle of Fuentes d'Onore. The next was the anniversary of the battle of Albuera. Then it is Salamanca, which a great gathering and banquet must celebrate — so that at last Mr. Larpent is fain to exclaim that this great man's victories and successes will ruin him in eating and drinking, and if he goes on as he has been doing, he had better at once keep open house every day.

It is clear that Wellington prided himself not a little on these dinners of his — not simply his extraordinary banquets, but his every-day table.

He asked me yesterday, but I told him General Hill had asked me three days before, and expected me. "Very well," said he, "but I advise you to come to me, nevertheless, as you will get a much better dinner, for General Hill gives the worst dinners going." To General

Hill's, however, I went; and though plain fare, compared to Lord Wellington's, whose table is just now very good, and extremely improved, I got what I call a very good dinner.

There is a grim humor in what follows:—

Lord Wellington looks forward very coolly to another winter here. He said yesterday he should have twenty-five couples of fox hounds next season. The other day the commissary-general told him we had eaten nearly all the oxen in the country, that the cultivation of the lands in Portugal could not go on for want of them, and that he scarcely knew where to turn for a supply of beef, as there was this year no reserve store near Lisbon. Lord Wellington said, "Well, then, we must now set about eating all the sheep, and when they are gone I suppose we must go."

But above all we must give the reader a glimpse of a dinner and ball given by Wellington literally amidst the ruins of Ciudad Rodrigo, when, after first dining some seventy dignitaries, he received two hundred gentlemen and ladies at a ball and supper. The amusing expedients to cover the want of crockery, glass, silver, &c., and generally to veil the nakedness of the place with yellow damasked satin and silver or crimson satin and gold, are capitally related by Mr. Larpent; and the occasion called forth an astonishing activity on the commander-in-chief's part which one does not find to be at all consistent with the sleepy habits we have seen attributed to him!

The day before yesterday we had a hard day's work in the shape of gayety and amusement. My lord was desired to invest General Cole with the Order of the Bath, in a suitable manner. As he has never done anything at Ciudad Rodrigo, of which he is duke, he determined upon this opportunity to give a grand fête there in the midst of the ruins. A grand dinner, ball, and supper. . . . The whole went off very well, except that it was excessively cold, as a few balls during the siege had knocked in several yards of the roof of the ball-room, and it was a hard frost at the time. I never had a colder ride than going there. Lord Wellington was the most active man of the party; he prides himself on this; but yet I hear from those about him that he is a little broken down by it. He staid at business at Frenada until half-past three, and then rode full seventeen miles to Rodrigo in two hours to dinner, dressed in all his orders, &c., was in high glee, danced himself, staid supper, and at half-past three in the morning went back to Frenada by moonlight, and arrived here before daybreak at six, so that by twelve he was ready again for business, and I saw him amongst others upon a court-martial when I returned at two the next day. . . . The whole was laid out so as to astonish the inhabitants, and the defects concealed almost entirely—one hole in the floor had a man near it to see that no one got a leg in, and a mat was over the hole. . . . With great care only a few silver spoons and knives and forks were missing, and I hear one plate. Henry tells me the servants saw one Spanish officer with a turkey's leg sticking out of his pocket; but like our aldermen, they are given to pocket even at Madrid, and have some excuse, as they are paid little, and find everything very dear.

This is all highly picturesque; and we may also observe that there is also a good picture of the duke on another occasion sitting and hearing with considerable coolness his own praises chanted in a Spanish ditty—(three Spanish songs having been written in his honor)—and "calling for it himself at times." On another occasion, however, when the Spaniards insist on entertaining him and his staff with a concert and lemonade (but this is when he is en route for Vittoria) we find him anything but admiring "this time lost in singing psalms to him," as he calls it. In truth the native population appear to have had the notion generally that everything depended individually on Wellington ("as I believe most people here do think," interposes Mr. Larpent); wherefore, at all the great crises of affairs present or expected, all the priests and nuns of the peninsula are sending up choruses of prayers and praise for him. He snuffs up such incense with supreme self-possession.

We are far from disposed, notwithstanding, to question what Mr. Larpent says of occasional touches of vanity to be noted in him. He ranks him in this respect as neither better nor worse than "every great man, present or past, almost without exception." Considering his situation, we are told, he is remarkably neat and particular in his dress; being well made, knowing it, and willing to set off to the best what nature has bestowed. "He cuts the skirts of his own coats shorter, to make them look smarter; and only a short time since I found him discussing the cut of his half-boots, and suggesting alterations to his servant, when I went in on business." Never for an instant, however, is there to be remarked about Wellington the least tendency to pomp or parade. There may be a touch of vanity, but there is none of pomp or humbug, when he appears at the grand gathering of the allies and sovereigns in Paris, amid a blaze of stars and orders, in his blue coat and little round hat. The distinction is always made by Mr. Larpent. He thinks he even carried to an excess his simplicity in respect to personal attendance, though in an amusing instance he records at Toulouse we are left to infer that a motive may at times have existed for it not wholly or exclusively Spartan and severe. A Dutch aide-de-camp of General Clausel's goes to ask Mr. Larpent to get him entré at Wellington's hotel—that he may introduce his general. He fancies they will have to pass through armies of aids, officers, sergeants, sentinels, and Heaven knows what.

It so happened there was no one but an ignorant sentinel. In trying a door or two, we all blundered upon Lord Wellington, who came himself to the door; so I introduced the astonished Clausel and walked off. My Dutch friend told me that Soult and Suchet would have had about six aides-de-camp, &c., in the first room, and a general officer in waiting in the second. I own I think our great man is in the opposite extreme, but he does not like being watched and plagued. Just after the state levée yesterday, I saw him cross the crowded square in his blue coat and round hat, almost unnoticed, and unknown even to the very people who half an hour before had been cheering him. In one angle of Lord Wellington's hotel lives Madame C—, a Spanish beauty, married into a French family of rank, who are the proprietors of the hotel, but who have been obliged to let nearly the whole, reserving this angle. I do not mean to be scandalous, but this perhaps may have decided the choice of the house.

Let us show him also in the act of receiving (what Alava seems to have thought might have justified a little ceremony) the outward and visible token of the general Bonaparteian "smash" at the battle of Vittoria.

General Alava introduced an officer who came to present to Lord Wellington King Joseph's sword—his dress sword set in steel and diamonds, and very handsome. Where taken from, or whence obtained, I did not learn. Lord Wellington just looked at it as he took his seat at dinner, and, telling his man to put it by safe somewhere, fell to at the soup and said no more.

Sometimes a capital point of character is let fall unexpectedly at these dinner parties, with very good effect. There is no arm of the service at which Wellington rails at all times with so little scruple as at the artillery, and at the heaviness and slowness of the officers in command. "I took care to let him feel that I thought him very stupid," he remarked over "the soup" of one of these officers; whereon General Murray says (aside and sotto voce), "That must have been by telling him so in plain terms, I have no doubt." With the slowness of another of these slow officers he was made one day so irate at an interview when the conduct of some "friend" was in question that Wellington cut him short by telling him that "his friend might go to hell," when, overhearing him mutter slowly as he left, "I'll go, sir, to the quarter-master-general for a route," the pacified commander-in-chief "laughed well."

The truth was that these artillery officers annoyed the commander-in-chief by their unwillingness to move out of rule and precedent, or undertake anything which could not first be squared to demonstration, with strict mathematical accuracy. That was not Wellington's way. He was a soldier of all work, combining in his own person whatever was sufficient to preserve him from becoming dependent on the efficiency of subordinates. He had almost as clear a perception in every case of the method of doing the thing, as of the importance of the thing to be done; and he would never admit the possibility of a miscarriage unless the possibility of redeeming it was at the same time admitted. Thus at Badajoz, when the regular bred artillery colonels threw perpetual difficulties in his way, Mr. Larpent tells us he suddenly became principal engineer himself, picking out for his acting man, a young, clever, unhesitating artillery captain, whom he rapidly made major and lieutenant-colonel, "and," Mr. Larpent adds, "he now conducts the whole department here because he makes no difficulties."

This extraordinary aptitude for minute details, combined with the power of directing at the same time the grandest combinations and manœuvres in military science, was what really gave Wellington his supremacy over the greatest generals opposed to him. Mr. Larpent gave several striking anecdotes of the promptitude with which he mastered a difficulty by readjusting his arrangements to the new circumstances. In preparing for the famous passage of the Adour, a want of the due quantity of wood was started as a reason for delay:

To show you how little Lord Wellington listens to objections, and how he rather likes to cut up the routine work, I may mention that Elphinstone told him the quantity of plank necessary would take time, and make a delay. "No," says he, "there are all your platforms of your batteries which have been sent out, in case of a siege. Cut them all up." "Then when we proceed with the siege, what is to be done?" quoth Elphinstone. "Oh, work your guns in the sand until you can make new ones out of the pine-wood near Bayonne." So all the English battering platforms have been cut up accordingly.

A still more remarkable case had occurred at Rodrigo. Scaling ladders became suddenly necessary to take some advanced work before any progress could be made with the siege, and the engineers had no scaling ladders with them. It was put as a hopeless case to Wellington. "Well," he said, no way disturbed, "you have brought up your ammunition and stores, cut them all up directly, they will make excellent ladders—there, you see, each side-piece is already cut." And by the help of these novel ladders the work was scaled forthwith.

It is hardly necessary that we should add, in speaking of Wellington, that there never is any underrating of the power of an adversary, never any disparagement of the abilities of the men opposed to him. When it was reported, after Vittoria, that Bonaparte was himself to appear on the field of action, he said he should estimate his presence as equal to a reinforcement of 40,000 Frenchmen, for that it would give a turn to everything. As little is there a disposition to conceal his own occasional blunders — of which an instance is mentioned in this simple way : —

I dined yesterday at head-quarters, and sat next to Baron Wimpfen, the new quarter-master-general attached here to Lord Wellington. He is a very gentlemanlike man, and talks French well. We had much conversation together, in which Lord Wellington, who sat next to the general, often took part. He gave us the whole history of the battle of Fuentes d'Onore some time since near here, in which the French were three to one, and in which Lord Wellington said he committed a fault in extending his right too much to Posso de Velho ; and that if the French had taken advantage of it, there might have been bad consequences, but that they let him recover himself, and change his front before their face.

In the like unaffected, manly manner he speaks at other times of the advantages possessed by himself over the generals opposed to him. The subjoined extract is interesting for what it shows us of this, and also for what it tells us, with such quiet truth of observation, of the character of Wellington's mind in other respects — from which many undeserved imputations have arisen : —

You ask me if Lord Wellington has recollected — with regard ? He seems to have had a great opinion of him, but scarcely has ever mentioned him to me. In truth, I think Lord Wellington has an active, busy mind, always looking to the future, and is so used to lose a useful man, that as soon as gone he seldom thinks more of him. He would be always, I have no doubt, ready to serve any one who had been about him who was gone, or the friend of a deceased friend, but he seems not to think much about you when once out of the way. He has too much of everything and everybody always in his way to think much of the absent. He said the other day, he had great advantages now over every other general. He could do what others dare not attempt, and he had got the confidence of all the three allied powers, so that what he said or ordered was, right or wrong, always thought right. "And the same" (said he) "with the troops ; when I come myself, the soldiers think what they have to do the most important as I am there, and that all will depend on their exertions ; of course, these are increased, in proportion, and they will do for me what perhaps no one else can make them do." He said he had several of the advantages possessed by Bonaparte, from his freedom of action and power of risking, without being constantly called to account ; Bonaparte was quite free from all inquiry ; he was himself in fact very much so. The other advantage Bonaparte possessed, and which he made so much use of (Lord Wellington said) was his full latitude of lying ; that, if so disposed, he said, he could not do.

Let us remark, too, that his utter want of respect for persons when a matter of propriety or duty is to be considered, is a feature in his character which has continual illustration in Mr. Larpent's volumes. The Prince Regent was excessively anxious to hold regular personal correspondence with him — and "much hurt" at failing to establish it ; but Wellington would not consent. He saw a certain impropriety in admitting any ground of private friendship or relations apart from his necessary communication through the ordinary ministerial channels. "I wrote to his ministers," says Wellington, "and that was enough. What had I to do with him ! However, his late favor was a reason for my writing, and I have had a most gracious answer evidently courting further correspondence." Which he intimated, adds Mr. Larpent, that he should not comply with.

In short, there was one thing Mr. Larpent found Wellington always surprisingly deficient in — "of which there is so much all over the world in every line, and which is often of such infinite use to those who can adopt it," — humbug. It is not the fashion, he says, here at head-quarters. "From Lord Wellington downwards there is mighty little. Every one works hard and does his business. The substance and not the form is attended to ; in dress and many other respects I think almost too little so. . . . The maxim of our chief is, let every one do his duty well, and never let me hear of any difficulties about anything — and that is all he cares about." One would say, on the whole, that it was enough ; and when the difficulties happen to take precedence of the duty, we have seen what storms and rages follow. Nor is there anything he fires up at more (to his honor be it ever mentioned) than at any oppression or plunder of the native and friendly inhabitants which it is within human power and watchfulness to prevent. "He says, if officers will not obey orders, and take care that those under them do so also, they must go home, for he will not command them here ; so many officers seem to think they have nothing to do but fight." Several examples recorded in the volumes of his own prompt and awful punishment of the least excess in friendly towns are sad to read, but doubtless had the effect desired. Here is a melancholy case :

The man was caught in the fact, stealing wine, and brought forward. Lord Wellington had him shot in the most impressive manner this morning, before all the corps, after a solemn admonition, and much parade. I am told the man appeared absolutely dead from fear before a musket was fired. He was unluckily one of the least culpable, for he had only taken away a bottle of wine by force. But he was caught in the fact, and suffered for the sake of example, as the least guilty in reality often do, from the most guilty being also the most knowing.

The officer from whom Wellington appears to have borne most in the way of thwarting or opposition of any kind was General Crauford. He knew his merits, and humored him. He knew also the extraordinary confidence which the men of his own division had in him. Some capital anecdotes of Crauford are told by Mr. Larpent.

He was very clever and knowing in his profession, all admit, and led on his division on the day of his death in the most gallant style; but Lord Wellington never knew what he would do. He constantly acted in his own way, contrary to orders; and as he commanded the advanced-division, at times perplexed Lord Wellington considerably, who never could be sure where he was. On one occasion, near Guinaldo, he remained across a river by himself; that is, only with his own division, nearly a whole day after he was called in by Lord Wellington. He said he knew he could defend his position. Lord Wellington, when he came back, only said, "I am glad to see you safe, Crauford." The latter said, "Oh, I was in no danger, I assure you." "But I was, from your conduct," said Lord Wellington. Upon which Crauford observed, "He is d— crusty to-day."

Of some of the young men about him Wellington appears to have been very fond — of young FitzClarence, for instance, afterwards Lord Munster; and of the young Prince of Orange (afterwards King of Holland) who made himself popular with everybody.

The day before yesterday Lord Wellington ordered young FitzClarence to go and bring up two Portuguese companies to attack. He went. It was close by; but he was highly pleased with the order. When he had given his instructions, he saw a cherry-tree, and went up to break a bough off, and eat the cherries. When Lord Wellington lost his way the other night in the fog (returning to head-quarters), FitzClarence told Lord Wellington he was sure the road was so-and-so, as they had passed the place where he found the two Portuguese companies. "How do you know that?" quoth Lord Wellington. "By that cherry-tree, which I was up in just afterwards," was the answer. It amused Lord Wellington much; and yesterday he called to him, with a very grave face, and desired him to go and get some of the cherries, as if it were an important order.

The Prince of Orange was very thin and slim — which got him a nick-name:

Slender Billy was his nick-name with those who were intimate with him, and he knew it;

for one day, at dinner, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, not knowing he was present, said, "Where is Slender Billy to-day?" Upon which the prince put his head forward, and called out, "Here I am, Fitzroy; what do you want?"

Another prince — no less than the Duke of Angoulême — came afterwards to head-quarters. But he made no mighty impression in any way, and Wellington seemed to have been more than disposed to quiz both him and his gentleman in attendance, Monsieur Damas.

I do not think much of the little duke; his figure and manners are by no means imposing, and I think his talents are not very great. He seems affable and good-tempered, and though not seemingly a being to make a kingdom for himself, he may do very well to govern one when well-established. Lord Wellington was in his manner droll towards them. As they went out, we drew up on each side, and Lord Wellington put them first, they bowed and scraped right and left so oddly and so actively, that he followed with a face much nearer a grin than a smile.

And as the volume is open at this point (soon after the great battle) we will give two more extracts illustrative of remarks already made.

AFTER VITTORIA.

We now began to see the effects of the guns. Dead and wounded men and horses, some in the most horrible condition, were scattered all along the way we passed. These were principally cannon-shot wounds, and were on that account the more horrible. It was almost incredible that some could live in the state we saw them. From my black feather I was taken by some for a doctor, and appealed to in the most miserable voice and affecting manner, so that I immediately took out my feather, not to be supposed so unfeeling as to pass on without taking any notice of these poor creatures. Our hospital spring-wagons were following on, and men with frames to lift up and carry off those near the roads; some in the fields about crawled by degrees into the villages; but hundreds have lain without food or having their wounds dressed until now, two days afterwards. . . . I have been over the hospital, and the scene is most terrible; seventeen or eighteen hundred men, without legs or arms, &c., or with dreadful wounds, and, having had nothing to eat for two or three days, the misery extreme, and not nearly hands sufficient to dress or take care of the men, English, Portuguese, Spaniards, and French altogether, though the Spaniards and Portuguese had at first no provision at all for their people. Half the wounded have been scattered round all the villages in the neighborhood; and there are still many to come in, who arrive hourly, and are lying in all the passages and spare places around the hospital. . . . It was one pass, or valley, all the way from Vittoria here; the road infamous, villages every mile, but much damaged by the French, and the people, from affluence, reduced to misery and distress. Oh war! war! little do you know of it in England.

VERY ANIMATING!

I think I never told you a little anecdote of our General Stewart, who is brave, and always gets his aide-de-camp, &c., into some bad blows, in consequence, if he does not get one himself. His people about him on the 13th were all touched, and he was nearly alone. An officer of the name of Egerton came up, and whilst there a shell burst between them; Stewart said, "A shell, sir! very animating!" and then kept Egerton there talking on.

One of Mr. Larpent's personal adventures, we must not forget to say, was to get himself taken prisoner by the French, who detained him a month before the necessary exchange could be effected. He found among the French a continual curiosity about Wellington "as one of the great men of the age;" and Wellington himself laughed, but did not seem disposed to acquiesce, when Mr. Larpent subsequently told him of the general feeling of the French officers that he ought to die now, "as he never would have such another year, and Fortune would prove fickle." If they could but have seen Waterloo looming in the distance!

When at last the whole British army forced its way into France, it is curious to mark the passionate desire for peace which is found everywhere prevailing or professed, and with it the lamentation and regret (often accompanied with even "curses") for Bonaparte's ambition — while yet hardly anywhere can a word of affection or respect be elicited for the Bourbons. Mr. Larpent is led at last to think that the people would really rather have Bonaparte continued, if they can have him with the condition of peace, than the Bourbons back. Three fourths of the population he believes would be so inclined, speaking from what he witnessed himself. "All have the highest respect for Lord Wellington," he adds, which they say they learn from the French army, high and low."

Of course when once the allies are in Paris, the constitution proclaimed, and the Bourbons installed, the time for any further tests of sincerity or good faith has passed altogether. Nothing now is visible or audible but a huge surface of apparent enthusiasm for the new order of things. Here is Mr. Larpent's account of a dinner at Colonel Campbell's in Toulouse, to which the news of those events in Paris was brought, and of the visit afterwards made to the theatre.

Just as we were sitting down to dinner — about forty of us — General Frere and several Spaniards, General Picton and Baron Alten, the principal French, &c., in came Cooke with the despatches. The whole was out directly, champagne went round, and after dinner Lord Wellington gave "Louis XVIII.," which was very cordially received with three times three, and white cockades were sent for to wear at the theatre in the evening. In the interim, however, General Alava got up, and with great warmth gave Lord Wellington's health, as the Liberador del' Espagna! Every one jumped up, and there was a sort of general exclamation from all the foreigners — French, Spanish, Portuguese, Germans, and all — El Liberador d'Espagna! Liberador de Portugal! Le Libérateur de la France! Le Libérateur de l'Europe! And this was followed, not by a regular three times three, but a cheering all in confusion for nearly ten minutes! Lord Wellington bowed, confused, and immediately called for coffee. He must have been not a little gratified with what had passed. We then all went to the play. The public were quite in the dark as to what had just arrived, but Lord Wellington was received in the stage-box (where he sat supported by Generals Picton, Frere, and Alava, &c., and also the maire) with no little applause, I can assure you. At the door the people would scarcely take the money from us; and in the opposite stage-box the French left the box themselves, and made room for us. We had our white cockades on the breast. The English officers in the house stared, and did not know what to make of it. Some thought it a foolish, giddy trick. In about ten minutes Lord Wellington turned his hat outwards to the front of the box; it was seen, and a shout ensued immediately. The play was "Richard, oh mon Roi" — fixed upon really before the news came. "Henri IV." was played, and then the new French Constitution was read aloud from one of the boxes.

With which grand finale we may close these interesting volumes — dropping the curtain before any one has time to ask how soon it will be before it rises again, to a performance entirely different from that of Richard, oh mon Roi!

The Whole French Language, comprised in a series of Lessons. By T. Robertson. In three volumes. Volume I.

The author of this work proposes to reform the mode of teaching French, both as respects its thorough acquirement and the saving of time by the pupil; which last will be accomplished by means of three full-sized octavo volumes. The plan of Mr. Robertson is based upon what was called the Hamiltonian system — that is, a literal translation of the text, which Mr. Robertson follows by a free translation; the words of one lesson being thoroughly mastered before proceeding to the next. There are various other plans, one of which is to exercise the pupil on the most usual words only, and those chiefly derivatives; and this is good. Another is to mark the pronunciation of every word as it occurs in the lesson, by a complex system of signs; which strikes us as being troublesome and inefficient. — Spectator.

CONSTITUTIONAL LEAGUE IN EUROPE.

ALTHOUGH the mission which a sect of enthusiasts wished to force upon Lord Aberdeen last week has no practical bearing on the actual state of the Continent, on our relations with Foreign Governments, or the proper functions of diplomacy, it does not follow that diplomacy might not be usefully employed in rendering the position of this country more secure and peaceable, and in ultimately averting war by exhibiting the impolicy of those who are most likely to provoke it. Since the settlement of Europe in 1815, the relations of diplomacy have chiefly centred in what are called "the Great Powers"; the majority of whom have for the most part set the fashion in the government of Europe. By this accident it has happened that the great party to which England naturally belongs has been merged in relations that cross each other and prevent its true distinction from the opposite party; and thus it has befallen, that to an unfortunate extent the Constitutional States of Europe, instead of being brought together, have been separated even more in appearance than in fact.

To this as well as to other causes may be ascribed the result, that the Constitutional interest of Europe has been losing ground, as the Absolutist interest has been gaining ground. In the conflict of extreme principles, one is now thoroughly thrown down and the other is triumphant; and in the open war of 1848, while we have seen the defeat of the one and the victory of the other, we have observed that the Constitutional principles, which were scarcely in issue, have been steadily declining. They have been so partly because their champions abstained from actively asserting them, or resolutely vindicating them where assailed; and so they sank out of view, as a quiet man is hustled between aggressive combatants into a corner. The influence of the Constitutional party has indeed declined so far that the actual political existence of some states, at the present day, is called in question; and all must now begin to feel that their safety, if not their independence, is menaced by the overgrowth and the gigantic encroachment of the Absolutist Powers. Passively to witness the undeniable progress of powers who, if not our enemies, at least hold principles incompatible with our political existence, is not to cultivate peace, but to invite a mortal destiny for ourselves. To coquette in "friendly negotiations" with those powers, or with outlying confederates, is not to secure peace, but to disguise from our own sight the hostile intrigues which threaten us. Lord John Russell lately boasted that he was in peculiarly friendly relations with the French government, and was in communication with it "on the state of Europe." Now, how can the Emperor of the French be the fittest person for England to be consulting on the state of Europe? What sympathy can he have with Constitutional government? what community of interest? what experience?

Other states there are, however, whose essential characteristics mark them out as proper allies for England to consult in the critical state of European affairs. Belgium, for example, is bound to us by family ties, by similarity of constitution, and, it may be added, by her perilous position. Holland is inclined to us by her moderation; Denmark has shown a great capacity for appreciating the actual state of affairs; Sardinia is our pupil, and would willingly be our ally. The view which the governments of these states take as to the posture of affairs is a subject that it would much concern our own government to know; and probably if they were specially in communication on such a subject they might not only recognize the exigencies of the time, but discover resources that are at present lost to view for want of means for concentrating information.

Were it known, for example, that Belgium, Holland, Sweden, England, Sardinia, and perhaps Denmark, were in council on the state and prospects of Constitutional organization in Europe, there is little doubt that other states, whose position is more equivocal would rally to the common standard. Spain would be very likely to recover from her coup d'état delusions. Nay, there are states in Europe that have not exhibited any sympathy with political principles, and yet that are so situated as to find their interests more promoted by alliance with the Constitutional League than with the Holy Alliance of extreme Absolutism. Bavaria, for example, who cannot be regarded as belonging to any proselytizing system of political freedom, might yet say to herself—"These immense empires behind me, animated by views of government from which I do not altogether dissent, are growing so gigantic, so overwhelming, and so encroaching in their development, that I run a very serious chance of being altogether submerged in their rise. On the other side, this Constitutional League is by its very principles, and by the commercial character of the people who belong to it, peaceable, non-aggressive, and trustworthy; and, therefore, it will be much more to my interest to throw my weight into that Constitutional League, than to encourage those all-absorbing powers." Prussia, which has grown from a duchy to be almost an empire, but which still has to undergo mortifying dictation from its imperial patrons, would be much tempted to take advantage of any influence that could counterbalance its compulsory allies.

But it is not only individual states that might rally to such a league if it existed and were known to exist. In almost every country of Europe there is a moderate class; and in the most arbitrary of the empires, Austria, the action of the government has been to force that moderate class into opposition. While it is pretended that the revolutions in Italy belong only to extreme classes and low parties, the retributions of the Austrian Marshal—the fines on whole towns, the reproaches addressed to the gentry, the punishment inflicted on nobles and aged priests, in Mantua as well as Milan—prove that the middle and upper classes are forced into opposition, and that the administration of the supreme government has become most intolerable. It is the same in Naples. In Germany there is the party of Gervinus. To such moderate parties the existence of a Constitutional League would be the revival of hope.

Now the first step towards the reorganization of the Constitutional interest of Europe, is to ascertain how it stands. English diplomacy could not employ itself better than in learning the sentiments, the views, and the council of the Constitutional States, as to the future of Europe. There would be no occasion for secrecy in such a mission. The information would suggest the proper course of action; but if it were known that England had taken the initiative in such a proceeding, the very fact might give pause to those arbitrary governments who are now incited to extremities of tyrannical rule by the absence of control or check—who may force us into a war because our passive quiescence invites them to excess.

THIRTEEN years ago the preservation of the Turkish Empire in its independence and integrity was thought by the government of this country worth the risk of an embroilment with France, and a general war. We were told then that Russia, Austria, and England could not suffer France to protect a rebellious vassal against the chastisement of the Sultan, and that no matter at what umbrage to the French government and people, Mehemet Ali must be expelled from Syria, and reduced to submission to the Porte. To effect that object our fleet and troops were set to work burning and destroying, and France, unable to protect her protégé, thwarted and humiliated, was in a mood of exasperation, which any untoward circumstance might have pushed to the extremity of war. Looking back with the knowledge we now have of that period, and the elements of mischief which were prepared for explosion, and waiting only a rash hand to fire them, it seems wonderful that hostilities were escaped. But Louis Philippe waited his time, laying up the grudge in his mind like one of Homer's kings, and he took his revenge in the Spanish marriage, aggrandizing his house and satisfying his vengeance by the same unworthy transaction. It was then England's turn to be angry and alienated, and the loss of the friendship which had been a tower of strength to the King of the Barricades greatly encouraged his domestic foes, and emboldened them to proceedings which, combined with other causes, ended in the overthrow of the monarchy. The coolness between the governments of the two countries is thus clearly traceable to the difference on the Syrian question, to which also must be ascribed whatever share that estrangement had in the downfall of Louis Philippe.

But how are matters changed now? What respect is now claimed for the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire? Austria is now repeating the part which France would have played, but was not suffered to play, in 1840, with this difference for the worse, that the wrong is more naked, and for an incomparably more unworthy object. Consider what Mehemet Ali was, and what the Montenegrins are. Mehemet Ali, with all his faults, was a promoter of civilization; he established order, he gave safety to the desert, and travellers traversed the country under his sway with more safety and exemption from annoyance than is now felt by the Englishman who has to make his way through the Austrian dominions. But he was a rebellious vassal, the protection of whom by France against the chastisement of the Sultan could not be endured by three of the four coalesced powers, Austria amongst the number.

Well, what are these Montenegrins, the protection of whom against the chastisement of the Sultan is endured by the powers pledged to maintain the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire? — a tribe of robbers and assassins, the match for whom in barbarism and iniquity is not to be found even amongst the Malays whose carcasses clogged the wheels of the Nemesis upon that admired occasion when Sir James Brooke so signally vindicated the rights of humanity, and gave a bloody lesson of civilization. Aggrieved by these miscreants, the Sultan despatches an army against them to punish and coerce their detestable practices, but Austria covers the brigands with her shield, and insists on the Porte's leaving the horde of cut-throats as it found them; and the powers pledged to maintain the independence of Turkey look on and acquiesce. We say nothing of the other insolent and wrongful conditions, for we would direct sole attention to the comparison between what we did at such mighty risk in 1840, to support the Sultan's authority against Mehemet Ali, with what we are now suffering Austria to do, in prevention of the provoked punishment of a race of murderous brigands, and in contravention of the Sultan's rightful exercise of his power as an independent prince.

In answer to a question put by Mr. D'Israeli on Monday,

Lord J. Russell said, her majesty's government had received official information that a final arrangement had been come to between Austria and the Sublime Porte, and that the demands made by Prince Leiningen on the part of Austria had been agreed to by the Porte. It was demanded, on the part of Austria, that the territory of Montenegro should be abandoned by the Turkish army, and that, as previous to these events, no encroachment should be made by Turkey on the coast for purposes of trade or commerce. That demand had been complied with. Another of the demands of Austria was, that the status quo before the war, as regarded Montenegro, should not be disturbed; and that, likewise, had been agreed to. On the subject of this last condition a communication had been made by

Colonel Rose, her majesty's chargé d'affaires at Constantinople, the effect of which was, that nothing should be done with reference to those important territories Kleck and Sutorina without the knowledge of her majesty's government. (Hear, hear.) With respect to another condition, that which related to Hungarian refugees serving in the Turkish army, he might observe that the first demand had been modified, and that Austria now remained satisfied with their removal from the frontier. (Hear, hear.)

And to this complexion has come all the big talk, and all the risks and substantial sacrifices for the independence of Turkey!

And what has been the friendly part of our government to its old ally? Why we, who stirred the Sultan to muster all his forces against Mehemet Ali, have counselled him that it was above his strength to move 50,000 men against the miscreant Montenegrins. And to prove our words, we let Austria bully him, countermand his armies, give impunity and encouragement to his enemies, close his ports against ourselves, and regulate the internal management of his empire in the ordering about of the refugees. To what this is the preface is clear enough. When young Mirabel is in the bravoes' den, one of the thieves tweaks his nose, another treads on his toes, as gentle preliminaries to the consummation of robbery and murder. And so it will be with Turkey, which has to pass through the stages of insult and humiliation, before she has her throat cut for booty.

Would we have a war to avert this event? Certainly not. But never again should England be committed to a policy bringing her to so lame and impotent a conclusion. The folly has been in engaging for what we could not perform; relying on allies, the fit epithet for whom Mr. D'Israeli must supply. The fool's bolt, says the wisest of men, is soon shot. We shot our bolt in 1840; to what purpose appears too clearly now.

From the Economist.

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

It has long been the fashion among thoughtless writers, and those who consider everything, even nominally, Christian as necessarily superior to everything avowedly Mahometan, to speak of Turkey as a decrepit and moribund empire, kept in existence only by the mutual jealousies or the precarious forbearance of the more powerful nations, and doomed at no distant date to dismemberment and dissolution. The prospect is viewed with something of the same complacency with which wreckers watch a magnificent vessel in danger of going to pieces on their rock-bound shore; and the speculations on the mode in which dismemberment is to be effected, are about as cool and unscrupulous as those with which these same harpies divide and appropriate in imagination the spoils which the storm is about to place at their disposal. We have long been accustomed to hear this language among influential writers and talkers, who echo only what they hear; but it is something new and ominous to see it taken up and formalized by leading journals, by men who aspire to the character of statesmen, and writers who are supposed not to be wholly deaf or blind to considerations of public morality and international policy. Yet this has been the spectacle presented in more than one quarter during the last fortnight, when the Ottoman Empire is once more threatened by the overbearing insolence of neighbors who think they may bully her with impunity, and who have long been greedy for her spoils.

Such conduct should meet with no countenance from the English press — not even that insidious support which consists in assuming that its success is a matter of certainty — that the destruction of the Turkish dominion is a fated and inevitable thing, which no effort can avert, and which there is no especial reason for desiring to postpone. It is true enough that the Ottoman Empire depends for its maintenance and integrity on the faith of treaties, on the wise policy, on the yet lingering and decent morality, of more powerful States. The combination of any two of her neighbors would suffice to overwhelm her: — nay, she might even fall under the assault of any one, if the connivance of the others could be counted upon. But of what European State, except the five great Powers, might not the same be said? Could Sweden, or Belgium, or Spain, or Portugal, defend themselves, if France or Russia chose to attack and absorb them, and if England and Austria stood looking quietly down on the gigantic and high-handed iniquity? Would it not be just as easy to dismember Italy as to dismember Turkey, if the leading States of Europe were so minded? And might not incapacity, decrepitude, and a benumbing rule, be alleged against the longer endurance of two at least of the Italian governments, with equal truth and force as against Turkey? If the feebleness of the victim is to be the plea, why not parcel out Switzerland among contiguous States, or allot the smaller kingdoms of Germany to Prussia or Austria? If the incapacity of the government is an adequate justification, why not begin by the assignment of Sicily or Rome to worthier possessors than their present sovereigns?

But (we are told) the end justifies the means. It is a shame and a grief to see such splendid provinces as those which border on Constantinople and lie around Smyrna and Damascus in the hands of a worn-out and depressing despotism, under whose rule their population decays, their harbors lie empty, their resources are undeveloped. Compare what they are with what they might be — measure the opening which they now afford for European enterprise and commerce with what they might be made to offer — contrast the scanty produce of their ill-tilled fields with the vast harvests they might be made to yield under a wiser and more genial rule; — look at them now benighted under the sensual and fatalistic creed of Islamism, and think of them as they would be under the mild and civilizing influence of the Gospel of Christ; — and then say whether the interests both of religion and humanity do not demand that a transference of sovereignty should be effected.

To all such reasonings we answer: the same remarks apply with equal force to the south of Italy. Take Rome, take Naples, take Sicily — is it not deplorable to see them writhing and suffering under such besotted sway as that which now crushes them and disgraces Europe? Who can doubt that religion, humanity, material prosperity, social happiness, would gain immeasurably if these countries could be placed under the rule of England — ay, or even of France? Yet who, on that plea, would hold either England or France justified in taking possession of them, even if Russia and Austria were to be bribed or persuaded into connivance or consent? But are we so sure that the provinces of the Turkish Empire would gain so immensely by a transference to other masters? For ourselves we doubt it greatly. There is no doubt that the Ottoman government is in many respects anomalous and feeble; but it has several good points; — of late, too, it has made great efforts to improve itself; — it has two parties in the State, like most other nations, one bigoted, reactionary, and conservative — the other enlightened, reforming, and liberal. Under the sway of the latter (now temporarily overthrown) several amendments had been introduced; and a gradual approach to European notions was being made. Are we — because Turkey is still in the crisis of an internal struggle which we all of us have had to pass through in our time, and in which some are yet involved — to pronounce her hopelessly incurable, and fit only for the executioner? But, if she be dismembered, what is the character of the two governments which would divide among them the chief portion of her rich and beautiful territories — Austria and Russia? Is it so certain that either Czar or Kaiser will govern her better than the Sultan? She has long had the most liberal commercial policy of any European State — no prohibitions — no protective duties — no heavy customs — no burdensome or cramping regulations — no selfish and narrow navigation laws; — all foreign articles are admitted at an ad valorem duty of three per cent., and may then circulate all over the empire unimpeded by octrois or transit dues. Would Russia or Austria continue a tariff like this, which so shames their own? Again: we admit and we deplore the despotism which reigns through Turkey as through all Mahometan countries; — of such we shall never constitute ourselves defenders. We have seen the grievous operation of this despotism upon the agriculture of perhaps the most magnificent and fertile lands which the sun shines upon; — we would be among the last to wish for its continuance. But we have no desire to see one tyranny replaced by another, more powerful and more unmitigated. The government of Austria in Lombardy is as absolute and more oppressive than that of the Porte, because more resistless, more vigilant, more ubiquitous. Theoretically, the Turks are as much slaves as the subjects of the Austrian dominion — practically, they are far less so. The pressure of extreme absolutism reaches few in Turkey, and strikes only occasionally: in the countries subject to the leaden rule of Austria, it lies like an incubus every hour and upon everybody. The Emperor of Russia is at least as great a despot as the Sultan of Turkey; and, what is not the case in Turkey, all his nobles are so too. The Russians are serfs, salable by their masters, seizable for military purposes by the Czar: the Turkish subjects are liable to be robbed by a Pacha, or beheaded by the order of a Vizier; — but this is a liability, not a constant and normal position. Despotism, too, in the Ottoman Empire is tempered by the two most effectual modifications it can ever have — religion and municipal institutions. The Sultan is bound to govern according to law — i. e., according to the Koran, of which law the Ulemas are the self-constituted judges in the last resort. If he violates that law, remonstrance and sometimes rebellion ensue: if his subordinate Pachas violate it, an appeal to head-quarters is often answered by the head of the offender complained against. Then, in no country in Europe (except Hungary before the late catastrophe) is so much left to municipal management as in Turkey. Her municipalities resemble in their completeness those which we found existing in India. The chiefs of a village distribute the taxation among their fellows, and conduct their affairs, both of social arrangement and of judicial decisions, in the first instance with little interference from higher authorities. It would be a great question whether individual liberty and habits of self-government would not suffer by the substitution of Austrian centralization — of all others the most deadening — for a system such as this, imperfect and ignorantly conducted as it may be.

Nor must the substitution of Christianity for Islamism be set down at once as clear gain without some further investigation. For what is the form of nominal Christianity which would be introduced, or rather established, in dismembered Turkey? Unquestionably, that of the Greek Church, to which considerably more than half the population already belongs. What is the nature and what the operation of that awfully degrading superstition may be learned in part from the books of travellers in the Levant, but can be adequately conceived by no one who has not himself in person witnessed its monstrosities. It is, we think, almost impossible even for the sincerest Christian to live long in Turkey without being compelled to admit that in point of purity and sublimity the Koran, as there taught, has a marked advantage over any other creed as there practised and travestied; and that on the whole its fruits are, to say the least, not inferior. The Turks are dignified fatalists, and simple and sincere monotheists; the votaries of the Greek church are slaves of a puerile and almost pagan mythology, which it is really disgraceful
